It is doubtful whether Clare derived much comfort from the above observations. Nor, unfortunately, was Georgina's subsequent method with her brother the best that could have been adopted for bringing about an understanding between the divided couple. She treated him with a fine, hearty contempt which might have amused him if he had not been too worried to be amused by it; she scarcely answered him when he spoke to her; and, if he ventured upon a humble joke, stared blankly at him without moving a muscle. She wished him, in short, to understand distinctly that he was in disgrace; and, as she never knew how to do things by halves, she ended by virtually sending him to Coventry in his own house.

Towards a man of Adrian's temperament it would have been difficult to take up a more injudicious line. The only effect that it produced upon him was to drive him away from home; and when he did come home, he generally took care to bring friends with him. He was restless and excitable at this time, seeming to find his only pleasure in society; he did very little work, and Clare noticed that he had become alarmingly careless about money. She did not know what his literary earnings might be; but she feared that they could hardly be sufficient to warrant the continual little dinner parties that he gave, the addition of a man to their staff of indoor servants, and the hire of a brougham. These things made her uneasy; and Georgina, now that poor De Wynt had been sent about his business, no longer provided her with a wholesome interest to withdraw her thoughts from her own unhappiness.

One small piece of consolation, which afterwards became a more important one, was afforded to her by the unexpected visit of a friend of her girlhood, of whom she had lost sight for some years, and who had joined a nursing sisterhood. Sister Jane, as this lady was now called, was sent, in the first instance, to appeal for help by the society to which she belonged; but, finding that Mrs. Vidal was interested in hearing about her work, she remained, talking, for some little time, and was persuaded to repeat her visit a few days later.

Clare looked with something like envy at this cheerful, plain-featured young woman, to whom the world had seemed rather a place in which to perform duties than to seek for happiness. In carrying out the former, she had apparently found the latter. When questioned upon this point, she answered simply that she never had time to ask herself whether she enjoyed her life or not; but that she was quite sure that she had not enjoyed it before entering the sisterhood. "For you, it is very different," she added, divining what the wistful expression in Clare's eyes meant. "If I had been beautiful, as you are, I should have expected quite another kind of existence, and I suppose very likely I should have got it. I don't think there is any harm in that—only every woman ought to find her proper place, if she can. Those who are not ornamental had better try to be useful."

But Clare thought it might be possible to be both. "Couldn't you find something for me to do?" she asked, eagerly. "Couldn't I go to the hospitals and—and read to the patients, or be of some help?"

Sister Jane smiled. "Well, I am afraid not. And you have your home duties, you know."

"They are soon got through. I have a great deal of spare time—and I have no children," said Clare, with a sigh.

"Would you like to go to the Children's Hospital sometimes?" asked the other, presently. "You might really be of use there, if you cared to go. The children are always glad to see people; and many of them must be kept lying on their backs for months, poor little souls! Shall I take you there one day?"

Clare jumped at the suggestion. When should she go? To-morrow?—the next day?

"Well, to-morrow, if you like," the good Sister answered, smiling; and thus it was that Clare was provided with a better cure for morbid self-communings than any that Georgina could have devised.

The bright, airy ward, with its rows of little iron beds, became a sort of haven of rest to her. When she entered it, it seemed to her that she left the world behind her—that weary, heartless, purposeless world in which women had nothing better to do than to make love to their friends' husbands, and where men were considered idiots if they devoted themselves to their wives. The children became fond of her. She took them toys, with which they managed to play in a serious, unchild-like fashion, as they lay there, afflicted before their time with the curse of mortality. They did not understand why she so often had tears in her eyes, for the pathos of their condition was, happily, less evident to them than it was to her; but they learnt to love her beautiful, sad face, and she developed a faculty for narrating stories, which rather astonished her, seeing that she had never suspected herself of being gifted with any great fecundity of imagination. Her husband, whose own imagination was becoming woefully sterile at this time, would perhaps have been grateful to her for a hint or two; but she had not deemed it incumbent upon her to tell Adrian of her frequent visits to the Children's Hospital.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

Paris, Tuesday, May 12.

The Chamber of Deputies has begun the discussion of the Habitual Criminals Act, one might almost say under pressure. The electors of France attach great importance to the settlement of this grave question. They demand in the interests simply of order and security that France should be promptly rid of the swarms of professional criminals, who begin with theft and end by assassination. The deputies hardly dare to face the electors without having settled this matter. But the difficulty is to dispose of the récidivistes. The Government proposes Cayenne and Guyane as penitentiary colonies. Why not kill your criminals at once? object certain humanitarians. La Guyane means slow death; the climate is mortal; "it is a dry guillotine!" exclaims M. De Mun. "Try Tonquin or Madagascar!" suggest some. "It will be the ruin of our colonies," replies M. Perrin, "to introduce this foul and devastating element of criminals." In short, the Government does not know what to do; the deputies do not know what to do; but the elections are near and something must be done. Public opinion demands the sending of the army of crime out of the country, and when we remember that recent statistics show that army to number no less than 82,732 persons, we can well understand that the Chamber of Deputies can no longer avoid the question.

Electoral plans and combinations continue to occupy a large amount of space in the discussions of the newspapers. The friends of Prince Napoleon are organising meetings in the different districts of Paris, and propose to wind up with a grand contradictory debate between friends and foes at the Cirque d'Eté. The programme of this group is refusal to enter the Royalist alliance, opposition to Royalist candidates, and, wherever there is no orthodox Bonapartist, determination to vote for the Republican candidate, whoever he may be. The Conservatives of Paris have also formed a central Committee, and appeal for subscriptions to meet the heavy expenses of their campaign in "defence of our liberties, our finances, and the future of our children." The famous Conservative Union has gone all to pieces even before the campaign has begun, and the Bonapartists and the Monarchists have split up into groups, maintaining different principles and different programmes. The Republicans have at least this advantage, that they are agreed as to the form of Government. There can be no doubt that in spite of their lecturing tours, their pamphlets, and their journalism, the Conservatives will obtain no more success at the forthcoming elections than they have obtained previously by the same means. They will, as usual, be paralysed by division.

The sale of Bastien Lepage's pictures took place yesterday and to-day, and the prices obtained were high, considering that Bastien Lepage, in spite of his immense talent and of the great influence which he exercised on the young French artists of to-day, can hardly be considered a great genius or a great master. The "Potato Harvest" fetched 29,100f.; "The Annunciation to the Shepherds," 23,800f.; "The Beggar," 21,000f.: the portrait of Madame Juliette Drouet, 11,500f.; "The Pond at Damvilliers," 9500f.; "The Little Chimney-Sweep," 9400f.; a first study of the portrait of the Prince of Wales, 6000f., &c.

A sporting club, called the Canis Club, is attempting to introduce coursing into the number of Parisian amusements. Two meetings have been held on the Champ de Mars, in presence of a large attendance, but the sympathies of the public all seemed to be with the poor hare, and the performances of the dogs did not interest them profoundly. Some hawking followed, but here again the public seemed disappointed at the shortness of the incidents, and the miserable chances of the victims, which were destroyed a few seconds after having been let loose.

The papers are all discussing the Gounod-Weldon case, and of course expressing astonishment at the condemnation of the author of "Faust." Gounod himself characterises the judgment as "a monstrosity."

The American colony in Paris has subscribed the money necessary to present to the city of Paris a reduction in bronze, 35 feet high, of the colossal statue of "Liberty Enlightening the World," which is to be placed, eventually, at the entrance to the harbour of New York. The inauguration of the reduction takes place to-morrow, and its presentation to the city of Paris will be the last official act of Mr. L. P. Morton, whose successor at the American Legation, Mr. Robert MacLane, arrived in Paris last week. A farewell banquet is to be offered to Mr. Morton on Thursday.

M. Alphonse Daudet's Provençal piece, "L'Arlésienne," has been revived with considerable success at the Odéon. When first performed at the Vaudeville, in 1872, the piece was almost a failure; the only thing that saved it was Bizet's exquisite music. How are we to explain these changes in the public judgment? Is it for a higher appreciation of mere literary merit? The comparative success of another condemned piece on its recent revival, "Henriette Maréchal," by the brothers De Goncourt, would seem to indicate that the literary education of the public enters largely into the explanation of these changes of opinion. Both "Henriette Maréchal" and "L'Arlésienne" are wanting in action and dramatic interest, but they are of high literary merit.

The King and Queen of Italy arrived at Naples last Saturday, and met with an enthusiastic reception. A tablet in commemoration of his visit to the city during the cholera epidemic was uncovered in the presence of thousands of people. On Sunday his Majesty visited the reservoirs of the new waterworks, and expressed his admiration of what he saw. After tasting the water, and witnessing the filling of one of the reservoirs, he returned to the city, the streets of which were filled with a holiday crowd. At night the city was illuminated. On Monday the King laid the foundation-stone of the new Quarter which it is intended to construct on the Vomero Heights at Naples, and in the evening attended a gala performance at the Palace.—The Duchess of Teck presented first aid and nursing certificates to the Florence classes of the St. John Ambulance Association, at the British Consulate, a few days since.

The German Emperor entertained at dinner on the 7th inst. the Russian Grand Duke and Grand Duchess Sergius, who were passing through Berlin on their return from Darmstadt to St. Petersburg. There were numerous other guests, including various members of the Prussian Royal family. On the 8th inst. the Emperor received the visit of the Grand Duke and Grand Duchess, and paid a visit to the Grand Duke at the Russian Embassy in the afternoon. A dinner was given in honour of the Grand Duke and Grand Duchess at the Imperial Palace. On Sunday the German Empress had an interview at Baden-Baden with the Empress of Austria, who was returning to Vienna from Heidelberg.—Count Herbert Bismarck has now been officially appointed Under State Secretary at the Foreign Office.—Prince Albert of Saxe-Altenburg was married in Berlin, on the 6th inst., to Princess Marie of Prussia, daughter of Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia, and widow of the late Prince Henry of the Netherlands.—The Prussian Diet, at a joint sitting of the two Houses, was closed by Royal Commission last Saturday evening by Herr Von Puttkamer, Vice-President of the Ministry.—The Prussian Government have purchased the Fornarina, after De Piombo, and the Andromeda and a Baccante by Rubens, of the Blenheim collection.

The King of the Belgians has conferred the Royal order of Leopold on the Lord Mayor, the Sheriffs, and other members of the London civic deputation which went to Brussels to present his Majesty with a congratulatory address in reference to the Congo.

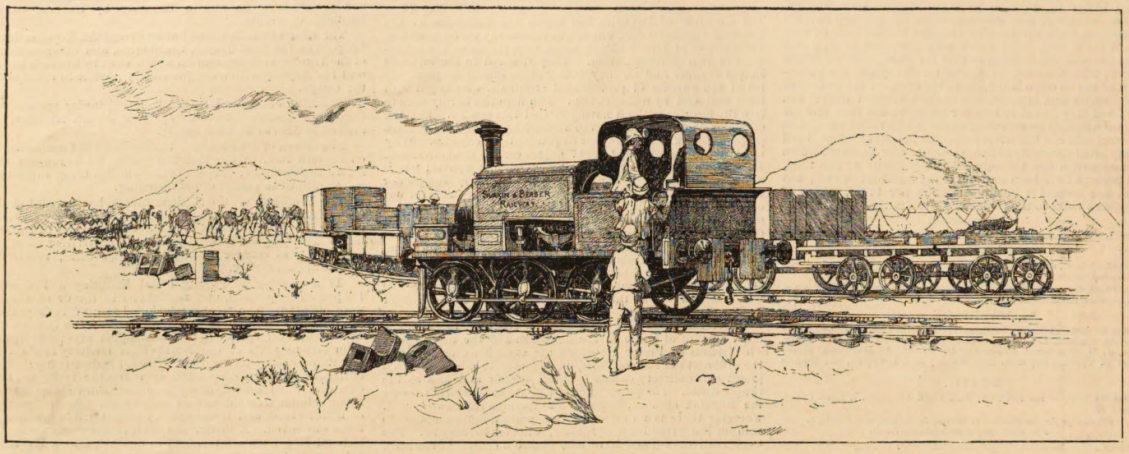
The Queen of Sweden and the Princes left Constantinople on the 8th inst. in the Imperial yacht, viâ Varna, on their return to Stockholm, Prince Charles's health being sufficiently re-established to permit of his travelling.

The President of the United States has appointed Mr. George Lothrop, of Michigan, American Minister to Russia; and Mr. Boyd Winchester, of Kentucky, Minister to Switzerland.—The jury at New York, upon the trial of Short for attempting to murder Phelan in Rossa's office, returned a verdict of Not Guilty.

At a meeting in Montreal last Saturday a Federation League was organised, and resolutions in favour of the idea were adopted. The meeting included men of both political parties, and representatives from all parts of the Dominion.—The Times Correspondent at Philadelphia says:—Telegrams from various parts of the North-West territory confirm the reports previously received of a general Indian rising. Many outrages have been committed upon frontier settlers. Later details of the recent fighting near Battleford show that the flying column was led into an ambush through the treachery of a half-breed, and it was only by their terrible fire that the force was saved. A Reuter despatch from Ottawa states that General Middleton's force, 1000 in number, inflicted a severe defeat upon the rebels last Saturday morning, near Batoche. The casualties among the Dominion troops were unimportant. More troops are being sent by the Government.

We learn from Sydney that the various Colonial Governments have agreed to the proposal of the Hon. W. B. Dalley, Acting Colonial Secretary for New South Wales, for a united indemnification against all losses inflicted upon persons refusing supplies or coal to enemy's cruisers.—Mr. George A. Sala's first lecture at Melbourne had for its subject "Wars, Revolutions, and Tumults." It was delivered at the Townhall, and was well attended, being in all respects a success.

Queen Emma, of the Sandwich Islands, the widow of the last Hawaiian King of the Kamehameha race, died on April 25. Her husband died in 1863, and two years later the Queen visited England, and remained in this country for twelve months.



THE PLAYHOUSES.

The revivals at the Lyceum, under Mr. Irving's presidency, have been the only important events in a week that has been, nevertheless, busy. He has never before played Louis XI. to such an appreciative audience, or has rendered the grim death scene so finely. In all probability, this play would have been repeated, but it contains no part for Miss Ellen Terry, and when she is out of the programme there is a sense of disappointment everywhere. For the first few weeks after her arrival in England, this charming and gifted artist suffered from a throat affection that made her playing of Ophelia a very painful task. But the discomfort is now over, and Ellen Terry was herself again, as Portia, on Monday evening. Both Miss Terry and Mr. Irving have re-studied, corrected, and embellished their original conceptions of Portia and Shylock. To the trial scene they have devoted their most earnest attention, and it surely never created before such breathless interest. That fine and pathetic exit of Shylock, that was such a strong feature in Mr. Irving's rendering of the character, is now accompanied by a long low groan of despair, that is extremely effective. The crushed and humiliated man is as proud as ever, he replies to Gratiano's taunts with a look of withering scorn; but at the last comes a mighty sigh from the very soul, as it were, of the wretched outcast who has lost everything dear to him in the world. Murmurs of appreciation all over the house reward Portia's celebrated scenes—the choosing of the casket, the departure with Nerissa, the demand for Bassanio's ring, and the delightful comedy in the last act, ignorantly called an anti-climax to the noble play. Miss Ellen Terry has seldom played with such refinement of art or buoyancy of spirit.

Not being able to appear in two places at once last Thursday afternoon, I was unable to see the new play "The Great Pink Pearl," which is reported to be so amusing and to have been so well received, but I was present at the Vaudeville instead, where was performed still another play from the German, called "The Road to Fame." It is a pretty and interesting little work, but the interest somewhat fades away after a first act that delighted everybody. The "Cuckoo," who inserts himself in his neighbour's nest, is an enterprising journalist, who has fallen suddenly in love with the daughter of an artist—a neglected genius. The journalist persuades the artist that no one can get on in the world without advertisement and puff, so he proposes to swagger as the genius, whilst the modest artist paints the pictures, and does all the work. It is the dramatic exposition of "the ghost" who figured at a recent cause célèbre. The little play might have been better acted, but the rendering by the artist's little daughter could not by any possibility have been in better hands than those of Miss Kate Rorke, one of the most promising of the younger actresses of the day. This young lady has a great future before her. Her success, so far, has been undisputed.

It was a lovely afternoon at Oxford when, resisting the temptation of a stroll in one or other of the quiet college gardens, I repaired to the Townhall to see the members of the new University Dramatic Club play the first part of "King Henry the Fourth." The stage is small, the hall is inconvenient, the play is continually disturbed by the rattle of passing cabs in the street down below; but for all that, wonders were done. Mr. Arthur Bourchier specially distinguished himself as Hotspur, and put spirit into a play that is most difficult to attack properly. Mr. Mackinnon made an excellent and very graceful Prince of Wales. Mr. Leclunere Stuart should be recognised as a very promising actor of comedy, doubling as he did the characters of Mortimer and the second carrier; and Jack Falstaff was safely if not brilliantly played by the Hon. G. D. Coleridge. The young amateurs were assisted by Mrs. H. G. Wood, a clever painter and designer of scenery, by Lady St. Leonards, and by Lady Edward Churchill, who, as Lady Mortimer, sang "The Bells of Aberdovey" delightfully. The play is magnificently dressed, and the society deserves every encouragement. It is now a University institution, and the members of it will not for the future "star" in the provinces or play out of Oxford. The performance of Tuesday was watched by Mr. F. R. Benson, an athletic amateur, now turned actor; by Mr. Claude Ponsonby, a well-known amateur actor; by Mr. Hermann Vezin, and by Mr. Oscar Wilde.

THE INTERNAL RESOURCES OF RUSSIA.

During the recent complications the question before the minds of most people was: Can Russia fight without money? It is a question which Englishmen would be inclined to answer in the negative. We all know Napoleon's dictum that three things are necessary to a nation going to war—namely, in the first place, money; in the second, more money; and in the third, always money. This was the result of a large and varied experience, and was given utterance to at the beginning of the century. Nothing has occurred since then to weaken the influence of this powerful agent for good and evil, and life does not seem to have become any easier than it used to be to those who possess it not. And yet we find a country nearly bankrupt, and so impecunious as to be unable to pay interest on its foreign loans without borrowing fresh ones, actually on the verge of provoking the wealthiest nation in Europe to mortal combat. Some Englishmen were quite amused at Russia's temerity; they thought she must be mad, and prophesied her utter collapse with complacent self-satisfaction. How can she expect to do us harm? Why, she has no money!

The nations of Europe are most of them possessed of the same idea; and hence it has occurred to none of them that money is not, after all, everything in a struggle between two nations. The artificial circumstances of civilisation are such that we cannot bring ourselves to imagine a country rich in resources but without money; we have even difficulty in realising that money itself is not wealth, but only its representative; that it is quite possible for a wealthy community to be poor in a military sense, because its internal resources may be inadequate to the support of its population.

Russia is a rich country without money. That is to say, she has vast resources but a languishing trade. She is in the condition of a talented man, with immense natural gifts, who is too lazy to develop his talents by study and intellectual exercise. Russia is lazy. Her entire past history has been calculated to make her so. The Emperors have commenced by crushing the individual initiative of the people, by extinguishing every spark of liberty and independence in the country, and have continued the régime by intrusting the care of government and the industrial and financial economy of the nation to corrupt and incapable officials. No single undertaking in Russia, no matter what branch of industry it be in: mining, public works, railways, naval and military equipment, commercial enterprises, manufactures—not one single branch of these that has been attempted in Russia has been able to make its way without running the gauntlet of every species of bribery and corruption. In this respect, the letters of Stepniak to the Times are by no means exaggerated. In the face of such opposition, and in the face of the glaring abuses that still reign, it is, indeed, wonderful that Russia should be as advanced as she is. But one thing is certain, the régime is oppressive, it makes breathing difficult. There is no fresh air; there are no open spaces of thought in the Czar's domains; and life is consequently languid, unenterprising, slothful, and even despondent. The great saying of the Russian is Tekto dyelat, which, being interpreted, means, What shall I do? it can't be helped: what is done cannot be undone. It is the great argument in favour of inactivity, and a resigned acceptance of accomplished facts.

But, notwithstanding the laziness and apathy of her population, Russia is a rich country. She has some of the finest soil for wheat-growing purposes in Europe, Austria not excepted; she has coal, iron, and petroleum, in enormous quantities. Her Siberian gold and silver mines, mismanaged as they are, represent a fabulous wealth; and in horses, cattle, and timber, she is, perhaps, the richest country in the world. Compared to all this wealth of resources, the population is ridiculously inadequate. Let us glance at the map, and we shall see that the ninety millions who owe their allegiance to the Czar are scattered over an area of nine million square miles—in other words, there are about ten inhabitants to the square mile. When we remember that in Belgium there are nearly 450 to the square mile, we shall be better able to form an idea of the sparseness of the population of this vast country.

And Russia is not only a country of large natural wealth, she is also a manufacturing country. The heart of Russia is the industrial centre of the empire, and in what is called the region of Moscow, we shall find manufactures of every description and variety. At present the manufacturers are not very flourishing; they have the advantage of cheap labour, for the Russian workman has very few wants; but they have great difficulty in competing with foreign wares, even at home, and notwithstanding the high protection they enjoy. In the event of a war with us, English goods at least would be excluded, and Russian manufactures would probably receive a great stimulus. Some of the large works are quite prepared to cope with a very great demand indeed: the Obouklioff steel works, near St. Petersburg, for instance, enjoy a deservedly high reputation all over the world, and would be quite able to turn out everything in the way of ships and guns that the Government might require. Poland is also a manufacturing country. We see, therefore, that Russia is self-contained; she has all the possibilities of success, all the materials for development; and, large and unwieldy as she is, she has all her wealth well within reach of the centre, and contained within one frontier line, however straggling.

Although the credit of the Government then is at so low an ebb, it does not by any means follow that the country is poor. It has been badly governed; its wealth has been unwisely administered; its commercial and industrial interests have been too often sacrificed to strategical and political considerations, and frequently wantonly neglected; but the wealth is there, dormant and undeveloped, and many Russian economists are of opinion that a good war would tend to bring it out.

Skobeleff's views with reference to the financial aspect of war may not be uninstructive.

"I don't understand why we want money to wage war with. In our country the paper rouble has the value of a rouble. We believe in the security of our State institutions; then let them write money on leather if they like, we trust them, and in matters of credit that is all that is wanted. If it should please God to let us carry the war into the enemy's country, the enemy should take it as an honour if we paid him with our paper money."

Prussia, in 1813, showed the world what a united nation is capable of doing, though it be poor, and if things should come so far, it is very probable that wealthy Russians would vie with each other in ostentatious manifestations of loyalty, in which the priests and monks would join. The Church would pour out its hoarded treasures, and everyone would be eager to prove to the satisfaction of the authorities that he at least was a loyal subject, and not a Nihilist—indeed, it would not be safe to act otherwise.

I am not at all inclined to prognosticate failure to the British arms in the event of war with Russia, and feel confident that the Anglo-Saxon race would come forth triumphant through the ordeal. But we must face disagreeable facts. Russia is a difficult foe to tackle; she is big, and she has scarcely a vital point, because she has no centres of population at all proportionate to her size, and she is self-contained. A war would stimulate her industrial activity to the highest pitch. We hear that an eminent firm have declined to supply the Russian Government with coal during the present crisis. All respect and honour to them; but Russia has coal of her own, and if she is forced by circumstances to work it, she would have no reason to regret the hardship.

There are questions which will not admit of an amicable settlement, and if Russia should maintain an aggressive position, we must defend ourselves; but she is not a weak or poor country, and a war with her should not be entered upon carelessly with a light heart or a small force. It would take all our strength to crush her.

THE ARMY OF THE CAUCASUS.

The Russian Army of the Caucasus, having its head-quarters at Tiflis, supplies the garrisons of the territories east of the Caspian. Its numbers have been estimated altogether at 200,000 men, but in order to arrive at that total all its details must be included—reserve, irregulars, and Cossacks. The regular army of the Caucasus musters 70,000 men, but its reserve of another 50,000 would raise it to 120,000 strong. Besides this force of the line, there are 30,000 Georgian and Imeritian irregulars of horse and foot. The Cossacks established in the settlements north of the Caucasian range represent another section of the armed forces of the Tiflis Governorship, and they are expected to supply a quota of 50,000 men. These separate totals make up the grand total of 200,000 men. A very large proportion of the army of the Caucasus is non-Russian. The Cossacks, Circassians, Georgians, and others form the majority of the troops whom Prince Dondoukoff-Korsakoff could array in time of war. The 70,000 men who are permanently engaged in garrison duty south of the Caucasus are distributed between Batoum, Tiflis, Kars, and other fortified places on the Turkish and Persian frontiers. They have also to furnish the troops employed in the Askabad district, and these number about 15,000 men, of whom 9000 are in positions east of Bami. But any extra work thrown upon this portion of the Russian army would immediately necessitate the calling out of the reserves, who are really nothing more or less than military colonists, who receive a grant of land and are allowed to marry after serving five years with the colours. The Cossacks are excellent for all the purposes of irregular warfare, but they never have been trusted by any Russian General against a disciplined army in the open field; and of the 50,000 men whom Russia might place east of the Caspian one half would be Cossacks, as they are the most easy to mobilise and send on foreign service. The word "Cossack" is Tartar, and was originally used by the people occupying the country of the Dnieper and the Don. Russia, as she extended her conquests among the Turanian races to the East and the South, organised them into soldiers. These Tartars were warlike, and with their small wiry horses, which they constantly rode, they proved hardy and good irregular cavalry. This is the meaning which the word "Cossack" is now understood to convey. Since the occupation of the Caucasus by the Russians, both infantry and cavalry troops have been raised in that country, and the word "Cossack" having been always associated with notions of the Tartar type of humanity, it seems at first incongruous to hear it applied to men of that race who may be said to be par excellence "Caucasians." But by understanding the term in its later sense to mean "irregular cavalry," we have the explanation. Our Special Artist, Mr. Simpson, says:—"Nearly all the races living round the Caspian Sea look upon a horse as a necessary part of existence. These people never move from one place to another, however short the distance, without riding; the result is that most of them can almost be said to live in the saddle. This constant familiarity with the horse has led naturally to exercises in which both man and beast have been trained. The Circassians, the Cossacks of the Don, and the Turkomans, are all more or less familiar with peculiar feats of horsemanship. I first saw these performances gone through in Circassia in 1855; and afterwards, in 1866, I was present in the great riding-school of St. Petersburg, when the Circassians of the Emperor's body-guard went through them before the Prince of Wales, the late Emperor being also present on the occasion. These performances were more like what would be suited to a circus than for warlike purposes, but the latter was the original intention of these exercises. The rider can sling himself on one side of his horse at full gallop, so that the animal covers the man from the bullets of the enemy, and in this position he can fire his rifle. I saw these Circassians sitting, standing, and twisting themselves into every conceivable position, loading and firing their pieces all the time while at the gallop. The more expert of them can slip down from their animals while at full speed, and remount again. While doing this, many of them will lift a hat, dagger, or other small object from the ground. The horse must, of course, be as expert and well practised for such performances as the man. When at Old Sarakhs in November last, I saw some of the Circassian Cossacks and the Akhal and Merv Tekkes go through these exercises."

The new workhouse infirmary which has been erected at Croydon, at a cost up to the present of £100,943, will be opened this (Saturday) evening by the Archbishop of Canterbury.

The entertainment on behalf of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children proposed to be given at the Mansion House by Mrs. Nottage, the Lady Mayoress, which was of necessity abandoned on account of the lamented death of the late Lord Mayor, will now, by permission of the Duke and Duchess of Westminster, and under their direct patronage, take place at Grosvenor House, on Monday, June 1, commencing at three p.m.

On the invitation of Sir Saul Samuel, a large and distinguished company assembled last Saturday night, at a banquet at Bailey's Hotel, South Kensington, in honour of Lord Carrington, who has been appointed Governor of New South Wales. Among those present was Lord Derby, who expressed scepticism about some of the Imperial federation schemes, and urged that the union aimed at should be moral rather than mechanical.

Two of the Middlesex Volunteer battalions—the 2nd (South Middlesex), under Lieutenant-Colonel Wylde, C.M.G., and the 7th (London Scottish), under Colonel Lumsden—were exercised in brigade-drill on Wimbledon-common last Saturday evening, under the superintendence of Colonel Moncrieff, commanding the Scots Guards. Both battalions were of about equal strength (over 580 each), and were well and smartly turned out. After the march-past the brigade was exercised in various manœuvres

The Duchess of Westminster will this (Saturday) afternoon open, in the Floral Hall attached to Covent-Garden Theatre, a picturesque bazaar in aid of the funds of the Temperance Hospital, Hampstead-road. As Chairman of the Committee, Mr. F. Hutton will present to the Duchess an address. The entertainments will be exceptionally attractive. The decorations will represent an Old English Street in the reign of Edward III.; and there will be on sale at the stalls "The National Bazaar Book," a new shilling work, with contributions by Mr. G. Manville Fenn, Mr. G. R. Sims, Mr. H. Chance Newton, Mr. H. Furniss, Mr. John Latey, jun., and others.

CITY ECHOES.

In spite of much that is said against the arrangement with Russia, it is taken for granted that peace is assured as regards the Afghan question; and consequently the work of restoring business matters to their normal position has made further progress. The Bank of England directors have reduced the rate of interest to 3 per cent, and the Bank of Germany rate was on Monday lowered from 4½ to 4 per cent. In this country the interest allowed for deposits has been further reduced to 2 per cent. Low as our present rates are, they are nearly sure to be soon yet lower; for when the flow of money is checked by anxieties such as we have just gone through, it takes a long time to resume its ordinary course and volume. The rebound in securities has now lost some of its force, but it has already quite changed the face of the Stock markets. In a few instances a slight reaction has indeed taken place, but it may be assumed that for some time yet the tendency will be upwards. Next to British and Indian Government issues, Foreign bonds and Home railways have most conspicuously advanced, and only United States railways have declined. That these should be so very depressed is the cause of a great deal of surprise. To some extent Grand Trunk stocks have shared in this relapse, but in this case there was a disappointing traffic statement to account for it. Within the past day or too, however, this company's securities have recovered under the influence of rumours about Sir Henry Tyler's mission to Canada, and of the prospect of his coming to a working arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Company, whose line is now absolutely completed to the Rocky Mountains.

The sharp fall in New York Central shares on Tuesday was due to a rumour from New York that in future interest was to be paid half-yearly instead of quarterly, as heretofore. For many years the dividend was 8 per cent per annum, and the price of the shares rose to 160 per cent. In October last year and January this year the rate was but 6, in April last it was but 4, and now it is feared that the July payment will be "passed." The price of the shares is now 86½. In January, 1880, Messrs. Morgan and Co. sold here and elsewhere 25,000,000 dols. of these shares at 135¾.

As regards the North Shore Railway, the respective managers of the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific Companies have agreed to a joint ownership; but the people of Quebec seem to desire that the Canadian Pacific Company should have an independent line to Quebec. These are, however, not the times to build a third line, when business is not enough for two; and the Quebec people have only themselves to blame for what has happened.

Energetic efforts are being made to obtain from the voting proprietors of the three southern lines (the Brighton, South-Eastern, and Chatham) an opinion in favour of complete amalgamation. Mr. William Abbott has circulated a formidable statement of reasons in favour of union; and if the proprietors can see their advantage, the public must, one would think, gain by any change as regards two of the lines.

British holders of Denver and Rio Grande Railway consolidation first mortgage 7 per cent bonds are asked to agree to the exchange of such bonds into new 4 per cent bonds of the same rank, and to receive in compensation for the reduction of interest 700 dols. of preferred 5 per cent stock for every 1000 dols. of present bonds. The company suspended bonded interest in July last year, and the above arrangement is part of a rearrangement scheme.

The Peruvian bondholders' committee propose to very effectively meet the priority claims upon guano proceeds of the Pisco to Yea bondholders. They offer to purchase such bonds at par, interest in arrear to be sacrificed. Payment is to take place as money comes in from guano sales.

Negotiations having for their object the consolidation of the Oregon and California Railroad with the Central Pacific Company are in progress, with, it appears, fair chance of success. British investors are concerned in both.

The Mexican Railway dividend is limited to the full rate on the first preference, which is, apparently, about up to expectation, but it is the worst experience since 1879.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN.

The positive abandonment of the expedition to Khartoum was announced by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons on Monday. The Secretary of State for War, Lord Hartington, informed the House that our Government has decided to bring all the British troops down the Nile, as soon as the river begins to rise, which will be in about three weeks or a month. Assouan, with the First Cataract, will be defended "as the practical frontier of Upper Egypt," with a small brigade of all arms, holding Wady Halfa and Korosko as outposts. This was the original policy of our Government; and we remember that Lord Hartington, in a speech he made at Manchester on Dec. 2, 1883, four days after the news of the destruction of Hicks Pasha's army, stated that Wady Halfa, just below the Second Cataract, was the farthest point that it would be needful to occupy for the safety of Egypt. With regard to operations on the Red Sea coast, and in the Eastern Soudan, the construction of the railway to Berber is now to be discontinued, but some posts in the neighbourhood of Souakim will be held, under the advice of Lord Wolseley, until diplomatic arrangements can be made for handing over the custody of Souakim to another civilised Power—most likely to the Sultan of Turkey, who is the ancient and legitimate Sovereign of that coast. The number of troops required for the garrison of Assouan and its outposts is estimated at 2500 men; all the rest of the Nile army will speedily be recalled.

Our Special Artist with the force of Sir Gerald Graham at Souakim, Mr. Walter Paget, contributes three Sketches to this week's publication; those of the Coldstream Guards sitting under the wall in "Monck's Redoubt," on the hill above Otao; the arrival of a train at Handoub Station on the new railway, bringing a number of water-tanks for the supply of daily needs of the troops; and the Scots Guards, on the 16th ult., building a redoubt at Otao. The wall is built of large rough stones, piled up loosely to the height of four feet, with sandbags placed on the top. At the interior side of the wall, blankets are stretched tent-wise, propped up by rifles or cleaning-rods, to shelter the men from the burning sun.

The affecting scene at Gakdul, delineated by Mr. Melton Prior, our Special Artist lately with the advanced force of General Sir Herbert Stewart, in its memorable conflicts at Abou Klea and Metammeh, appears in the large Engraving called "A Soldier's Funeral," which is presented for our Special Supplement. The death of that gallant commander has occasioned deep regret, not only in the Army, but among the people of England.

We are requested by Sir Charles Wilson, who writes on the 16th ult. from Dongola, to correct an error in our publication of March 14, which contained two Illustrations of his steamboat approach to Khartoum, and the conflict with the enemy's batteries and troops, on Jan. 28, and of the position of his small party when landed on an island below, after the wreck of the steamer. Those Sketches were not furnished by Sir Charles Wilson, but were drawn by Mr. Melton Prior, with some assistance from an officer who was on board the steamer.

OBITUARY.

THE EARL OF DUDLEY.

The Right Hon. William Ward, first Earl of Dudley and Viscount Ednam in the Peerage of the United Kingdom, and eleventh Baron Ward in the Peerage of England, died at Dudley House, Park-lane, on the 7th inst. He was born March 27, 1817, the elder son of William Humble, tenth Lord Ward; and received his education at Eton; Christ Church, Oxford; and Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1856 he was attached to Earl Granville's special Embassy to Russia, and in 1861 to the Earl of Clarendon's special Mission to the King of Prussia. The previous year he had been created Earl of Dudley and Viscount Ednam, having already, in 1835, succeeded to his father's old barony of Ward. Lord Dudley sat as Chairman of the Worcestershire Quarter Sessions, 1859 to 1880. He was High Steward of Kidderminster, and Colonel Commandant of the Worcestershire Yeomanry Cavalry. He married, first, April 24, 1851, Selina Constance, eldest daughter of Mr. Hubert De Burgh, of West Drayton, which lady died Nov. 14 following; and secondly, Nov. 21, 1865, Georgiana Elizabeth, third daughter of Sir Thomas Moncreiffe, Bart., of Moncreiffe, by whom he leaves six sons and one daughter. The eldest son, William Humble, Viscount Ednam, born May 25, 1867, is now second Earl of Dudley and twelfth Lord Ward.

SIR WATKIN WILLIAMS-WYNN, BART.

Sir Watkin Williams-Wynn, sixth Baronet, of Wynnstay, in the county of Denbigh, M.P. for that county, Hon. Colonel Montgomeryshire Yeomanry Cavalry, Deputy Lieutenant of the counties of Denbigh, Salop, Merioneth, and Montgomery, Provincial Grand Master of the North Wales and Shropshire Freemasons, A.D.C. to her Majesty, and Lieutenant-Colonel Royal Denbigh Rifle Volunteers, died on the 9th inst. To all the honours just enumerated one other may be added. In the estimation of true Cambrians he was considered their own "Prince of Wales." The ancient family he represented, the vast estates he inherited, placed him facile princeps in the landed aristocracy of the Principality. Sir Watkin was born May 22, 1820, the elder son of Sir Watkin Williams-Wynn, fifth Baronet, Lord Lieutenant of Merionethshire, by Lady Henrietta Antonia, his wife, eldest daughter of the first Earl of Powis, and received his education at Westminster, and at Christ Church, Oxford. Early in life he held a commission in the 1st Life Guards. He succeeded his father Jan. 6, 1840, and the year after was chosen the Conservative M.P. for Denbighshire, which county he continued to represent up to the period of his decease. He married, April 28, 1852, his cousin, Mary Emily, youngest daughter of the Right Hon. Sir Henry Watkin Williams-Wynn, G.C.B., and had two daughters: the younger, Mary Emily Nesta, died unmarried, in 1883; the elder, Louisa Alexandra, for whom the Queen of Denmark and the Princess of Wales were sponsors, married, Aug. 26, 1884, Herbert Lloyd Watkin Williams-Wynn, nephew of Sir Watkin, whose title and estates he now inherits, becoming the seventh Baronet of Wynnstay.

SIR J. R. REID, BART.

Sir John Rae Reid, third Baronet, of Ewell Grove, Surrey, died on the 7th inst., at 53, Victoria-street, Westminster, aged forty-three. He was eldest son of Sir John Rae Reid, second Baronet, and grandson of Thomas Reid, of Ewell Grove, an eminent merchant of London, and for some time Chairman of the East India Directors, who was created a Baronet, Nov. 10, 1823. Sir John, whose death we record, was formerly Captain, 16th Foot, and succeeded to the title at the death of his father, July 30, 1867. He never married, and the baronetcy devolves on his brother, now Sir Henry Valentine Rae Reid, fourth Baronet, born Feb. 13, 1845.

SIR ARTHUR PERCY AYLMER, BART.

Sir Arthur Percy Aylmer, twelfth Baronet, of Donadea, J.P., M.A., whose death is announced, held the title for two months only, having inherited it at the untimely death of his grandnephew, the late Sir Justin Gerald Aylmer, in March last. He was born in 1801, the second son of Sir Fenton, the eighth Baronet, by Jane Grace, his wife, sister of the sixth Lord Carbery; was married, in 1833, to Martha, daughter of Mr. Richard Reynell, of Killynon, Westmeath, and had several children. His eldest son, Captain Fenton John Aylmer, died, vita patris, April 9, 1852, leaving (with other issue) his eldest son and heir, who succeeds his grandfather, and is now Sir Arthur Percy Fitzgerald Aylmer, thirteenth Baronet. He was born in 1858, and married, in 1878, Annie, daughter of Mr. John Sanger.

THE HON. E. T. YORKE.

The Hon. Eliot Thomas Yorke, M.A., J.P. and D.L., for many years M.P. for Cambridgeshire, died on the 3rd inst. He was born April 29, 1805, the third son of Vice-Admiral Sir Joseph Sydney Yorke, K.C.B., M.P., and was consequently brother of Charles Philip, fourth and late Earl of Hardwicke. He received his education at Harrow and St. John's College, Cambridge, and was called to the Bar in 1832. From 1834 to 1865 he sat as M.P. for Cambridgeshire, on the Conservative side. In 1836 he was granted the precedence of an Earl's younger son. Mr. Eliot Yorke married, Jan. 31, 1833, Emily Anne Milicent, only daughter of Mr. Delmé-Radcliffe, of Hitchin Priory, Herts.

MR. CHAINE, M.P.

Mr. James Chaine, of Ballycraigy, county Antrim, M.P. for that county, died on the 4th inst., after a brief illness. He was born in 1841, the eldest son of the late Mr. James Chaine, of Ballycraigy, and was married, in 1863, to Henrietta, daughter of Mr. Charles A. Creery. In 1874 he was elected Conservative M.P. for the county of Antrim. The previous year he served as High Sheriff of that county, of which he was a magistrate and Deputy Lieutenant.

MR. WILBRAHAM, OF DELAMERE.

Mr. George Fortescue Wilbraham, of Delamere House, Cheshire, J.P., died on the 27th ult., aged sixty-nine. He was eldest son of the late Mr. George Wilbraham, of Delamere, M.P. for South Cheshire, by Lady Anne, his wife, daughter of Hugh, first Earl Fortescue, K.G.; was educated at Harrow, and at Trinity College, Cambridge, and was called to the Bar in 1843. He succeeded to his estate at the death of his father, in 1852, and served as High Sheriff of Cheshire in 1858. Mr. Wilbraham, of Delamere, was heir male of the great and influential Cheshire family, of which the Earl of Lathom represents a branch.

We have also to record the deaths of—

Captain John Harvey Boteler, R.N., at St. Leonards, in his ninetieth year. His entrance into the Navy dates from 1808.

The Rev. John Patrick Eden, Hon. Canon of Durham and Rector of Sedgefield, on the 5th inst., aged seventy-one.

Lady Mary Catherine Lindsay, wife of Mr. George Hayward Lindsay, of Glasnevin House, Dublin, and sister of the late Earl of Arran, K.P., on the 24th ult., aged eighty-two.

The Rev. George Currey, Master of the Charterhouse and Prebendary of St. Paul's, on the 30th ult., at the Master's Lodge, Charterhouse, aged sixty-nine.

Mr. William Scrope Ayrton, of Saltburn-by-Sea, Yorkshire, barrister-at-law, J.P., formerly a Commissioner of Bankruptcy in the Leeds District, aged eighty-one.

The Rev. Dr. Rees, President of the Congregational Union of England and Wales, and author of the "History of Nonconformity in Wales," as well as compiler of a Welsh Bible, at Swansea, on the 29th ult., aged seventy.

Mr. William Hawes, treasurer of the Royal Humane Society, five times chairman of the Council of the Society of Arts, and a Commissioner of the Exhibition of 1862, recently, at the age of eighty.

Mrs. Mary Lofthouse, a member of the Royal Water-Colour Society, and an artist of much promise, on the 2nd inst., aged thirty-one. She was only daughter of Mr. T. W. B. Forster, of Holt Manor, Wilts, and wife of S. H. S. Lofthouse, barrister-at-law.

The Rev. John E. Lance, Rector of Buckland St. Mary, near Chard, at the advanced age of ninety-one years. He graduated at Cambridge in 1817, and held the above benefice for fifty-five years, and a prebendal stall in Wells Cathedral for over forty-four years.

Mrs. De Frevillè, widow of Mr. Edward Humphreys Greene De Frevillè, of Hinxton Hall, Cambridge. She was the daughter of Major Francis and Lady Louisa Forester, grand-daughter of the late William Harry, Duke of Cleveland, and niece of the present Duke.

General Corbet Cotton, Colonel 1st Battalion Royal Munster Fusiliers, on the 30th ult., aged seventy-six. He was second son of the late General Sir Willoughby Cotton, G.C.B., by Lady Augusta Maria, his wife, daughter of the seventh Earl of Coventry, and was married, in 1847, to Christina Augusta, daughter of Sir Charles Des Vœux, Bart.

Mr. Brinley Richards, the musician, composer of the melody so familiar and so popular, "God Bless the Prince of Wales," recently heard in all parts of Ireland. By birth and parentage a Welshman, Mr. Richards compiled and edited a collection of Welsh songs. At the time of his death he was in his sixty-seventh year.

Mrs. Arthur Knox, at Ramsgate, on the 24th ult. She was the youngest and only surviving daughter of the late Right Hon. Denis Daly, M.P., of Dunsandle, in the county of Galway, and Lady Harriet Daly. Mrs. Knox was sister to the late Lord Dunsandle, and to the Rev. Robert Daly, Rector of Powerscourt, afterwards Bishop of Cashel.

Mr. Borlase Adams, of Bedford-square, somewhat suddenly, on the 29th ult. He was the second son of the late Dr. William Adams, of Doctors'-commons, by the Hon. Mary Anne, daughter of the Hon. William Cockayne, who predeceased his brother, Borlase, sixth and last Viscount Cullen. Mr. Adams was called to the Bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1843, but retired from practice many years since. He was appointed a magistrate for Middlesex in 1859, and took an active part in all local matters.

The Archbishop of Canterbury opened on the 7th inst. the All Saints' Boys' Orphanage, erected on Morden-hill, Lewisham, the foundation-stone of which was laid last year by Princess Christian. The object of the orphanage is to train up boys, who are admitted without the cost of election, to useful employments, whilst boys who are in situations may use it as a lodging.

Designers for all classes of needle-point lace, cut cambric, and linen crochet work, &c., are invited to compete for prizes, amounting in value to £73 10s., which are offered with the view of obtaining designs which may be distributed to and executed by Irish lacemakers. Designs must be submitted for competition on or before July 15, 1885. They should be addressed to Mr. Alan S. Cole, Hon. Treasurer, Irish Lace Prize Fund, South Kensington Museum.

Mrs. Weldon's action against M. Gounod came, on the 7th inst., before Under-Sheriff Burchell and a special jury to assess damages, judgment having been allowed to go by default. The action was brought for libel, slander, breach of contract, and assault. Mrs. Weldon was brought up from Holloway Prison, and gave evidence in support of her case. Counsel for the defendant admitted a claim of £1640 for board and lodging and the performance of secretarial duties, and beyond this the jury awarded Mrs. Weldon £10,000 damages.

The Marquis of Ripon has made a considerable reduction in the rents of the farmers on his estates from April 6 last, and has also decided, to further relieve his tenants by paying half their rates.—Lord Rosebery has again remitted 15 per cent of the rents due at Lady Day from the tenants on his Hoggeston estate, at Mentmore.—The Duke of Richmond and Gordon has intimated to his agricultural tenants that, with a view to relieving or mitigating the distress which pressed upon them, he had determined to remit 10 per cent of their rent for five years, beginning with Whitsuntide.

The committee of the Royal Humane Society has awarded its silver medal to Sergeant H. Brace, Royal Irish Constabulary, for saving the life of a child named Buckley, in the river Suir, Cahir, on the 12th ult. Mr. F. G. Day, a member of the London Scottish Rifles, is awarded the bronze medal for plunging from the Embankment, near the Temple stairs, into the Thames, on the 28th ult., and saving a child; and a similar reward has been conferred upon Ram Sarup, constable in the Jullunder district, for saving a native boy in a weir in the Punjaub. Testimonials have also been conferred upon M. Neylan and a boy named Fisher for saving life from drowning.

The eighty-first annual meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society was held at Exeter Hall on the 6th inst., under the presidency of the Earl of Shaftesbury. The report set forth that the year had been one of financial surprises and deliverances. Their liabilities of £231,000 had been met, and they still had a balance. There had been a circulation, the wide world over, of 4,000,000 copies of the Bible, which was 250,000 beyond the highest figures ever reached before. The venerable chairman has been laid up for nearly twelve months, and this was the first public duty he has been able to perform since his illness.

THE COURT.

The Queen, who enjoys good health, takes walking and driving exercise nearly every day, being generally accompanied by Princess Beatrice. Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein dined with her Majesty on the 6th inst.; and the Marquis of Hartington, General the Right Hon. Sir Henry Ponsonby, the Very Rev. R. Davidson, Dean of Windsor, and Colonel C. M. Stockwell, C.B., commanding 1st Battalion Seaforth Highlanders, had the honour of being included in the Royal dinner party. The Queen and Princess Beatrice visited the Empress Eugénie, at Farnborough, on the 7th inst. On Friday, the 8th inst., Princess Louise, Marchioness of Lorne, arrived at the castle. The Regent of Kolapore was presented to her Majesty by the Earl of Kimberley, Secretary of State for India. The Duke and Duchess of Wellington and Lord and Lady Carrington had the honour of dining with her Majesty. The Duchess was presented to the Queen by the Dowager Duchess of Athole, before dinner. The Hon. Mrs. Legge also arrived at the castle. Last Saturday the Princess of Wales, with Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud of Wales, visited her Majesty, and remained to luncheon. The Queen, accompanied by Princess Beatrice, drove down to Frogmore in the afternoon, where the Prince of Wales, accompanied by Prince George, met her Majesty. Princess Louise (Marchioness of Lorne) left the castle at six o'clock for London. Prince and Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein dined with the Queen. The Hon. Mrs. Legge had the honour of being invited. The Queen and Princess Beatrice and the members of her Majesty's household attended Divine service in the private chapel on Sunday morning, the Very Rev. Randall Davidson, Dean of Windsor, officiating. Prince Henry of Battenberg arrived in the evening at Windsor Castle from Germany, on a visit to the Queen and Princess Beatrice. On Monday afternoon the Queen drove out, accompanied by Princess Beatrice and Prince Henry of Battenberg. The Marquis and Marchioness of Salisbury and the Marquis and Marchioness of Ormonde arrived at the Castle in the evening and had the honour of dining with her Majesty. The Hon. Mrs. Legge and General the Right Hon. Sir Henry Ponsonby were also invited. The Queen, Princess Beatrice, and Prince Henry of Battenberg went out on Tuesday morning. Shortly before four o'clock the Queen, accompanied by Princess Beatrice, Prince Henry of Battenberg, and Princess Margaret and Prince Arthur of Connaught, left Windsor Castle and arrived at Buckingham Palace at a quarter before five o'clock. Her Majesty travelled by special train on the Great Western Railway to Paddington, and drove thence to Buckingham Palace escorted by a detachment of the Royal Horse Guards. The Duchess of Roxburghe, Mistress of the Robes; Earl Sydney, Lord Steward of the Household; the Earl of Kenmare, Lord Chamberlain; and the Duke of Westminster, Master of the Horse, presented Princess Beatrice, on behalf of the Queen's Household, with a set of silver candelabra on the occasion of the coming marriage of her Royal Highness and Prince Henry of Battenberg. On Wednesday the Queen held a Drawing-room at Buckingham Palace; and her Majesty and Princess Beatrice were to proceed on Thursday to Netley Hospital, for the purpose of visiting the sick and wounded.

We are authorised to state that the Drawingroom announced for Monday next, the 18th inst., will be held by the Princess of Wales on behalf of her Majesty.

According to present arrangements, her Majesty and Princess Beatrice are expected to leave Windsor Castle on or about the 21st inst. for Balmoral.

The Prince and Princess of Wales were present at a ball given by the Marquis and Marchioness of Abergavenny at their family residence in Dover-street on Friday, the 8th inst. A distinguished company assembled to meet their Royal Highnesses. On Saturday the Prince presided at the annual meeting of the Royal Yacht Squadron, at which seven new members and eight honorary members were elected. The Princess left London in the morning on a visit to the Queen at Windsor, and lunched with her Majesty. Later in the day, the Prince of Wales, accompanied by Prince George, went to Windsor, and, after a short visit to her Majesty, drove to Cumberland Lodge and visited Prince and Princess Christian. Their Royal Highnesses returned to London in the evening and attended the performance at Drury-Lane Theatre. On Sunday the Prince and Princess, Prince George, and Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud, attended Divine service. On Monday, by command of the Queen, his Royal Highness held a Levée at St. James's Palace, which was numerously attended, the presentations numbering about 280. The Prince was present in the House of Lords on Monday during the speech of the Duke of Argyll on the subject of Russian policy in Central Asia. Their Royal Highnesses witnessed the performance of "Manon" at Drury-Lane Theatre on Saturday night; and, accompanied by the Princess Louise of Wales, visited the Savoy Theatre on Monday evening. Prince Albert Victor paid a visit on Monday afternoon to the Children's Convalescent Home, Yarmouth. The Prince and Princess of Wales have signified their intention of attending the performances of the open-air plays which will be given at Coombe House on May 28, 29, and 30, June 29 and 30, and July 1.

The Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh were present at the Court Theatre last Saturday evening. His Royal Highness was at the House of Lords on Monday. He has arranged to take the chair at a dinner to be held on behalf of the Royal Albert Orphan Asylum, at the Cannon-street Hotel, on June 12.

Princess Christian opened a bazaar in the Poplar Townhall, on Monday afternoon, in aid of St. Saviour's Mission, and afterwards visited three of the local hospitals. At every point her Royal Highness received a cordial welcome.

A Simla telegram states that two months' leave of absence has been granted to the Duke of Connaught.

The Duke of Cambridge had a dinner party at Gloucester House, Park-lane, last Saturday evening.

A Select Committee of the House of Lords has authorised the promoters to proceed with a bill authorising the Marquis of Bute to sell his docks at Cardiff to the Taff Vale Railway Company for £3,200,000, subject to the granting of running powers to another local company. Counsel for the promoters protested against this stipulation.

The steam-ship Arawa, of the Shaw, Savill, and Albion Company's Line, has made an extraordinarily quick run to New Zealand. She left Plymouth on the afternoon of March 28, called at the Cape of Good Hope and Hobart, and reached New Zealand on May 7, thus performing the passage from England to New Zealand in forty days, including all stoppages and excluding any allowance for difference of longitude.

Lady Grant on Monday opened a Fancy Sale in the Kensington Townhall, held for the purpose of assisting to defray the expenses incurred in building a new wing to the Royal School for Daughters of Officers of the Army, at Lansdown, Bath. Princess Louise, accompanied by the Marquis of Lorne, visited the hall in the afternoon and made purchases at every stall. The bazaar remained open the two following days.

MR. ALEXANDER CONDIE STEPHEN, C.B., C.M.G.,
ASSISTANT BRITISH AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSIONER.

THE CANADIANS ON THE NILE.

Captain Egerton A. Denison, of the 4th battalion South Staffordshire Regiment, who has been serving since last September as one of the officers of the Canadian voyageurs employed on the Nile, is the eighth son of the late Colonel George T. Denison, of Rusholme, Toronto, Canada, and of his wife, a daughter of the late Major Dewson, 15th Regiment. He was educated at the College of Upper Canada, Toronto, and at the Royal Military College, Kingston, Ontario. In February, 1881, he entered the 1st Staffordshire Militia as Second Lieutenant, and obtained a captaincy in January, 1884. Captain Denison is brother to Lieutenant-Colonel George T. Denison, commanding the Governor-General's body-guard in Canada, and to Lieutenant-Colonel Fred. C. Denison, commanding the Canadian voyageurs on the Nile. It was owing to Colonel Denison being ill in Cairo, with enteric fever, that Captain Denison had to take command of the Canadian voyageurs, who were recently in London.

OFFICERS KILLED IN THE SOUDAN.

Major James Mandeville Wood Von Beverhoudt, youngest son of Major Adam Von Beverhoudt, formerly of the 58th Rutlandshire Regiment, was born in March, 1844. He passed out of Sandhurst, and was gazetted Ensign in the 90th Regiment in 1864. A few years afterwards (1869), he entered the Bengal Staff Corps, and was appointed to the 17th Bengal Native Infantry, in which he served, generally on its staff, until his death. He was promoted to the rank of Captain in 1876, and served with his regiment through the Afghan campaign. On his return to Bengal, and whilst the 17th were quartered at Calcutta, he was attached to the staff of the Commander-in-Chief as Deputy Assistant Adjutant-General. In 1881 he was gazetted to the rank of Major; and, on his regiment being selected to form one of the Indian Contingent for service at Suakim, he was, in consequence of Colonel Thompson, the Commandant, having been invalided, placed in command of the regiment. He was killed in the surprise of General McNeill's force on March 22, whilst gallantly attempting to rally his regiment, broken and disordered by the sudden onslaught of the enemy, and the stampede of the baggage mules and camels. He was an excellent and zealous officer, devoted to his profession, and a general favourite in his regiment. His brother, Augustus Von Beverhoudt, a Lieutenant in the 38th Regiment, died in India in 1866.

Lieutenant James B. Richardson, of the 5th Lancers (Royal Irish), was the eldest son of D. Richardson, Esq., of Hartfield, Renfrewshire. He received his education at Elstree, at Harrow, where he was head boy of his house, and at University College, Oxford, from which he entered the Royal Military College at Sandhurst as University candidate at the top of the list. He was a good linguist, and had learnt Russian with a view to usefulness in his profession. He was twenty-three years old at the time of his supposed death, upon the occasion of the conflict near Souakim on March 22, when Lieutenant Richardson, with three or four men, was sent out of the camp on some particular duty, and has since been missing; only his saddle and a whistle belonging to him were found.

MAJOR J. M. W. VON BEVERHOUDT, 17TH BENGAL N.I., KILLED IN THE SOUDAN.

THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

We give the Portraits of two gentlemen belonging to Sir Peter Lumsden's Commission for the survey and definition of the Afghan frontier, whose names have recently been much spoken of in the discussions here upon the subject of dispute between the British and Russian Governments. Captain Yate was the only British officer who witnessed the affray on March 30, at Pul-i-Khisti, between General Komaroff's troops and the Afghan garrison of Ak Tapa and Penjdeh; and Mr. Condie Stephen has arrived this week in London to give information to her Majesty's Government concerning the work of the Commission, which now gives place to the negotiations for a final settlement in London.

CAPTAIN EGERTON A. DENISON,
SOUTH STAFFORDSHIRE REGIMENT,
COMMANDING CANADIAN VOYAGEURS ON THE NILE.

Mr. Alexander Condie Stephen, C.B., C.M.G., is one of the Assistant Commissioners with Sir Peter Lumsden on the Afghan Boundary. He is the son of Mr. Oscar Leslie Stephen, and was educated at Rugby; he was nominated Attaché to the Diplomatic Service in 1876, being appointed to the Embassy of St. Petersburg. In 1879, he was transferred to Constantinople, having previously passed an examination in Public Law. He was acting Consul-General in Eastern Roumelia from 1880 till 1881. He was made a Companion of the Order of St. Michael and St. George, and was promoted to be a second secretary to her Majesty's Legation at Teheran, from which he was sent on a special mission, in the winter of 1883-4, to inquire into the condition of the border districts of Khorassan and the Persian frontier, in the prosecution of which task he travelled along the line of the Heri-Rud, making at the same time a survey of that river. It was his knowledge of the region acquired at that time, as well as his knowledge of the Russian language, which led to his being chosen to act as one of the Commissioners in the delimitation of the Afghan Frontier. For his services on the mission of 1883-4 he was made a Companion of the Bath. Mr. Condie Stephen has made a most rapid journey from the Afghan frontier, bearing papers and maps sent home by Sir Peter Lumsden, the Chief Commissioner.

Captain A. C. Yate is the eldest son of the late Rev. Charles Yate, Rector of Holme, Yorkshire, and formerly Fellow and Tutor of St. John's College, Cambridge. Captain Yate first entered the 49th Regiment, but was, in September, 1876, appointed to the Bombay Staff Corps. He was with Sir Frederick Roberts during the Afghan campaign of 1879. Before his appointment on the Afghan Boundary Commission, he was Political Assistant at Sehor.

The statements of Ministers in Parliament on Monday last, with respect to the settlement of the dispute with Russia, show that the Afghan frontier question is in a fair way of being disposed of by direct negotiations between the Cabinets of London and St. Petersburg. Earl Granville and Lord Kimberley have examined the topographical details in a conference with M. Lessar, the special agent of the Russian Government, and have substantially agreed with him in a "delimitation" which is perfectly satisfactory to the British Government, to Lord Dufferin and the Council of India, and to the Ameer of Afghanistan. It only now awaits the conclusive acceptance of the Russian Government. The question of responsibility for any departure from the agreement of March 16, with regard to the positions that were allowed to be occupied by General Komaroff's troops, and for the circumstances that occasioned the conflict between them and the Afghans at Pul-i-Khisti on March 30, is to be referred to the arbitration of a friendly Sovereign, probably the King of Denmark. The British Commissioner for the Afghan Boundary, General Sir Peter Lumsden, was at Meshed a few days ago, on his way home, and will arrive in England early in June.

CAPTAIN YATE, BOMBAY STAFF CORPS,
ON THE STAFF OF THE BRITISH AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

Our Special Artist, Mr. William Simpson, whose Sketches and accurate descriptions of all important localities in the disputed territory of Badghis, on the Heri-Rud, the Kushk, and the Murghab rivers, have been highly appreciated and made useful at the India Office, the Foreign Office, and the War Office, writes as follows concerning the Nialsheni Pass:—

"South of the Zulfagar Pass, and also on the right bank of the Heri-Rud, is the Nialsheni Pass; but the character of the latter is altogether different from that of the former. It has not the natural grandeur or the military importance of the other. The geological character is entirely different. The Nialsheni Pass lies among a range of low sandhills, which are bare and yellow; the sand is hardened into solidity, but the rain has worn the sides into innumerable grooves, so that they have the appearance of having been crimped or goffered. The Heri-Rud, of which a glimpse can be seen on the left of the Sketch, passes through these hills on its way to Sarakhs and the Desert. The Sketch is taken from a point on the right bank of that river, looking north, and not far from where the Jam-Rud flows into the Heri-Rud. The Nialsheni Pass is about half-way between Sarakhs and Herat; and from it to the last-mentioned place there is nothing but an undulating plain along the whole distance. The high hills seen in this Illustration are on the left bank of the river, and are within the Persian Frontier; the name of the snowy peak was given to me as Band-i-Kwojah Tagloh; but it may be mentioned that names of places are very uncertain in these regions; one man will give you a name which he knows it by, derived from some pass, shrine, or village to which he belongs. But when you travel along, another man, who knows the same hill or range, will give you an entirely new name, which he has been accustomed to use, derived from some other village, spring, or perhaps a caravanserai, or a prominent point near to the hill."

Mr. Simpson's letter published last week contained a notice of the Afghan General, Ghous-ud-din Khan, commanding the garrison of the Ameer's troops at Ak Tapa and Penjdeh, whose disastrous encounter with the Russians on March 30, after our Special Artist had left the country, gave occasion to so much alarm and indignation at what seemed to be an unprovoked attack on the part of General Komaroff. The Sketch of General Ghous-ud-din with some of his soldiers, now presented on our front page, has still considerable interest. The official paper at St. Petersburg this week publishes a long report from General Komaroff, in which the Russian General gives a detailed account of the recent proceedings on the Afghan frontier. The General reiterates his assertion of the aggressive attitude taken up by the Afghans, and enumerates a series of successive provocations which he declares the Afghans offered to the Russians before the battle on the Kushk. The General repeats the story told in his former despatches. He says that on March 17 the left bank of the river was occupied by the Russian forces; the Afghans had only sentinels. It is not true that a detachment of Afghans was cut off. On March 18 the Afghans opened fire first, for General Komaroff had himself forbidden Colonel Alikhanoff to make an attack, or even to reply to a fusillade, unless he received special orders to do so. General Komaroff states that he received a letter from Captain Yate requesting him to afford protection to the English; but on Colonel Zakrejevski subsequently meeting Captain Yate behind Penjdeh, the English officer withdrew his request, and declined to receive Russian protection for Englishmen. General Komaroff states that he has refused the request of the residents of Penjdeh and of the Turkomans and others for incorporation in the Russian Empire.

An Indian telegram from Simla, where the Viceroy now is, states that Colonel Stewart and one other British officer will proceed to Herat to advise the Ameer concerning the fortifications of that city. On the Russian side, we learn that draught statutes for the formation of an Amoo Daria Steam-Ship Company have been submitted to the Council of the Empire. General Annenkoff has left St. Petersburg for the Transcaspian provinces, in order to supervise the construction of the railway lines decided upon in that region.

The opening of a new Roman Catholic church, in the presence of Cardinal Manning and a large congregation, took place on the 6th inst. at East Dulwich. The church, which is a large and handsomely-designed structure, is situated in Lordship-lane, and is erected in connection with the monastery of the Capuchin Friars at the same place.

THE CHURCH.

The Archbishop of Canterbury's primary visitation will be held about the middle of October, and not in September, as previously announced. His Grace has consented to become a patron of the Church Parochial Mission Society.

The Bishop of London will hold his first ordination in St. Paul's Cathedral on the last Sunday of the present month. His Lordship has consented to become a patron of the London Church Choir Association. Dr. Temple, last Saturday afternoon, consecrated All Saints' Church, Dalmeny-road.

Dr. Bickersteth, the new Bishop of Exeter, was on Monday enthroned in the cathedral church of the diocese.

The enthronement of Dr. King, the new Bishop of Lincoln, has been fixed to take place in Lincoln Cathedral on the 20th inst.; and the consecration of the Rev. W. T. Thornhill Webber, for the See of Brisbane, has been fixed for St. Barnabas's Day (June 11).

The Bishop of Winchester has appointed his youngest son, the Rev. T. G. Browne, Vicar of Tilford, Farnham, Surrey, to the Vicarage of Fareham, Hants. The living is valued at £530 per annum, with house, and four acres of glebe.

The parishioners of Holy Sepulchre, Cambridge, are singular in having the right of appointing their own Vicar, and, there being a vacancy, there was a meeting in the vestry on the 7th inst., when the choice fell on the Rev. Stewart Gordon Ponsonby, M.A., one of the chaplains of Trinity College.

The Council of the Church Penitentiary Association has made grants amounting in all to £500 to Homes at Plymouth, Basingstoke, Carlisle, Salisbury, Paddington, Wantage, Ditchingham, Norwich, Malvern Link, Worcester, Lostwithiel, and Bovey Tracey.

In the presence of a distinguished company, Mr. Russell Lowell, the American Minister, unveiled a bust of the poet Coleridge, which has been placed in Westminster Abbey, at the cost of the late Dr. Mercer, of Rhode Island. The preliminary proceedings were held in the Chapter-House, Mr. Lowell reading an elegant and critical eulogy on the poet; while Dean Bradley, Lord Houghton, Archdeacon Farrar, Sir Francis Doyle, and the Lord Chief Justice offered appropriate remarks. The bust is in white marble, and bears the inscription, "Samuel Taylor Coleridge"; the sculptor being Mr. Thorneycroft, R.A.

A handsome stained-glass window, from the studio of Messrs. Warrington and Co., of Fitzroy-square, has been placed in St. Mary's Church, Blairgowrie.—A handsome window, executed by Heaton, Butler, and Bayne, has just been placed in Fawley church, Henley-on-Thames. It was presented by the late Dr. Almack in memory of his son, Lieutenant Almack, of H.M.S. Briton, killed while in command of part of the Naval Brigade in Egypt early in 1884. It bears an appropriate inscription, and texts.—A Munich window, by Messrs. Mayer and Co., representing Charity, has been placed in the south transept of St. Peter's Church, Cranley-gardens, Kensington, the gift of C. Dalrymple, Esq., M.P., the inscription at the foot recording the fact that it has been placed "To the memory of Alice Mary Dalrymple."

THE RAWUL PINDI DURBAR.

Our Military Correspondent, Lieutenant Offley Shore, of the 3rd Punjaub Infantry, sends further Sketches, of a rather humorous character, illustrating the uncomfortable experiences of some of his comrades encamped, in very stormy weather, on the plain outside Rawul Pindi in the first week of April; and representing also, in their most grotesque aspect, a few types of the unpolished Afghan soldiery forming the escort of the Ameer Abdurrahman when he came from Cabul. These men are partly Afghans, partly Usbecks and other natives of Afghan Turkestan; their attire and equipment, except that of the body-guard of his Highness, seemed very irregular and slovenly. The cavalry uniforms are red and blue, with long boots; the Guardsmen wear a long blue tunic, with tippet hung down the back, and sheepskin busbies. The infantry are armed with cutlasses instead of bayonets.

Mr. Cornelius Marshall Warmington, Q.C., of the Chancery bar, has been elected a Bencher of the Hon. Society of the Middle Temple.

The first report of the Royal Commission on the Housing of the Working Classes has been issued, and deals in considerable detail with this important question.

Rear-Admiral Sir F. W. Richards has been appointed to the post of Commander-in-Chief on the East Indies station, in the room of Vice-Admiral Sir W. N. Hewett.

For the past month the Board of Trade returns show a considerable improvement in imports, but a continued falling off in exports.

On the 7th inst. the Duke of Cambridge visited Aldershott and inspected the Royal Tower Hamlets and the Royal Westminster Militia regiments, which had been embodied there for the past two months, and also two squadrons of the 20th Hussars, which are expected to be shortly sent abroad.

Sir Algernon Borthwick will preside at a complimentary dinner at which Mr. Edmund Yates is to be entertained at the Criterion on the 30th inst. A list of over a hundred stewards is announced, and considerably more than 300 guests have already taken tickets, so that the accommodation of the largest dining-room at the Criterion will be severely taxed.

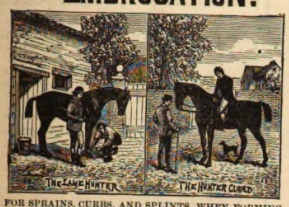
VALUABLE DISCOVERY for the HAIR. If your hair is turning grey, or white, or falling off, use "The Mexican Hair Renewer," for it will positively restore in every case Grey or White Hair to its original colour, without leaving the disagreeable smell of most "Restorers." It makes the hair charmingly beautiful, as well as promoting the growth of the hair on bald spots, where the glands are not decayed. "The Mexican Hair Renewer" is sold by Chemists and Perfumers everywhere, at 3s. 6d. per Bottle.



FLORILINE. For the Teeth and Breath. Is the best Liquid Dentifrice in the world; it thoroughly cleanses partially-decayed teeth from all parasites or living animalculæ, leaving them pearly white, imparting a delightful fragrance to the breath. The Fragrant Floriline removes instantly all odours arising from a foul stomach or tobacco smoke; being partly composed of honey, soda, and extracts of sweet herbs and plants, it is perfectly delicious to the taste, and as harmless as sherry. Sold by Chemists and Perfumers everywhere, at 2s. 6d. per Bottle.

PERRY and CO.'S
TYPE-WRITER, "HAMMONIA."
£4 4s. each.

IT IS QUITE NEW IN CONSTRUCTION AND POSSESSES MANY QUALITIES WHICH RECOMMEND IT—VIZ.:
SPEED.—It is very easy to work, and with but very little trouble and practice more work can be done with it than a pen in the same time; whilst the advantage of distinctness over handwriting is indisputable.
DISTINCTNESS.—This machine produces more distinct writing than any yet introduced; it cannot blot or smudge.
COPIES CAN BE TAKEN.—One of the most striking advantages of this machine over all others is, that as many as twelve clear copies can be taken at the same by means of carbon paper. This is of immense importance, especially to commercial men.
PORTABILITY.—It is most important that a type-writer should be as portable as possible. The "Hammonia" being very small, and weighing only 14 lb., is all that can be desired in this respect.
PRICE.—The reason that type-writers are not more generally used is that they are too expensive. The "Hammonia" is only £4 4s., and therefore within the reach of all.
Sold by all Stationers. Country Agents Wanted.

MON AMOUR WALTZ. By P. BUCALOSSI.
The "Queen" says:—"Mon Amour Waltz' and 'P. and O. Polka,' by P. Bucalossi. These pieces, both waltz and polka, will be very acceptable in the ball-room. The waltz is singularly tuneful and the polka quite brilliant; both happily illustrated."

PHYLLIS WALTZ. By P. BUCALOSSI.

MERRY FOOTSTEPS POLKA. By P. BUCALOSSI.

BLACK AND TAN POLKA. By CAROLINE LOWTHIAN.

FAHRWOHL WALTZ. By CAROLINE LOWTHIAN.
"Truth" says:—"'The Black and Tan,' by Caroline Lowthian, is perfectly enchanting; I did not think a polka could be made so absolutely tempting to the feet; but this one is so full of spirit and 'go' that I don't think I could resist it. . . . The 'Fahrwohl Valse' is another excellent composition by Caroline Lowthian."
The "Daily Telegraph" says:—"Miss Caroline Lowthian's 'Fahrwohl' will supply strains free and flowing. . . . Yet the fun best in the music of 'Black and Tan' (C. Lowthian) may lead others to prefer it."

THE CLAIRE WALTZ. By LEONARD GAUTIER.
"Truth" says:—"You will also like the 'Claire Waltzes,' so full of melody are they and so good to dance to. The composer is Leonard Gautier."

LE ZEPHYR POLKA. By G. DELBRÜCK.
The "Daily Telegraph" says:—"For several reasons Delbrück's polka 'Le Zephyr' will be selected by those engaging in that characteristic dance."

LES GRENOUILLES (FROGS) POLKA. ALFRED DELBRÜCK.

SOUVENIRS ADORÉS WALTZ. G. DELBRUCK.

PULVERMACHER'S WORLD-FAMED GALVANIC APPLIANCES for the cure of Nervous Diseases, have received testimonials from three Physicians to HER MAJESTY the QUEEN, and twenty-two members of the Royal College of Physicians of London.
MR. J. COLLINS writes:—
"7, Musicy-lane, Ware, Herts, "May 5, 1885.
"Dear Sir,—I have great pleasure in adding my testimony to the excellence of your Galvanic Belt for my complaint, indigestion. It has indeed worked wonders in me, and I have only had it a few months. Your Belt has restored life and vigour to my system, and has made life a pleasure for me. If you hear from anyone from this part of the country refer them to me, and I hope to forward you an order for another Belt in a week or two for a friend."
Mr. C. H. Wood writes:—
"General Stores Office, New-cross, S.E., "April 27, 1885.
"Gentlemen,—Having suffered for a long time with great nervous depression and debility, and, having tried medicines of various kinds without effect, I purchased your Galvanic Belt, and used it for about three months. The result has been most successful and really wonderful. I have fully regained my previous vitality, and find myself thoroughly cured. I shall recommend your Bands whenever occasion offers."

THE LAKES OF KILLARNEY.

An account of the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales, and their eldest son, on the 17th and 18th ult., to this romantic district of south-western Ireland, was given in our Journal a fortnight ago. The series of Views now presented, occupying four pages of this week's publication, will be of more than occasional interest to many readers. The three lakes, the Upper, the Middle Lake, between the Torc Mountain and the Muckross peninsula, and the Lower Lake, which is by far the largest, discharging their combined waters by the river Laune, lie in the heart of a region of picturesque scenery hardly surpassed by any in the British Islands. The banks of Muckross and of the Lower Lake, as far as Killarney House, are beautifully wooded, and with the Torc and Mangerton, on one side, and the Toomies and Purple Mountain on the other, divided from the Macgillicuddy Reeks by the Gap of Dunloe, there is a background of grand features in the landscape from many favourite points of view. The Upper Lake, which has an approach to sublimity of character, is connected with the Muckross Torc, or Middle Lake, by a winding channel that spreads at the "Long Range" to ample width, and here is a lofty rocky cliff, the "Eagle's Nest," frequently enlivened by music prepared for the pleasure of tourist parties. Descending by the "Canal" below, they pass the "Meeting of the Waters," at the west end of the Middle Lake. On the left bank is Glena Cottage, in the centre of this land of enchantment, just opposite Brickeen island and the charming peninsular pleasure-ground attached to Muckross, the property of Mr. Herbert. The Torc mountain, 1764 ft. high, towers above the southern shore of the Middle Lake, and the mountain stream forms a cascade in the woodland recesses at its eastern end. The Lower Lake, eight miles long, including Castlelough Bay, and four or five wide, contains several islands of some historic interest and of exquisite beauty. That of Innisfallen has been pronounced one of the loveliest places in Europe; and the larger Ross island, with the ancient Castle of the O'Donoghues, the last stronghold that held out in Munster against the army of the English Commonwealth in the Civil Wars, is a commanding feature of the principal view. Killarney House, belonging to Lord Kenmare, the mansion in which their Royal Highnesses were entertained by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and Lady Spencer, is conveniently situated near the little town of Killarney, which in England would be called a village; and Glena Cottage is an appurtenance of this demesne on the other side of the Lake. We understand that Lord Kenmare would not be unwilling to part with this estate to the Prince of Wales, and it deserves to become a Royal property; the same may be said of Muckross, with its noble Abbey ruins, stately cloisters amidst a grove of venerable ash-trees,

Where ivied arch and pillar lone
Plead haughtily for glories gone.

The sentimental and imaginative loiterer amid these fascinating scenes at Innisfallen or Muckross may dream to his heart's content. There is a gigantic yew-tree at Muckross, which actually helps to hold up the crumbling wall, and which could tell stories of many past ages if it were able to speak. The church of Clogherеen, near this place, is reputed the oldest in Ireland, but this may be doubted. Altogether, the Killarney region is a paradise for romantic minds. Sir Walter Scott was delighted with it, when he visited it in company with the clever, but not equally poetical, Maria Edgeworth. If Killarney had been in Scotland, or if any Irish writer of fiction had had the inventive skill and industry of Sir Walter Scott, the local inspiration might have produced some literary creation to vie with the finest of the Waverley Tales or with "The Lady of the Lake" and the "Lay of the Last Minstrel." As it is, we have to put up with the tuneful fluting of "Moore's Melodies"; and the mythical adventures of "The O'Donoghue" have, within our recollection, been made the theme of a clever theatrical burlesque on the Manchester stage.

FASHIONABLE MARRIAGES.

The marriage of Earl De Grey, son of the Marquis of Ripon, and Constance Gladys, Countess of Lonsdale, took place on the 7th inst., in the Royal parish church of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields. The wedding was a very quiet one, those present comprising only the nearest relatives of the contracting couple, among whom were the Marquis and Marchioness of Ripon, the Earl and Countess of Pembroke, the Hon. Sidney Herbert, M.P., and Lady Beatrix Herbert, Baroness Von Hügel, and the Misses Vyner. Earl De Grey was attended by Mr. Greenwood as best man, and Lady Beatrix Herbert accompanied Lady Lonsdale. The Rev. W. Gibson Humphry, Prebendary of St. Paul's, and Vicar of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, officiated, the bride being given away by the Earl of Pembroke, her brother.

At St. Mary's Church, Bryanston-square, on the same day, was solemnised, by special license, the marriage of the Hon. Ronald Leslie Melville, half-brother and heir-presumptive to the Earl of Leven and Melville, with Emma Selina, eldest daughter of the Hon. William Berkeley Portman, M.P. There was a very large gathering of relatives and friends at the church. Colonel Wynne Finch acted as bridegroom's best man; and the eight bridesmaids (four of whom were children) were the Misses Susan A. and Mary T. Portman, sisters of the bride; Miss Ethel Portman, Miss Gertrude Portman, Miss E. Foljambe, and Miss L'Estrange Malone, her cousins; Miss Kathleen Leslie Melville, niece, and Miss Adèle Hamilton, cousin of the bridegroom. They wore dresses of cream satin veiled with cream lace, and lace bonnets trimmed with roses. Each carried a large basket of flowers, and wore a pearl and coral brooch, the bridegroom's gift. The bride was attired in white satin trimmed with Brussels lace flounces, and wore a wreath of orange-blossoms and Brussels lace veil fastened with diamond stars, the gift of Viscount Portman. Her ornaments included a splendid diamond necklace, her father's gift, and a pearl and diamond pendant, the present of the bridegroom. The officiating clergy were the Rev. Fitzhardinge Berkeley Portman, M.A., Rector of Stoke St. Mary, Taunton, &c., and the Hon. and Rev. Walter Berkeley Portman, Rector of Corton Denham Sherborne, uncle of the bride. The Hon. W. Portman gave his daughter away.

The marriage between Lord Keane and Mrs. Morell took place on the 6th inst., by special license, at St. Augustine's Church, Queen's-gate, in the presence of a few relations. The service, which was choral, was performed by the Vicar, the Rev. R. R. Chope.

The marriage between the Hon. Alfred Lyttelton and Miss Laura Tennant is fixed to take place on the 21st inst.

A marriage will shortly take place between the Hon. Arthur H. Chichester, only son of Lord Templemore, and Miss Alice Dawkins, second daughter of the late Mr. Clinton G. Dawkins, formerly Consul-General at Venice.

At the anniversary festival in aid of the German Hospital at Dalston, held on the 6th inst., the Duke of Cambridge in the chair, the contributions amounted to £3470, including £200 from the Emperor of Germany, £50 from the Emperor of Austria, and £20 from the chairman.

CHESS.

R H H (Newcastle-on-Tyne).—Many thanks for the card of the new club. We are glad to note your renewed interest in the game of chess.

A B S (Tetford).—Thanks; the programme was crowded out last week, but it appears below.

W W (Elham).—We confess to having misapprehended your last problem, mistaking the R at Q R 2nd for a Pawn. It shall be re-examined.

C A F (Denmark-hill).—We believe the P and the B were transposed.

J B (St. Andrews, N.B.).—The King cannot be played to any square attacked by an adverse piece, and that appears a good reason why Black should not, in No. 2141, play his King to 5th in reply to 1. Kt to Q 4th. If he play, as you also suggest, 1. K to B 5th; the attack is a simple mate with the Rook in two moves, known to the merest tyro.

Dr V (Wolfenbüttel).—Three weeks are allowed for the receipt of solutions, and they may be expressed in any recognised notation. We shall be glad to hear from you at all times.

J L (Wexford).—A four-move problem with twenty-six pieces employed in the construction is altogether unsuitable.

The Counties Chess Association has issued an attractive programme for the meeting to be held at Hereford during the week commencing Aug. 3 next. The most important of the several tourneys is that of the "Masters," for which competition, through the munificence of Mr. Charles Anthony, the president of the year, very liberal prizes are guaranteed. It will be open to all the world, and, with a few modifications, will be conducted on the same rules as those of the London International Tournament of 1883. The prizes are as follow:—First, £60; second, £25; third, £15; fourth, £5. Each competitor will be required to pay an entrance fee of £2, and a deposit of £1, the latter to be returned on the conclusion of the tournament. The time limit in this tourney will be one hour for fifteen moves. Another tourney is arranged for British amateurs who have previously won the first prize at any of the meetings of the Association, or who have, in the opinion of the committee, otherwise distinguished themselves, with three prizes of £15, £5, and £2 respectively; and yet another for British amateurs not qualified as above, with three prizes of £10, £4, and £2 respectively. The time limit in both competitions will be an hour for twenty moves, and the entrance fee in both is one guinea. There will also be the usual handicap, and arrangements will be made for evening play. The problem tourney will be open to British amateurs only; and four prizes are offered, ranging from £3 to 5s., for the best sets of three problems in two, three, and four moves respectively; and a prize of £1 10s. is offered for the best original three or two-game of any kind. The problems to be sent, in the usual way, with motto and sealed envelope, to the Rev. A. B. Skipworth, Tetford, Horncastle, on or before July 1, 1885, who will furnish a printed copy of the rules and regulations to intending competitors.

The members of the North London Chess Club now meet for play at the New Conservative Club, 206, Mare-street, Hackney. The removal to new quarters was marked on Saturday last by Mr. Gunsberg playing twenty members simultaneously.

It is understood that the programme of the British Chess Association for the year will include an International Problem Tournament. Three prizes, £5 5s., £3 3s., and £2 2s., will be given for the best sets of three problems in two, three, and four moves; and three prizes are offered for the best single problems, four, three, and two moves respectively. The problems are to be sent to Mr. L. Hoffer, the secretary of the Association, as follow:—

From competitors residing in the United Kingdom on or before Aug. 31, 1885.

From competitors residing on the Continent of Europe, the Dominion of Canada, and the United States of America, on or before Sept. 30, 1885.

From competitors residing elsewhere on or before Oct. 31, 1885.

Mr. W. W. Morgan is reprinting in the Chessplayers' Chronicle the American supplement to Mr. Cook's "Synopsis of the Chess Openings." The "Chronicle" is published weekly at Caledonian-road, London, N., and the price is twopence.

A new chess club has been organised at Harrogate, with Dr. J. Gordon Black as president and Mr. Alfred B. Beaty as honorary secretary and treasurer. There are forty-one members already enrolled. The meetings are held at the Trevelyan Temperance Hotel on the evenings of Tuesdays and Fridays, from seven to eleven p.m.

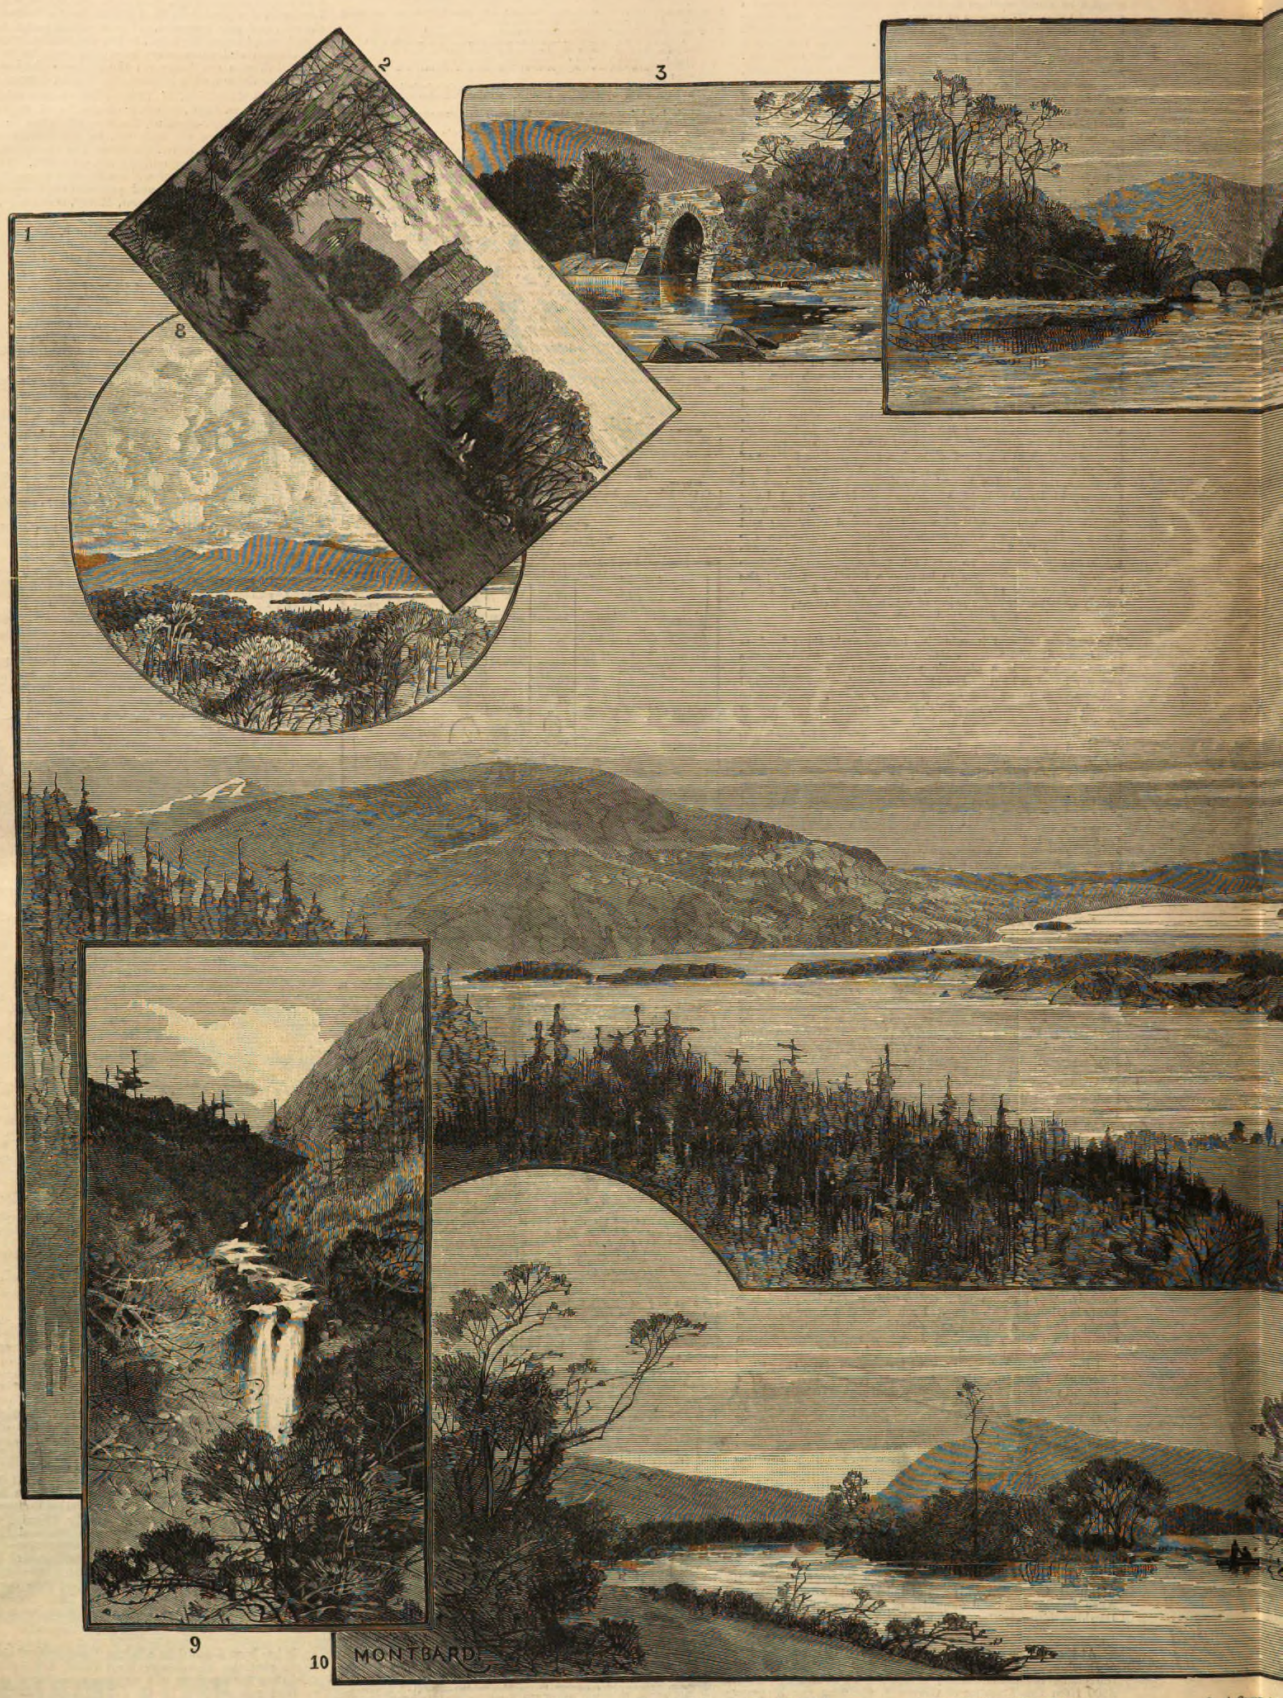
WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated Oct. 19, 1882) of the Right Hon. Louisa Burton, Countess Dowager of Kinnoull, late of No. 41, Wilton-crescent, Knightsbridge, who died on March 9 last, at St. Leonards, was proved on the 14th ult. by the Earl of Kinnoull, the son, and sole executor. The testatrix makes bequests of jewellery, pictures, lace, &c., to her daughters, younger sons, and others; and gives some pecuniary legacies to servants. Subject thereto she leaves all the property she has power to appoint or dispose of to her son, the Earl of Kinnoull.

The will (dated Jan. 14, 1884) of Major-General Sir Arthur Henry Freeling, Bart., formerly of the Royal Engineers, late of No. 2, Elm Park-gardens, Chelsea, who died on March 26 last, was proved on the 11th ult. by the Rev. George Noel Freeling and Hugh Melvil Freeling, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £9000. The testator leaves £1000 and his wines and consumable stores to his wife; and the residue of his real and personal estate upon trust for her, for life, and then for his son, Harry, absolutely.

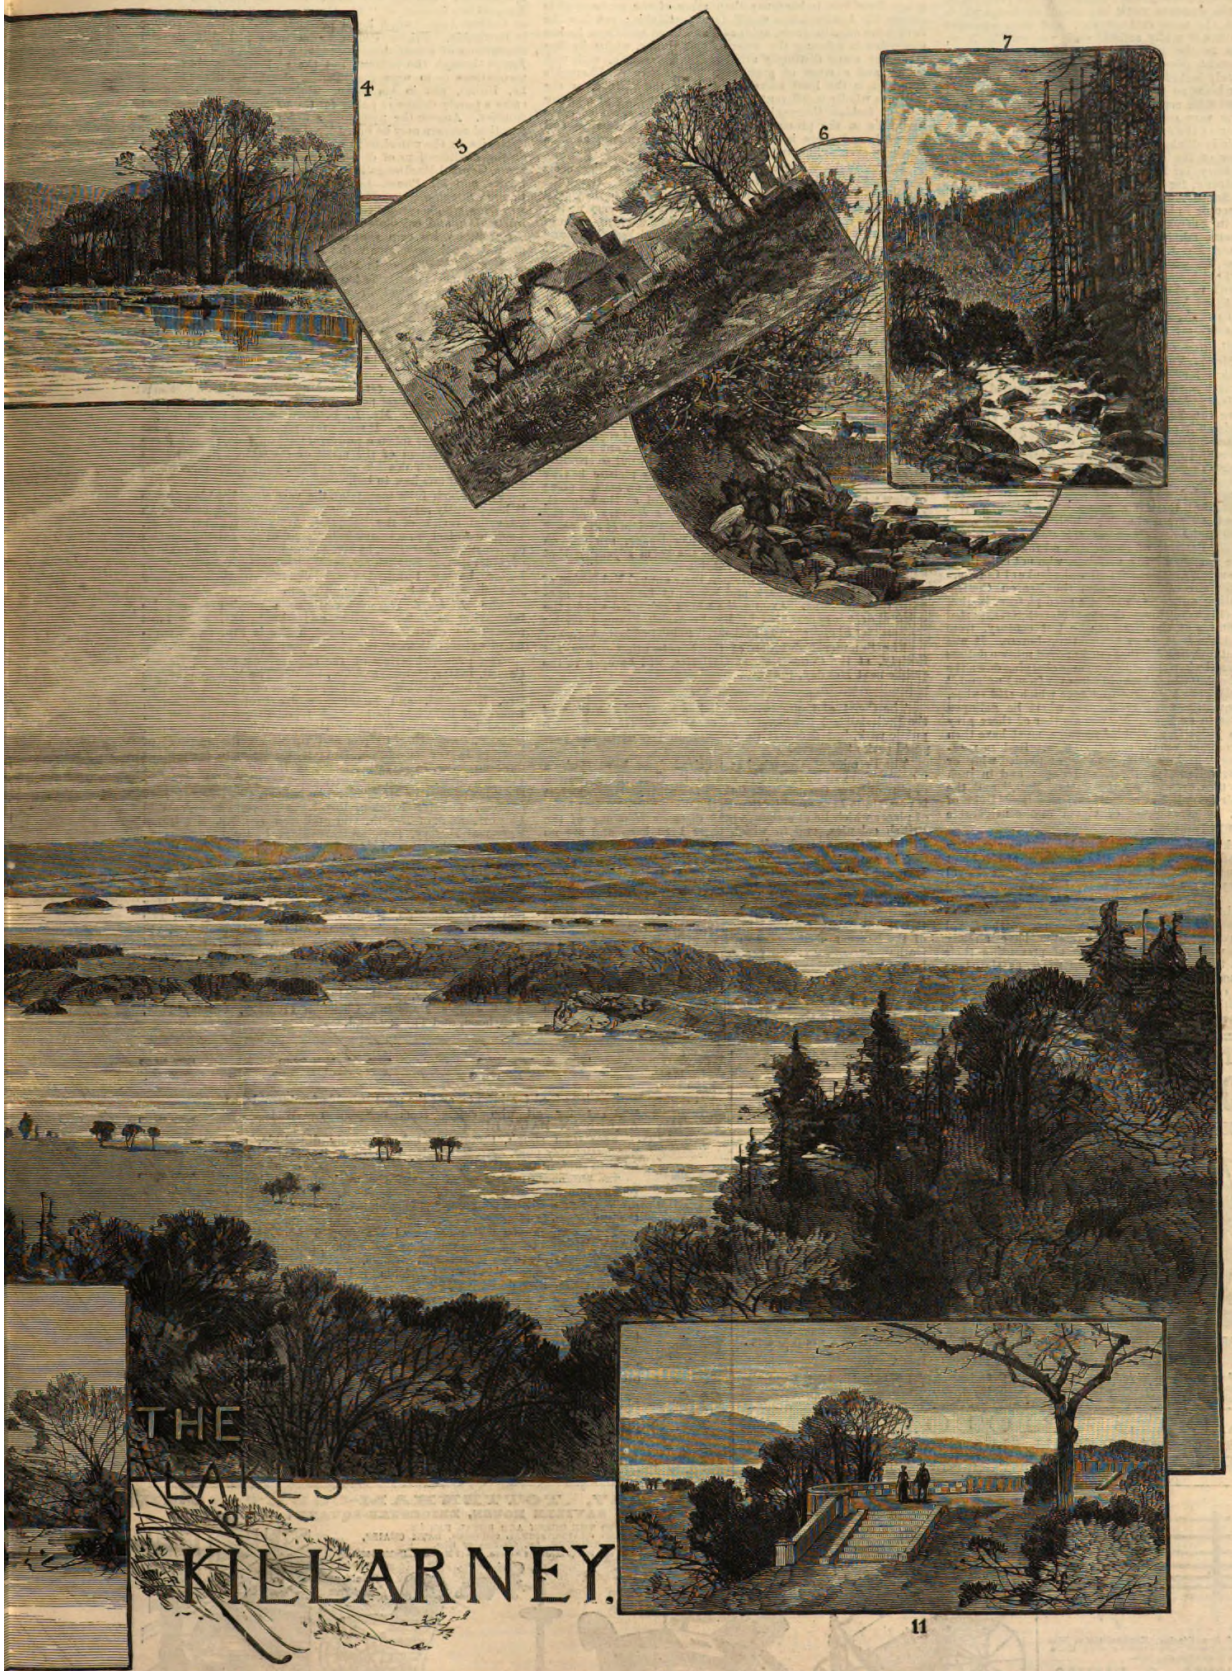
The will (dated July 26, 1877), with a codicil (dated July 18, 1883), of Mr. Christopher Darby Griffith, formerly M.P. for Devizes, late of Padworth House, near Reading, who died on March 19 last, was proved on the 23rd ult. by Charles Edward Hungerford Athol Colston, one of the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £76,000. The testator bequeaths £1000 to his wife, and legacies to his son, executors, brother, sister, nephew, godson, servants, and others. He also bequeaths to his son £500 per annum until he attains twenty-one and then £600 per annum. The residue of his real and personal estate he leaves, upon trust, for his wife, for life, or widowhood, and then for his son.

The will (dated Feb. 24, 1885) of Mr. Francis Parsons, late of Ashford House, Hornsey, who died on March 5 last, was proved on the 16th ult. by William Davis and Llewellyn Morgan, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £67,000. The testator bequeaths £500 each to the St. Albans Dispensary and the Hemel Hempstead Infirmary; £10,000 to his uncle, Frederick Parsons; £5000 each to his executors; £5000 to Elizabeth Pattison; and other legacies. The residue of his real and personal estate he leaves to Harriett Blakey, the sister of his former wife.



The will (dated Dec. 1, 1876), with two codicils (dated Feb. 6, 1879, and Aug. 30, 1884), of Miss Amelia Henry, formerly of Summer Hill, Oswestry, Salop, but late of Caton, near Lancaster, who died on Jan. 2 last, was proved on the 1st ult. by General Frederick John Davies and Michael Seymour Foster, the acting executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £49,000. The testatrix bequeaths £400 to the Unitarian Domestic Mission, Manchester; £200 each to the Unitarian Ministers' Benevolent Society and the Unitarian Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund; and numerous legacies to nephews, nieces, and others. The residue of her property she leaves, upon trust, for her nephews and nieces—George Washington Humphrys, Walter Humphrys, Mrs. Sophia Scott, Miss Margaret Humphrys, Mrs. Mary Harriet Williamson, Mrs. Frances Amelia Porter, and Miss Elizabeth Humphrys.

The will (dated Dec. 6, 1883) of Mr. William Middelton, late of Myddelton Lodge, Ilkley, and of Stockeld Park, near Wetherby, Yorkshire, who died on Feb. 26 last, was proved at the Wakefield District Registry on the 21st ult. by the Hon. Mrs. Juliana Constable Maxwell Stuart and Miss Appollonia Mary Middelton, the sisters, the executrixes, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £38,000. The testator bequeaths £20,000 to his brother John Joseph; £3000 and an annuity of £400 to his sister Appollonia Mary, and an annuity of £120 to his sister Frances Mary. Subject to the payment of these legacies and annuities and to any other charges thereon, he devises all his real estate to his brother Charles Marmaduke. Half of his plate and certain furniture and effects at Myddelton Hall, he gives to his sister Appollonia Mary; the remainder of the plate, furniture, and effects, and all the farming stock at Myddelton Hall, to his brother Charles Marmaduke; and legacies to servants. As to the residue of the personalty, he leaves one sixth each to his brothers and sisters, John Joseph Middelton, the Hon. Mrs. Maxwell Stuart, Miss A. M. Middleton, Mrs. Catherine Blundell, and Edward Middelton; and one sixth, upon trust, for the husband and children of his late sister, Mrs. Charlotte Manley.



The will (dated March 24, 1880) of Mr. Kenneth Miller, late of No. 9, Pembroke-gardens, Kensington, who died on Feb. 19 last, was proved on the 8th ult. by Mrs. Caroline McLean Miller, the widow, Hugh Montgomerie Hamilton, and Henry Holmes Sutherland, three of the executors, the value of the personal estate exceeding £22,000. The testator bequeaths his household furniture and effects and £500 to his wife; £100 each to the Female Benevolent Institution, Thurso, Caithness, and the London City Mission; and the residue of his personal estate, upon trust, for his wife, for life. At his wife's death, one third of such residue is to go as she shall appoint, and the remainder to certain of his cousins and others.

The will (dated June 7, 1884), with two codicils (dated June 10 and July 30 following), of Mr. Stephen Cooke, late of Buckingham, was proved on the 18th ult. by John Marshall and Thomas Boyse, the executors. The testator bequeaths £500 to the Vicar and Churchwardens of Buckingham, upon trust, to apply the dividends in the purchase of coals and bread to be distributed annually on Jan. 28 among the deserving poor of that parish of all denominations; £500 to the Vicar and Churchwardens of the parish of St. Mary, Banbury, upon similar trusts; £300 to the Vicar and Churchwardens of St. Peter, Brackley, Northamptonshire, upon similar trusts; £300 to the Cancer Hospital, Brompton; £200 each to the Horton Infirmary, Banbury, and the Old Charitable Society, Banbury; £100 towards reseating the church at Buckingham; £100, upon trust, to distribute the dividends annually among the recipients of Barton's Hospital Charity, Banbury; £100, upon trust, to distribute the dividends annually among the recipients of Christ's Hospital Charity, Banbury; £100, upon trust, to distribute the dividends annually among the persons participating in the benefits of some almshouses at Brackley; £100 each to St. Bartholomew's Hospital, Guy's Hospital; the Hospital for Women and Children, Vincent-square, Westminster; the new Hospital for Women, Marylebone-road; the Hospital for Consumption and Diseases of the Chest, Brompton; the Royal Hospital for Diseases of the Chest, City-road; the National Hospital for Paralysis and Epilepsy, Queen's-road, Bloomsbury; the Royal London Ophthalmic Hospital, Blomfield-street, Moorfields; St. Peter's Hospital, Henrietta-street; the Buckingham Nursing Hospital, and the Visiting Charitable Society, Banbury; and £50 each to the Banbury Bible Society and the Banbury Mechanics' Institute, in addition to a bequest of books.

It has been decided by a Select Committee of the House of Lords that the Manchester Ship Canal Bill shall proceed, subject to the insertion of a clause compelling the promoters to have five millions of the capital subscribed before the commencement of the works.

ART NOTES.

The exhibition by amateur photographers, arranged by the London Stereoscopic Company, and now open at 103, New Bond-street, is a very remarkable testimony to the progress of the art. Hitherto, amateur work has found obstacles which deterred all but the most enthusiastic; and even amongst these the percentage of really artistic work was small. Now, however, thanks to the improved system of constructing cameras, the recent discoveries in sensitising paper, very many of the purely technical difficulties have been removed, or at least have been so much lightened that amateurs need not fear to meet with repeated discouragement. That they may also achieve very considerable success is evidenced by a large proportion of the exhibitors on this occasion. Amongst those who especially distinguish themselves are the Rev. H. B. Hare, the winner of the gold medal, for his water studies; Captain C. E. Abney, for his views in Derbyshire and Wales; Mr. T. N. Armstrong, for his steamers in motion; Mr. P. A. Fraser, for his South American scenery; Mr. G. R. Dunlop, for his microscopic photographs; Mr. S. Norman, for his landscapes in Sussex (gold medal also); Mr. Stephen Coleridge, for some admirable figures; Mr. T. T. Prince, for fishing-boats; and Mr. J. R. Brindson, for animals, scenery, and water groups, for which he has been very justly awarded a gold medal. That ladies also can achieve distinction in this art (without peril to their hands also) may be seen in the works of Miss Ethel Wilson's groups of animals; Miss E. Fry's views in Brussels, Antwerp, &c.; Miss Heseltine's and Miss Latham's interiors; and Miss Benett's March sunset.

The loan collection of pictures by George Stubbs, R.A., now on view at Messrs. Vokins' Gallery, Great Portland-street, will have attractions for both artists and sportsmen. Although Stubbs' work never acquired the reputation awarded to his contemporary, George Morland, owing perhaps to his narrower sympathies, there can be no question that his place amongst animal-painters is an important one; and his "portraits" of most famous race-horses and hunters of his day, speedily recognised as truthful and lifelike, were rapidly popularised by means of engravings, &c., still to be met with in many old country houses. Among the works here exhibited a few may be regarded as hard and stiff from our present standard of taste, but there are many which show a freedom of movement and grace of action which Landseer himself might have envied. As specimens of this class of work may be mentioned the "Portrait of Snap" (8), a brown horse, the grandson of the famous Flying Childers, who not only never lost a race, but on two occasions defeated the Duke of Cumberland's Marsh (the sire of Eclipse) over the Beacon Course. Another interesting animal, as well as a good picture, is that of "Mambrino" (13), a grey horse, the sire of Messenger, exported to the United States at the close of the last century, from whom descended the best American trotting-horses. It was of Messenger that it was said "that one hundred million dollars struck American soil when the old grey came charging down the gang-plank of the ship which brought him over from England." "Gimcrack" (34), gave his name to a race which still exists, and who subsequently went to France, where he galloped twenty-two miles in an hour. He was another of those grey horses which, to judge from Stubbs' pictures, must have then been far more common on the turf than now. Besides race-horses, including "Eclipse" (3), who never needed whip or spur, Stubbs drew lions, panthers, and dogs; and in such works as "Hercules overcoming the Cretan Bull," and the portraits of "Sir Joseph Nelthorpe" (15) and the "Duke of Portland" (48), he gives proof of vigour and considerable power of landscape painting.

Mr. Frederick Goodall's "Finding of Moses," now on view at 168, New Bond-street, is an effective treatment of a subject which has attracted artists in all ages; and our Royal Academician may be congratulated upon having found means of introducing some original features into its treatment. Pharaoh's daughter, a delicate-limbed, fair girl, has come to bathe in that part of the river which runs close to the Royal palace. Her two brown female attendants have already jumped into the water, and are in the act of presenting their broad shoulders to their mistress to lean upon, as she steps down from the marble terrace, when their eyes are attracted by the floating cradle, in which the infant Moses is comfortably floating, with little pretence at concealment. Except in the figures of the two slaves, there is no action in the picture; the King's daughter, who is being unrobed by her attendants, is as motionless and statuesque as the stone deities or monarchs whose black basalt statues guard the entrance to the palace. In the reconstruction of this building, Mr. Goodall has, no doubt, given freer rein to his fancy than some of the archæologists among the Academicians would deem justifiable; but into the dark mass of palm-trees, sphinxes, and huge buildings he has succeeded in infusing the sense of probability, whilst he has made the scene distinctly artistic and interesting, with rich colour and a sense of grandeur. The figure of Pharaoh's daughter is the least successful part of the picture, as she seems as wholly indifferent to the young foundling as a young lady of fashion thoroughly imbued with the spirit of caste might be in the present day; but her pose is classical and graceful, and there is a sense of general harmony, as in a southern evening, pervading the whole.

Mr. T. Blake Wirgman has extricated himself with success from what promised to be a very difficult art problem. Given the conditions under which Lord Beaconsfield reported to the Queen the result of his mission to Berlin, it was not an easy matter to make an attractive picture. In the small drawing-room of the Queen's house at Osborne, so simply furnished that many of her subjects will be surprised when they see Royalty at home, the Queen is seated in an arm-chair, bent forward to listen to the account Lord Beaconsfield is giving of the events which led to the Berlin Treaty, and how he was able to bring back "Peace with honour" to her Majesty and to this country. There is a very great dignity in the figure of the Queen, with no attempt at flattery; and, although no distinct sittings were given for the picture, those who have the best means of speaking with authority, pronounce the portrait to be an excellent one. Of Lord Beaconsfield, although one of his private secretaries testifies to its resemblance, we speak with more diffidence. He seems rather more youthful than he appeared to most eyes after his return from that momentous journey; and his attitude, leaning against the table on which are the notes and documents to which he may have occasion to refer, seems to want some of those physical proportions which are brought out so strongly in Mr. Millais' portrait. In spite of this, the picture is very interesting from an historical as well as from an artistic point of view; and the engraving, if as successful as the original, cannot fail to be popular throughout the country and the colonies, and wherever the tradition of "Imperium et libertas," as proclaimed by the late Conservative leader, are held in honour. The picture is on view in the room adjoining that in which Mr. Goodall's work is exhibited.

Messrs. Cassell and Co. will open their annual Exhibition of Original Drawings in Black and White, at La Belle Sauvage-yard, early in June. Among the works exhibited will be the original drawings executed by Mr. Frederick Barnard for his "Character Sketches from Dickens," published last autumn.

The Summer Exhibition of the Nineteenth Century Art Society, at the Conduit-street Galleries, will be open to the public next Monday, the 18th.

The Court of Common Council has accepted the offer of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of a site at Highgate for a public park, but deferred its decision in regard to the proposed park at Kilburn.

The Premier of Victoria has received from Lord Derby a memorandum stating, in reference to the German annexation of part of New Guinea, that "there is no ground on which it is possible to base an objection to the occupation by Germany of places which lie at a considerable distance from any of the British colonies, and in which there have been and are no British settlers or traders."

The annual dinner of the friends of the Royal Hospital for Incurables was held on the 7th inst. at the Albion Tavern, Aldersgate-street, under the presidency of Mr. John Scott, M.P. The hospital is supported by voluntary subscriptions, donations, and legacies, and is excluded from the benefits of the Metropolitan Hospital Sunday Fund. The maintenance of the Home and the pension list, without cost of administration, exceeds £21,000 per annum, and since 1881 it had been found necessary to sell out £15,000 New Three per Cents. Mr. J. D. Allcroft, treasurer, proposed the health of the chairman; and donations and subscriptions were announced amounting to £4665, including one hundred guineas each from the chairman and treasurer.

THE MAY MAGAZINES.

SECOND NOTICE.

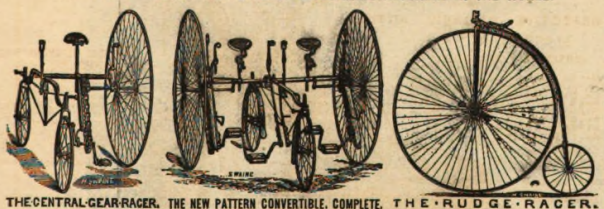
The Nineteenth Century has several good articles, practical and speculative. Among the latter must be reckoned Prince Kropotkin's forecast of "The Coming War" for the markets of Central Asia, though he is probably correct in considering it inevitable. Prince Halim Pasha talks plausibly on the importance of conciliating Mussulman feeling, and governing Egypt through the Sultan; but the real drift of his recommendations is to urge that Tewfik should be deposed, and he, Halim, put in his place. Major-General Green advocates a purely defensive policy for the protection of our Indian frontier. Among the numerous articles on subjects of great practical concern may be noted Mr. Justice Stephen's on inconsistencies in the punishment of crime, Sir Henry Thompson's on the modifications of diet rendered desirable by increasing years, General MacDougall's criticism of our system of infantry tactics, and Mr. Bowen-Jones's solution of the problem how to make farming pay. M. Goldsmith's narrative of the persecutions which compelled him to emigrate from Russia is interesting, and calculated to excite sympathy; but we must say that, on his own showing, the Government had ample grounds for the suspicion with which they regarded him.

Mrs. Ritchie's novel in Macmillan continues very pretty and charming, perhaps a trifle too domestic. Another lady writer analyses three typical French critics of English literature. M. Schérer, subtle and refined; M. Darmesteter, sensible and good all round; M. Sarrazin, superficial. "Unexplained," by Mrs. Molesworth, is a pretty German sketch which bids fair to develop into a good ghost story. The political review of the month maintains the improvement that has been recently remarked in it.

Longmans' Magazine continues Mr. William Black's "White Heather," not the most powerful, but perhaps the prettiest, of any of his fictions. Mr. R. L. Stevenson's "Prince Otto" continues perplexing. It may prove a great success, but so far the action has not taken a powerful hold upon us, though there can be no question of the merit of the style. Bret Harte's "Apostle of the Tules" is one of those Californian tales which he so well knows how to tell.

Time, which fully maintains the very considerable advance it has recently made, has, among other interesting articles, an impartial review of the Salvation Army movement, by M. Leopold Katscher; a smart indictment of the existing system of elementary education, by Mr. A. Sonnenschein; and a survey of contemporary English art, by William Sharp; while Mr. G. Legge, having terminated his connection with "society journalism," sets up to be its historian.

The Highland Magazine contains a number of articles interesting to Celtic scholars and ethnologists. The most remarkable contribution to Good Words is Professor Drummond's observations on the proceedings of the white ant.



The principal serials of the enterprising firm of Messrs. Cassell, Petter, Galpin, and Co., besides The Magazine of Art (noticed last week), are—the first number of Egypt: Descriptive, Historical, and Picturesque, by Professor G. Ebers, translated by Clara Bell; Part I. of Picturesque Canada, edited by Principal Grant, of Queen's University, Kingston, Ontario, delineating by pen and pencil all the features of interest in the Dominion, from its discovery to the present day; an issue, in sixpenny parts, of the Illustrated Book of Pigeons, by R. Fulton, with fifty coloured plates, executed for the work; Cassell's Magazine, The Quiver, Cassell's Saturday Journal, Greater London, Royal Shakspere, Familiar Wild Flowers, Book of Health, Old and New London, Illustrated Universal History, Popular Gardening, Picturesque Europe, Picturesque America, Life and Words of Christ, Little Folks' Magazine, Popular Educator, and Our Own Country.

We have further to acknowledge the receipt of The Red Dragon, The Scottish Geographical Magazine, London Society, The Argosy, The Month, Good Words, The Army and Navy Magazine, Household Words, Eastward Ho! The Antiquarian, Chambers's Journal, All the Year Round, Merry England, Irish Monthly, Leisure Hour, Book Lore, United Service Magazine, Fores's Sporting Notes and Sketches, The Theatre (with portraits of Miss Kate Phillips and Miss Tilbury), St. Nicholas, Harper's Young People, Illustrated Science Monthly, Technical Journal, Baptist Magazine, Aunt Judy's Magazine, Christian Treasury, Sunday Talk, Babyhood, and The Rosebud.

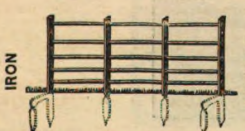
The true food for infants, and the most suitable for invalids, as well as for all who suffer from indigestion — WILSON'S AMERICAN BABY BISCUITS.

Free from starch, thoroughly baked, readily digestible, and unquestionably pure. Recommended by most eminent physicians on both sides of the Atlantic.

Do not cause acidity or wind, and the weakest stomach will retain them when all other food may be rejected. These assertions are easily proved at first trial. Your own doctor will recommend them if shown to him.

Your own doctor will recommend WILSON'S AMERICAN BABY BISCUITS as being the best possible food, nutritious and easily digested, both for infants and invalids.



"Myra's Journal" says: "Infants fed with WILSON'S AMERICAN BABY BISCUITS become strong and big, and make flesh in a healthy manner, very different from the loose, superfluous fat often seen in hand-fed children."

Dr. Arthur Hill Hassall, the well-known London analyst, testifies as follows: That "WILSON'S AMERICAN BABY BISCUITS are perfectly pure, no objectionable ingredient being present, and that the biscuits are light, agreeable in flavour, and in all respects very satisfactory."

WILSON'S AMERICAN BABY BISCUITS are sold in Shilling Tins. If not kept in stock by your Grocer or Chemist, a Tin will be sent, parcels post paid, on receipt of 16 stamps, by the Sole Consignee, DAVID CHALLEN, Mildmay-road, London, N.

From Mrs. J. HAWKEY, 16, Matilda-street, Barnsbury, London, N.,

"I have received great benefit since wearing your ELECTROPATHIC BELT. Wearing it has improved my health every way. I fail to express in words the satisfaction it gives me. I have not felt so well for years as I have since wearing your Belt. I was under the care of a physician for six months, suffering from the usual irregularities incidental to debility and bad circulation. I was despairing of ever feeling well again, when I was recommended your ELECTROPATHIC BELT. I cannot say enough in favour of it."

INTERNAL WEAKNESS.

From Miss M. HUDSON, Twyford, Derby, March 20, 1885:—

"Seven months ago I purchased one of your ELECTROPATHIC BELTS. I need not describe the symptoms here, but refer you to my letter of June 17, 1884, No. 3144. I have worn the Belt every day since that date; it has been an untold comfort to me. I would not be without one, and cannot say enough in favour of your Belts; all I regret is they are not better known. I shall be glad to write to any lady who may wish to hear more particulars respecting my case, and shall certainly recommend your appliances to my friends."

NOTE.

The ELECTROPATHIC BELT is adapted for either a Lady or a Gentleman. Please send Size of Waist, next the skin, when ordering the ELECTROPATHIC BELT.

THE REBELLION IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORY OF CANADA: CAPTAIN FRENCH (SINCE KILLED) TAKING THREE INDIAN SPIES PRISONERS.
SKETCH BY CAPTAIN H. DE H. HAIG, R.E., OF GENERAL MIDDLETON'S STAFF.

OUR NOTE-BOOK

The authorised version of the Old Testament is the noblest specimen of rhythmical English we possess in the language. Read some of the finest portions aloud and then treat in the same way the writings of any distinguished author of our day, and the notes even of a master of style like Mr. Ruskin will sound harsh in comparison. It is, therefore, no small merit of the revisers, whose fifteen years of labour have now been brought to a conclusion, that they have preserved as far as possible the beauty of form that distinguished the translation of "King James's Bible." Critics will no doubt find fault with some of the emendations, and in a work of such difficulty and magnitude there must be room for fault-finding; but it is no small satisfaction to know that the majestic and musical language familiar to us from childhood, and as dear as it is familiar, has been reverently preserved. This pious care is the more worthy of honour, since the revisers of the New Testament were less scrupulous or less capable of appreciating beauty of sound. No doubt the first object in such a revision is accuracy of translation; but, happily, this is not incompatible with sonorous language.

A University education does not always eradicate natural tastes and inclinations, or make a woman unfit for the practical business of life. A proof of this is afforded by the fact that a certain Miss Pease, who had passed her childhood herding cows in Texas, was able when she attained years of discretion to go to Vassar, where she graduated in honours. She has now, however, left the University and returned to her country life, which promises to be successful, for she is farming no less than 6000 acres, and making it pay.

Some idea of the fertility of the Sacramento Valley, California, may be formed when we hear of a farmer who has made £1200 profit out of twelve acres of asparagus this spring. Railway communication is so good and rapid that vegetables reach the markets of New York and other cities almost as fresh as when cut, and in quite as good condition as if they had merely travelled from Nice or Cannes to Paris.

The distinctive character of French artificial flowers this season is their wonderful fidelity to Nature. The Persian lilac and Guelder roses, flowers not very easily copied, are most exquisite, especially in colouring. The greenish tints in the latter old-fashioned blossoms are very difficult to get exactly; and as to the former, if there is one shade of colour about them, there is at least a dozen. Artificial fruit will be all the rage on Parisian bonnets as the summer advances, and it is being made of india-rubber. This is quite an innovation, as thin blown glass has always been used previously. The new fruit is most successful: the bunches of red currants do not look quite ripe enough to be eatable, but the plums, with the bloom on them, and the apricots are so good that it would be difficult to tell the imitation from the true if they were placed side by side in a dessert dish.

One of the most interesting dresses worn at the Artists' Ball, in Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, on Tuesday evening was Lady Brassey's. A hundred years or so ago it was new, for it really belonged to the ill-fated Marie Antoinette. The prevailing tint is something between brick-red and crimson, and it is a rich brocaded silk, with a mixture of many colours in rather a small pattern. The lace on the lower part is a kind of gold and écru Spanish, about two inches wide; but the lace in the sleeves is exquisitely fine and almost priceless old Valenciennes. If that dress could only speak, what might it not tell us about the gay young Austrian Princess, who came to so tragic an end!

The Belgian Government is very busy arranging all necessary measures for ruling the Congo, and the Constitution of the new State has been drawn up by M. Arntz, a well-known professor of the Brussels University, and Sir Travers Twiss. It is said that a high and important post in the Congo Administration will be given to the young Comte de Lalaing, who is an artist born, and made a most successful début at the Paris Salon last year. He is the son of the late Comte de Lalaing, who, in his picturesque old Huguenot costume, was so well known in Brussels all his life; and his mother, the Comtesse de Lalaing, is an Englishwoman.

When the Duchess of Connaught committed her favourite Persian cat to the care of a Royal Artillery sergeant who was coming home on board the Serapis, she certainly did not imagine that pussy would be the cause of any complications, or of a voluminous official correspondence. During the voyage she became the mother of a little family, and as sailors consider the birth of kittens on board ship a sign of the greatest good luck, they made a vast amount of fuss over them. When the Serapis reached Portsmouth, the sergeant naturally wished to take both cat and kittens on shore, but only one cat had been brought on board, and the officials had no power or authority to discharge more. The cat was accordingly carried off by the man who had her in charge, and the crew retain triumphant possession of the kittens. A great many letters have been exchanged on both sides, but at present things remain in statu quo.

Schoolmasters seem to be rather at a discount in the Navy, for the Admiralty have decided on withdrawing them from all the corvettes, rightly judging that there must be on every such ship someone qualified to perform the duties of an instructor, who will be glad to receive the regulation allowance for doing so, in addition to his ordinary pay.

Monseigneur Guibert, the Archbishop of Paris, after a long illness is restored to health, and has just resumed his duties, to the great delight of all who know him, whether as prelate or as man of the world. A great many anecdotes have consequently been revived, touching on his wit as well as on his liberality of thought and conduct. It may be remembered, that during the année terrible of the Franco-Prussian war, the Archbishop, who then resided at Tours, offered a home in his palace to M. Crémieux, the eminent Hebrew lawyer, and his wife, and they gratefully accepted it. When the aspect of things was so far altered that M. Crémieux could return to Paris, he took a most affectionate leave of his host, expressing the thanks of the "Jew" to the "good Christian," and saying, "Ah, Monseigneur! ours is the reconciliation of the Old with the New Testament. Henceforth they are one." "Pardon, M. Crémieux," replied the Archbishop, "a clever lawyer like you should not forget that the last testament annuls all previous ones. Ours alone holds good."

Having captured Riel, the leader of two revolts in Canada, the Administration cannot quite make up their minds what to do with him. To put him to death would be to raise him to the dignity of a martyr amongst his followers; whilst to imprison him would hardly seem adequate punishment for the trouble he has caused and the lives which have been sacrificed through his acts. There is always in England a natural and praiseworthy prejudice against using the severest punishment for what may be termed political offences, and this sentiment extends to the colonies. But since the Papineau rebellion in 1837, Canada has never been quite free from an inclination to rioting on the part of certain irresponsible and thoughtless sets, and some strong measures must be taken to let would-be insurgents know that the laws must be respected. It is, however, to be hoped that a method can be found to spare Riel's life, and yet permanently restore order in the colony.

The district of Bulgaria known as Dobrudscha having been infested with a swarm of ravenous locusts, the Prime Minister of the place at once adopted a warlike policy, which must be highly applauded by those who approve of strong and decisive measures. When the greedy little insects had devoured everything green within an area twenty square miles, and when the farmers could do nothing, and when a peaceful arbitration between the besieged and the besiegers did not appear likely to be agreed on, the military were called out, and the enemy was successfully exterminated. It has been said by those who object to supporting a standing army, that soldiers have nothing to do but to catch flies. The remark, if applied to Dobrudscha, would seem singularly appropriate. It has not been stated whether the Nordenfeldt gun, or torpedoes, or mitrailleuse were brought into requisition, or whether the invaders were repulsed at the point of the bayonet. Happily, not one of the Bulgarian army was killed in the encounter, though the enemy's numbers far exceeded their own.

For nearly three weeks the working tailors of Paris have been on strike, and there is now an appeal being made on their behalf for subscriptions from Englishmen in the same trade. Strikes, or, in fact, any disagreements between masters, as a class, against servants as a class, are always to be deplored, for it is by a conscientious union of the resources of both that trade develops and success is attained. Without discussing the respective merits of the parties to the present dispute, there is one grievance alleged by the men which humanity demands should be fully investigated. They complain that they frequently have to ply their calling in damp, unwholesome underground cellars, into which the light of day never penetrates. If this be true, then reform is needed, and a strike should not have been necessary to obtain for the tradesmen the opportunity of carrying on their business in a healthy atmosphere. There are, of course, other questions between the employers and the employés, but whichever side eventually concedes, the sanitary state of the work-rooms ought to be rendered as nearly perfect as possible.

While lack of appreciation on the part of the British public has rendered it doubtful whether there will be a performance of Italian opera in London this season, it is interesting to note how popular is opera—both German and Italian—in Prussia. Out of 278 general representations in Berlin 233 were of opera; in Cassel there were 107 out of 269; and in Hanover 115 out of 268. How different in London! With all our new theatres, and with the increased popularity of dramatic performances, a two-months' season at Drury-Lane is all we are likely to have in the year. In Paris, opera has done little better than in London. The official report of the Grand Opera-House for five months shows a deficiency of £6000.

Friends of Paradox, the all-but-defeated winner of the Two Thousand and the somewhat shaky favourite for the coming Derby, are looking all around them for encouragement. Peradventure, the case of the half-bred Hotspur, who all but "did" the Flying Dutchman of famous memory for the Derby, may reassure them; or the remembrance of Wild Tommy may be grateful to their feelings. For Wild Tommy, who never did anything to speak of, before or after, was within a head of beating the great Petrarch for the Doncaster St. Leger; and the Chopette colt may be as Wild Tommy, for all that anybody can tell. The performances of Whipper-In and of Metal at Chester, as well as the performance of Farewell in the One Thousand, speak volumes, of course, in favour of Paradox; but the volumes are not of such authority as they might have been under other circumstances and at other times—in the days, for instance, when Chester was Chester. Chester still knows how to "charge"; but there is no Stanley, as in the days of Sir Thomas, to "On." Kempton Park, again, seemed to show that the friends of Paradox may dismiss any uneasiness they may have felt about Esterling, Strategus, and Risingham. Thus the "field" is becoming more and more select as we approach the fatal 3rd of June.

What to believe has always been among the puzzles of life, ever since the serpent beguiled the credulous Eve. Newspapers, which, like vaccination, are a beneficent invention, but not altogether without attendant evils, have increased and intensified the puzzle, especially for anybody who is careless and desultory in reading, and cannot or will not be at the pains of glancing over as many newspapers as possible. For it sometimes happens that a newspaper which contains a certain unfounded statement does not print the contradiction or correction; or, on the other hand, the inconstant reader may read one newspaper one day and another another, so that the conscientiously inserted correction may escape observation and the erroneous statement remain fixed in the reader's mind. Take the statement concerning Mr. Condie Stephen and his luggage, for instance. First we read in one paper that he met at our Custom-House with the treatment proverbially accorded to a prophet in his own country, but was treated with extraordinary attention, courtesy, consideration, and honour by the Russians; and then we read in another paper that it was not so at all, but that the officials of our Custom-house behaved towards him with the greatest possible respect and forbearance, and "passed" his luggage as if he had been an autocrat. Whether the former paper ever revised and corrected its original assertion we, perhaps, never know; and, not seeing why we should give more credit to one paper than the other, remain in doubt for the rest of our natural lives.

How "evil is wrought by want of thought as much as want of heart" received sad illustration lately in Sussex. A poor little boy named Dale caused great annoyance to a young man named Hedger, who—as what he, no doubt, considered a "lark" and a facetious kind of punishment—tied the little eight-year-old to a cow's hind legs, or to one of her hind legs, and the frightened animal made a mad rush, struck the little boy's head against a post, and killed him. And now the thoughtless Hedger, whose deed it is impossible to attribute to anything worse than thoughtlessness, will be tried for a very serious crime, and will probably and very properly have to pay a heavy price for indulging in a dangerous practical joke.

Messrs. Peall and Mitchell played something like a match at billiards last week: it was 8000 up, and Mr. Peall won by eight points only. There cannot, of course, be a dead-heat at billiards, but Messrs. Mitchell and Peall have been next door to it.

Apropos of dead-heats, there was rather a curious one at Kempton Park last week, for the Shepperton Selling Handicap Stakes, between Wit and Eldest Miss, neither of whom was expected to win the race, but of whom the latter was the better favourite. When the dead-heat was "run off," Eldest Miss was again the better favourite, but Wit, the less fancied, though the two had been, as it were, "tried" together in the very presence of the bettors, not only won but "made the running," and won "cleverly." Something similar so frequently happens that it is almost ludicrous: witness the cases of Buckstone and Tim Whiffler, Ely and General Peel, for the Ascot Cup. In both cases the "wrong un" was made the favourite, and yet a man like the late Admiral Rous, who really knew what was what, made no mistake. It seems but yesterday that he was heard to remark, contemptuously, in his "quarter-deck" tones, "It will be odds on General Peel, and Ely will win." And so it was.

Patriots who like to lament over the decadence of their country, and never tire of pointing out how we are losing our prestige in everything, especially in sport, will no doubt wax eloquent over the defeat of our champion, Lambert, who on the 15th inst. was beaten by Pettitt, of Boston, U.S., at tennis, in a contest for the "championship of the world." Other patriots, who do not like to lament over the decadence of their country, and who cannot see any reason for such lamentation, will rather observe with pride by how almost incredible a shave the American, with youth and its accompaniments on his side, managed to beat the Englishman, with age and its accompaniments against him. Foreigners sometimes beat our race-horses, Canadians sometimes beat our oarsmen, Australians sometimes beat our cricketers, and so forth; but we can still boast that foreigners, whether Americans or others, Canadians, Australians, and all the world, are considered "very small potatoes" until they have received, as it were, their diploma in England, which has taught all nations, and may without discredit be occasionally beaten by her pupils. As regards the tennis-match, Mr. Pettitt, would himself, perhaps, be the first to acknowledge, in language peculiarly appropriate to the game in which he excels, that "youth will be served."

The "mashers" of Paris have been in a bad way lately, having "nothing to wear" in consequence of a "strike" among the gentry employed by the great tailors, the Pooles d'outre-mer. When a lady declares that she has nothing to wear, we know what it means, and do not apprehend any shocking deficiency of garments. But with men (if "mashers" be men) it may be different; still a great deal may be done with a good long "ulster," which will cover a multitude of deficiencies. Indeed, it has been said that a man in an ulster ought to go about with a certificate, signed by competent and credible witnesses, testifying that he has something on underneath. Could not the Parisian "masher" manage with an "ulster" until times are better?

Melton, by coming out for the first time this year last Wednesday, and winning the Payne Stakes, showed, though he had but three opponents, that he has not lost his form of last year; and the meeting between him and Paradox will be all the more interesting.

El Mahdi is not the only leader of men who sets up as a prophet at the present time; for Riel, who headed the insurrection on the Canadian frontier, announced himself as the deliverer of the half-breeds; and not only carried a cross, but performed tricks of legerdemain, in the hope of proving his Divine mission to his deluded and half-barbarous followers.

THE REBELLION IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORY OF CANADA.

It is satisfactory news that Louis Riel, the conceited and fanatical mongrel Canadian, who got up the Red River insurrection of 1870, and has again stirred up a rebellion among the half-breeds and some of the Indian tribes on the North Saskatchewan, is now a prisoner, and there are strong hopes of a speedy pacification. The colonial troops, under the command of General Frederick Middleton, have done admirable service in a brief campaign of hard marching and sharp fighting, some Illustrations of which appear in this week's Number of our Journal. These are supplied by Sketches with which we have been favoured by Captain H. De H. Haig, of the Royal Engineers, who is Assistant-Quartermaster-General on the Staff of General Middleton. Some explanation of the geography of the North-West Territory, and the condition of the unsettled part of its inhabitants, may first be required. That vast prairie region west of the Province of Manitoba and of Lake Winnipeg, is traversed by the two branches, the North and the South branch, of the great river Saskatchewan, both rising near the base of the Rocky Mountains, and uniting to form the lower stream which flows eastward to the head of Lake Winnipeg. The country along the South Saskatchewan is traversed by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and is being rapidly settled and occupied for cultivation, with the banks of the Qu'Appelle, a tributary of the Assineboine, three or four hundred miles west of the town of Winnipeg; and the rising towns of Regina and Moose Jaw, and the railway stations further on, Medicine Hat, Calgarry, and Morleyville, are the secure abode of colonial civilisation. The country of the North Saskatchewan, on the contrary, not having yet obtained the benefit of a railway, and being situated in a more severe climate, though its soil is very rich, still lies in a rather backward condition; the principal stations in ascending the river, which is navigable after the melting of the ice, are Prince Albert, Battleford, the seat of the administration, Fort Pitt, and Edmonton. Battleford, the centre and capital of this territory, is six hundred miles, by road, from the city of Winnipeg, the capital of Manitoba. The aggregate number of the various native Indian tribes in the North-West and in British Columbia is reckoned at 85,000, but scarcely a quarter of these belong to the region which is disturbed by the present insurrection. The half-breeds, mostly the offspring of French Canadians by Indian mothers, number about 5000; one of them is Louis Riel, who was educated in a Roman Catholic missionary college, but, instead of becoming a priest, took up the trade of a political intriguer. It does not appear that the Canadian Dominion Government has ever treated the Indians with harshness or unfairness. They have received, individually, sufficient grants of land, which instead of cultivating they have sold, and they now demand fresh grants of land, probably to be sold again, for they dislike the toil of agriculture. The outbreak of the insurrection was rather alarming, and was attended with cruel massacres, a dozen white persons, including women and children, being slaughtered by the Indians at Frog Lake; Battleford was also captured and plundered, but the resident officials and their families, with the other English there, three hundred in all, shut themselves up in the barracks, from which they were relieved, and the town was recaptured, by the Mounted Police under Colonel Otter. Fort Pitt, eighty miles above Battleford, has fallen into the power of an Indian chief named Big Bear, and much anxiety is felt concerning the fate of the few English who were there, and whom Big Bear detains as prisoners and hostages.

The operations of Major-General Middleton have some military interest. This officer, who was educated in the Royal Staff College, has fought in the Indian Mutiny War and in New Zealand, and is a C.B.; he was formerly Commandant of the Cadet College at Sandhurst, and in July last year was appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Militia forces in the Dominion of Canada. The active force of the Dominion numbers 37,036 of all ranks. In these are included permanent troops, consisting of three field batteries and three companies of infantry, which also serve as schools of instruction. In No. 10 District, which is the scene of the present revolt, there are only 607 of the active Militia. These are divided into Militia "in cities" and "rural." The former comprise a troop of cavalry, a field-battery, and a battalion, the head-quarters of which corps are all at Winnipeg. The latter consist of four independent companies of infantry. In addition there are the North-West Mounted Police, closely resembling the Irish Police. They number some 500 men, and of these about half are with Colonel Irvine, their commandant, at Prince Albert. General Middleton is at the head of 3200 men, who were brought westward by the Canadian and Pacific Railway; but at several places along that line, on the north shore of Lake Superior, the railway is not yet constructed. The troops had therefore to march about seventy miles in that part of their journey. At one place, as is shown in Captain Haig's Sketch, they crossed the ice of Nepigon Bay, a space of fourteen miles, the temperature then, at four o'clock in the morning on April 6, being many degrees below zero; the troops shown in this Sketch are the 10th Royal Grenadiers, accompanied with sledges for the conveyance of stores. The railway brought them on, through Manitoba, and westward as far as Qu'Appelle, which is situated fifteen miles north of the line. General Middleton sent an advanced guard to hold Fort Humboldt, 120 miles north of Qu'Appelle, half-way to Prince Albert, while he moved north-west to Clark's Crossing, on the South Saskatchewan, and there awaited supplies. The river there was crossed by a wire rope stretched from bank to bank, a width of three hundred yards, with a boat attached to it by ropes and pulleys. The cavalry were sent out in this neighbourhood as scouts, and captured three Sioux Indians, spies employed by Riel, who were ready to fight, when surrounded, as shown in Captain Haig's Sketch, and to sell their lives as dearly as possible; but Captain French, of the Mounted Police, approaching them unarmed, and speaking to them in their own language, persuaded them to surrender. They were the two sons and a brother-in-law of the powerful Sioux chief White Cap, who was obliged to quit the United States for having taken part in the Minnesota massacres. General Middleton, having completed his arrangements for an advance against the enemy, with eight hundred men, moved forward to the North Saskatchewan, at Gabriel's Crossing, and marched some days up the left bank of that river. On the 24th, he was suddenly attacked by the enemy, under Gabriel Dumont, in a ravine called Fish Creek, fifteen miles above Batouches, between Battleford and Fort Pitt. General Middleton had with him there only about four hundred men. The conflict was very severe, the rebel sharpshooters, under cover of buildings and rifle-pits, killing nine and wounding forty-two of the loyal troops, who were forced to withdraw from the ravine. But some days later, having got reinforcements, General Middleton forced the position, driving out the rebels from the village of Batouches, and dispersing the greater part, or forcing them to surrender. Louis Riel, Dumont, and three others fled after the battle; three scouts coming out of the bush espied Riel and summoned him to surrender. The rebels, however, fired at the scouts, and continued their flight on horseback. The scouts gave chase and succeeded in capturing Riel. He was concealed until General Middleton had been informed of his capture. The troops were then ordered to their tents, and Riel was brought into camp on the 15th inst.; but Dumont has not yet been taken. Many of the half-breed insurgents have surrendered, but hostilities continue with the Indian tribes farther up the river, under the leadership of Big Bear and Poundmaker, two of the native chiefs. In the meantime, an event of vast importance to the whole Canadian Dominion has this week been quietly accomplished by the peaceful labours of the railway engineers. On Tuesday the rails were laid down on the last unfinished section of the Canadian Pacific Railway, by which railway communication extends now in an unbroken line from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the port of Halifax, Nova Scotia, to Port Moody, on the coast of British Columbia, traversing British territory all the way, a distance exceeding 3500 miles.

BENEVOLENT INSTITUTIONS.

The Queen has presented to the German Hospital, at Dalston, £100, as an addition to the collection made at the recent anniversary festival. The King of Bavaria has given a donation of £15 towards the funds of the German Teachers' Association in England. The Company of Merchant Taylors have given 100 guineas to the Gordon Memorial Fund for the benefit of poor children. The Court of Common Council have made a further grant of 10 guineas in aid of the maintenance of the Royal National Hospital for Consumption, Ventnor, which is being greatly enlarged to meet the pressure of applicants. The committee of the Morley House Seaside Convalescent Home for Working Men have received twenty guineas from the Mercers' Company, ten guineas from the Skinners' Company, and five guineas from the Salters' Company, towards the liquidation of the debt upon their house and grounds at St. Margaret's Bay, Kent.

Madame Cellini is organising an amateur concert, under the patronage of the Queen, the Princess of Wales, Princess Christian, and at which many of the nobility will assist, in aid of the Hospital for Sick Children in Great Ormond-street. The concert will take place on June 25, at St. James's Hall.

Yesterday week was celebrated, at the Holborn Restaurant, the thirty-third annual festival dinner of the City Orthopædic Hospital, the Duke of Portland presiding. Subscriptions to the extent of over £750 were announced.

The Lord Mayor has consented to preside at the Second Festival Dinner in aid of the funds of the London Fever Hospital, which is to be held at Willis' Rooms, on June 23.

The Duke of Cambridge presided at the annual dinner in connection with King's College Hospital held last Saturday evening in the Inner Temple Hall. There is a growing deficit in the funds, amounting last year to £6700. The sum subscribed during the evening was £2229.

The annual dinner of the members and subscribers to the Newspaper Press Fund took place at Willis's Rooms last Saturday evening, Dr. W. H. Russell in the chair. Donations to the amount of nearly £900 were announced.

Several dinners took place on the 13th inst., as follows:—

The Prince of Wales presided at the festival dinner of the North London or University College Hospital, and made a telling speech in favour of the institution. The collection amounted to £2800, including 100 guineas from the Prince of Wales, and 100 guineas from Sir Julian Goldsmid. This, with the £2000 donation from a lady mentioned by his Royal Highness, brought the total up to £4800; and Sir Julian Goldsmid, learning this, forthwith subscribed another £200, thus bringing up the total for the evening to £5000.

The Duke of Cambridge presided for a short time Sir James Lawrence subsequently taking the chair—at the festival dinner of the Royal Hospital for Children and Women, Waterloo-bridge-road, held at Willis's Rooms—the subscriptions amounting to nearly £1000.

The Marquis of Ripon presided at the annual dinner of the Railway Benevolent Institution, at the Cannon-street Hotel. His Lordship made an earnest appeal in its behalf, and the result was a contribution of about £2500 to the funds.

Mr. W. H. Smith, M.P., presided at the anniversary festival of the Artists' Benevolent Society, when a sum of nearly £2000 was subscribed.

The ninety-seventh anniversary festival of the Royal Masonic Institution for Girls was held at the Freemasons' Tavern, Sir Walter W. Burrell, M.P., Provincal Grand Master for Sussex, presiding. The subscriptions amounted to £14,187.

Lady Adeliza Manners on the 14th inst. presented new colours to the 3rd Battalion Leicestershire Regiment, in the Victoria Park, at Leicester.

The committee of the National Fawcett Memorial have decided, after placing a memorial tablet in Westminster Abbey, to devote the funds which they are engaged in raising to the promotion of the higher education of the blind. It has been determined to apply a sum not exceeding £2000 to the establishment of a Fawcett scholarship, tenable by a blind person at any of the Universities of the United Kingdom, including women's colleges, and to appropriate the balance of the fund to the higher education of the blind in connection with the Royal Normal College and the Academy of Music for the Blind at Upper Norwood in some distinct form with which the name of Mr. Fawcett shall be identified.

Four brigade field-days of metropolitan Volunteers were held last Saturday. The corps assembled as follows:—Wimbledon-common (Colonel G. H. Moncrieff, Scots Guards, commanding)—13th Middlesex (Queen's Westminster) R.V., 14th Middlesex (Inns of Court) R.V., and 20th Middlesex (Artists) R.V.; and (Colonel W. Fitzroy commanding) 1st, 3rd, 5th, and 7th Surrey R.V. Regent's Park (Colonel C. Tucker, C.B., commanding)—1st and 2nd Volunteer Battalions Royal Fusiliers and 3rd and 17th Middlesex R.V. Bushey Park (Colonel Clive, Grenadier Guards, commanding)—London Rifle Brigade, 12th Middlesex (Civil Service) and 25th Middlesex (Bank of England) R.V., 15th Middlesex (Customs and Docks) R.V., and 24th Middlesex (Post Office) R.V.

The annual meeting of the Mendicity Society was held yesterday week at the residence of Lord Norton, in Eaton-place, under the presidency of the Duke of Wellington. The report stated that, out of 1207 applicants, 1003 were sent to work, five only of whom refused to work; 194 were incapable of work, ten from various causes were declined relief. A total of 3988 meals had been given. The number of applicants showed a decrease of 182 from that of the previous year. But amongst the number of those who had been afforded temporary aid were noticed an unusual number of bona-fide working men desiring regular employment, and unable to find it. The total number of vagrants apprehended during the year was 1344, of whom 860 were new cases. Of the whole number 923 were committed and 421 discharged. The total number of letters registered for inquiry in the begging letter department of the society's work was 1450, of which 976 were new cases.

THE REVISED TRANSLATION OF THE BIBLE.

At midnight on Monday, in the neighbourhood of Paternoster-row, at the publishing warehouses of the two Universities—that of Oxford University, in Amen-corner, and that of Cambridge, in Ave Maria-lane—eager crowds of wholesale purchasers, the messengers of a multitude of booksellers, awaited the first delivery of the new English Translation of the Bible. We had previously received from Mr. H. Frowde, publisher of the University of Oxford, a copy of the edition in crown quarto, printed in minion type and in double columns, which contains the old "authorised" version alongside with the revised version. It is not within our competency to anticipate the judgment of Biblical scholars and critics upon the work performed during fourteen years of scrupulous labour by the most learned English masters of this kind of knowledge. The revised translation of the New Testament, which of course must be, to Christians, of infinitely greater theological importance than that of the Old Testament, was given to the world four years ago; and nothing has to be said of it upon this occasion.

To the general reader of cultivated literary taste, without the rare accomplishment of knowing the Hebrew language, we feel assured that the present work is one of the most valuable gifts that has ever been made, even apart from religious considerations, and that it will hereafter affect, in a vastly beneficial degree, the standard of a pure English style, of true eloquence and poetry, and the expression of noble, pathetic, and sublime feelings upon every topic of our common speech. For there is no composition, in any language ancient or modern—not even the plays of Shakspeare, not even the Greek classics, or the epics of Milton and Dante—that equals in force and beauty many passages of the Psalms, the writings of the Prophets, the first two chapters of Genesis, and the Book of Job; there is no store of pithy moral wisdom, of concise maxims upon the practical conduct of life, so perfect in form as the "Proverbs" and the Book of "Ecclesiastes." These writings, even if the ecclesiastical claim of Divine inspiration for them had never been advanced, would have exercised supreme power over the human mind by their matchless strength of thought and utterance, by their exquisite grace, their width of view, the freedom of conception, the passionate earnestness, the reach of lofty aspiration, the irresistible tenderness of their appeals to the heart of mankind. There is no great poet, no great orator, no profound speaker or writer of any nation in modern Europe, from the Middle Ages down to the generation of Carlyle, Ruskin, Tennyson, Browning, Victor Hugo, and John Bright, who has not been indebted to the Bible for much of his power of rhetorical expression, and for much of his stock of imaginative ideas. Putting it simply upon this ground, the study of those parts of the Scriptures to which we have referred is the best instrument of literary culture that can be found in all the libraries of the world. The English version, now revised and corrected, is the first and best of English prose classics; and we believe it has now been made the very best translation of the Bible in any language.

The pleasure of reading—merely as one of the highest literary delights—will be greatly enhanced by some of the improvements which the Revisers have introduced; by presenting all the poetical books, the songs and hymns and chants, the versified proverbs, and many passages in the Prophets' writings, of metrical form in the original, here printed as poetry, in lines, while the rhythmic cadence is managed with taste and skill; by casting the ordinary prose into convenient and intelligible paragraphs, according to the logical branches of the discourse or narrative, instead of cutting it up into detached verses, though the old numbering of verses and chapters is marked; and by omitting the questionable headings of chapters, supplied by theological commentators who were not infallible, and whose assistance may well be dispensed with. The substitution of good current English words of this day, belonging to our proper speech, for such as have become obsolete, and for others which are debased by coarse and indelicate associations, is a still greater improvement; but it is to be regretted that in some few instances, where the Revisers have discarded a word that was inexact, or one liable to be misunderstood, they have put in the Hebrew word ("Sheol" for instance, meaning the place or state of the dead when hidden from the survivors on earth) instead of trying to provide an English equivalent. The word "hell," as every scholar is aware, had originally no other signification, but has acquired by theological usage a dreadful meaning not intended by the author of the Book of Job. We cannot, however, dwell upon the particulars of translation. In general, the reader will find, by the help of the Revisers, numerous obscure and hitherto offensive phrases removed, the drift of argument or rhetoric made to flow clearly, smoothly, and effectively, the circumstantial descriptions rendered more exact, the eloquence and poetry of the Bible worthily presented. What effects may be produced on the use of texts for or against different systems of theological doctrine, we do not know, and we do not care.

This is merely the ordinary layman's popular view of the great work that has been completed, for which the people of England ought to be grateful. The personal services of the Revisers, whose names have frequently been mentioned, will be recognised, probably, upon some future occasion. Of those who began the work at Midsummer, 1870, including the New Testament Company and the Old Testament Company, ten have died and two have resigned, and fifteen of the original body are now living. They have laboured in eighty-five sessions, usually ten days at each session, occupying 192 days altogether; the mode of procedure is described in a preface to this volume, or rather in two prefaces, one to the Old and one to the New Testament. The Revised New Testament, as is well known, may be purchased separately; but the Revised Old Testament is sold only as part of the entire collection of books which is called the Bible, and we hope it will be sold by millions.

The total amount of the guarantee fund to the Colonial and Indian Exhibition (London, 1886), is now £183,850.

The late Lieutenant James Richardson, of the 5th Lancers, whose Portrait we gave last week, was educated at University College, Oxford, and subsequently by the Rev. G. Faithfull, at Storrington Rectory, Sussex, from whose hands he passed first into the Royal Military College at Sandhurst. The Portrait of him was from a photograph by Mr. Lafayette, Westmoreland-street, Dublin.

The Soudan War being over, Lord Wolseley left Souakim with his staff on Tuesday, after inspecting and praising the Indian troops, and bidding farewell to the Australians, who have sailed for Sydney. The troops on the Upper Nile begin to withdraw on Thursday. As the war goes off in smoke, not only of gunpowder and glory, Mr. H. K. Terry, London agent for Messrs. Allen and Ginter, of Richmond, Virginia, has generously given 1700 lb. of "Richmond mixture," which we can personally attest to be fine and wholesome tobacco, for the use of the British troops. It is forwarded by Lady Brassey and the Ladies' National Aid Society.

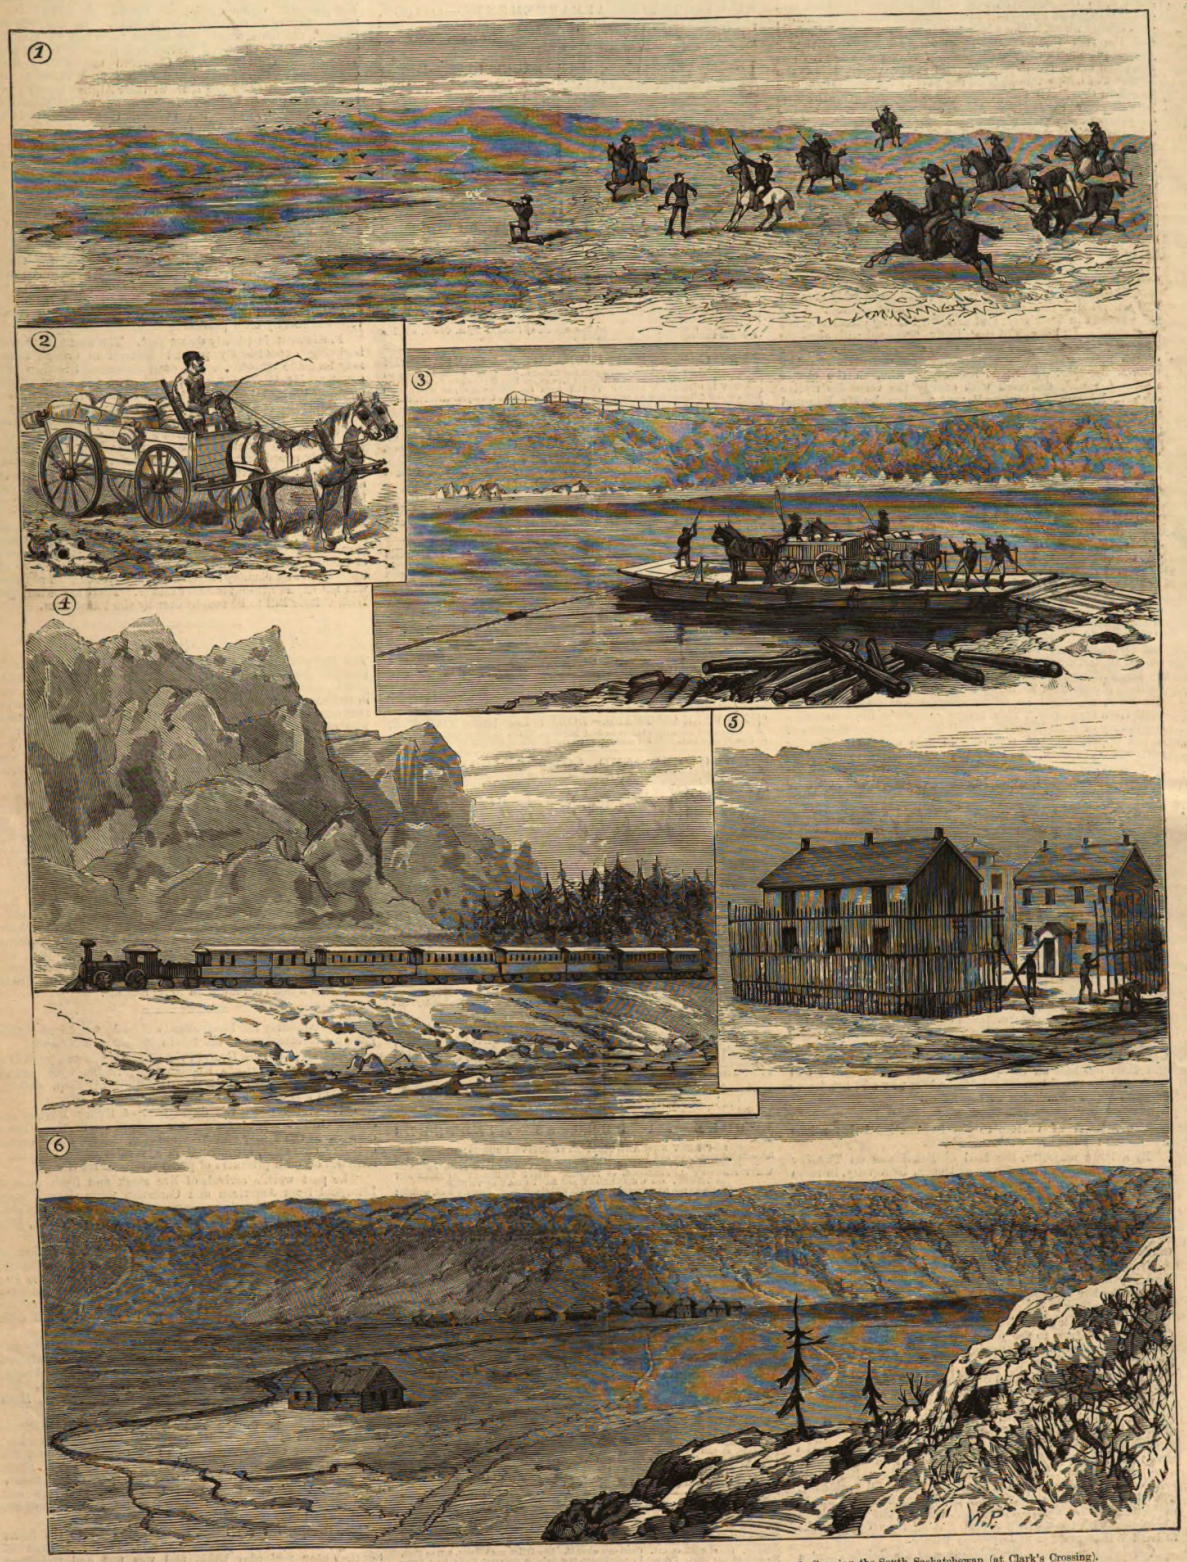
DILAUR KHAN (KASSANJEE), PAYMASTER OF THE AFGHAN ARMY, WITH HIS ATTENDANTS.



GHOLAM HAIDAR KHAN, COMMANDER OF THE AFGHAN ARMY, WITH HIS ATTENDANTS.

During the visit of the A[illegible]er Abdurrahman of Cabul to the Viceroy of India, at Rawul [illegible]di, in the Punjaub, photographs of the distinguished personages there sojourning for the Vice-regal Durbar were taken by Messrs. Fry and Lahn, of Lucknow, which are reproduced in our Engraving. The principal group is that of the Ameer, standing with the Earl of Dufferin and with his Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught, attended respectively by officers and gentlemen of their staff, including Mr. Mackenzie Wallace, the author of excellent books on Russia and Egypt, who is private secretary to the Viceroy; General Afzul Khan, the Ameer's Envoy to India; Major-General W. Gordon, C.I.E., of the Bengal Staff Corps, who received the Ameer at Peshawur; Captain Talbot and Captain J. H. Balfour, A.D.C., Bengal Staff Corps. The other Engravings represent the Commander-in-Chief of the Afghan army, Gholam Haidar Khan, and the Paymaster of the Army, Dilaur Khan, each seated with attendant guards standing behind or beside him. The Ameer has issued a proclamation applauding his troops on the frontier, under General Ghous-ud-din Khan, for the bravery they showed in the conflict with the Russians at Pul-i-Khisti on March 30, and expressing his confidence in the value of the British alliance. He has sent large reinforcements to Herat, and has permitted Colonel Stewart, Major Talbot, and Major Holdich to superintend the fortifications of that city. Gifts of military stores, rifles, and artillery, with considerable sums of money, have been made to the Ameer by the Indian Government.

THE ARTISTS' COSTUME BALL AT THE PRINCE'S HALL.

The President and Council of the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours (who set a commendable example of spirit and enterprise to older societies) are to be warmly congratulated upon the signal success of the brilliant Costume Ball and "Masque of Painters" at the Prince's Hall, in Piccadilly, on Tuesday night. The whole fête was an artistic triumph; and the rich feast of colour evidently afforded particular pleasure to the Prince and Princess of Wales, who had from its inception taken the liveliest interest in the affair. It was the happiest of happy thoughts on the part of the Ball Committee to ordain that "All guests must be in costume of an historic period prior to 1837." As a consequence, it was quite an exceptionally picturesque gathering of gaily and quaintly costumed guests that met the view of their Royal Highnesses when they arrived at the hall with the Princess Louise of Wales, and were received by the President, Mr. James D. Linton, handsomely apparelled as Paul Veronese, whilst the trumpeters blew a blast, and the crimson-coated company of halberdiers, led by Lieutenant W. Horsley, presented arms. Fancy-dress was worn by everyone save the Royal party, which comprised, in addition to the Prince and Princess of Wales and the youthful Princess in white, the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne, Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, Count and Countess Gleichen, and Countess Feodora Gleichen.

The tableaux vivants of the Old Masters undeniably merited the general tribute of admiration they at once secured. They were perfect in their way, and presented living pictures of the most famous artists and of their times, prepared with absolute historical accuracy under the sedulous supervision of a number of the most distinguished members of the Institute. The Chorus was Mr. J. Forbes Robertson, who, in the classic robes of Virgil, delivered with energy the verse descriptive of "The Masque of Painters," well written by Mr. Edmund Gosse. Admirably was the series opened. A bit of ancient Athens seemed realised in Mr. A. Sacheverell-Coke's group of Pericles consulting Ictinus and Phidias regarding the Parthenon, while Zeuxis on the side held converse with some Athenian ladies. There succeeded the glowing triptych designed by Mr. Walter Crane (himself performing the rôle of Cimabue) to represent the arts of Florence, Rome, and Venice—Dante and Beatrice, Petrarch and Laura, Cimabue with Giotto as a shepherd-boy, N. Pisano and Boccaccio's Fiametta forming the centre; Michael Angelo, Pope Julius II., and Raphael figuring to the right; and on the left being grouped Paul Veronese (Mr. J. D. Linton, P.R.I.), Titian (Mr. J. H. Mole, V.P.R.I.), and Venetian grandees. Mr. Linton's German tableau was eminently characteristic of this eminent painter, and introduced the spectators to Albrecht Dürer (Mr. E. J. Gregory, A.R.A.) explaining to the Emperor Maximilian his print of "Triumph," while Lucas Cranach (Mr. E. M. Wimperis) and Holbein and Peter Visscher look on. Similarly resplendent and equally applauded was the bright scene designed by Mr. R. Caton Woodville to revive the period of Benvenuto Cellini, represented as being received by a majestic Francis the First, to whom he offers specimens of gold and silver plate from his pupils. This bright group was illuminated by the beauty of Mrs. Woodville and Miss Willett. There will be an opportunity of referring to this and the following tableaux next week, when we may have space to praise as they deserved the fine reproduction of Velasquez's studio by Mr. Seymour Lucas, the very quaint and realistic picture arranged by Mr. T. Walter Wilson and Mr. Edwin A. Abbey to represent Rembrandt and Ostade and Teniers recreating themselves in a Dutch bowling-garden, and the crowning triumph of Mr. Seymour Lucas and Mr. Charles Green: the elaborate hemicycle devoted to the English School. The remarkably interesting Masque closed, the actors in this panorama of art marched in procession from the stage, and preceded the Royal party to the picture galleries, after inspecting which the Prince's circle took supper.

On the return of the Royal party to the Prince's Hall, the Grenadier Guards' band, conducted by Mr. Dan Godfrey, started the ball with a stimulating waltz. Animated and dazzling was the scene, as dancing proceeded, and the various epochs of art, religiously separated with chronological exactitude in the tableaux, became hopelessly mixed in the quadrilles and waltzes which followed. The Prince (who stayed with his party to the small hours) expressed himself as highly gratified. The costumes of the halberdiers who formed the Royal escort were designed by Mr. R. Caton Woodville and made by Messrs. L. and H. Nathan, of Coventry-street, by whom were executed several other notable costumes. Indeed, Alias and Harrison and all the principal London costumiers had their energies taxed to meet the demand for new and handsome dresses for this memorable Costume Ball.

The number of visitors to the International Inventions Exhibition for the first week was 94,959.

By a large majority, the Earl of Rosse was on Tuesday elected Chancellor of the Senate of Dublin University, in room of the late Earl Cairns. The other candidates were the Marquis of Waterford and the Earl of Milltown.

The Duke of Cambridge, presiding on Tuesday at a meeting of the National Rifle Association, explained the changes made in the regulations for the ensuing Wimbledon meeting, the most important of which is the division into three stages of the competition for the Queen's Prize.

The Poole Town Council on Tuesday unanimously passed a resolution accepting Lord Wimborne's offer of twenty-five acres of land on the north shore of Parkstone Bay for a recreation ground and public park for Poole and Parkstone. The council intend to convert the bay into ornamental water, to provide baths and gymnasium, and lay out grounds in accordance with the donor's wishes. A hearty vote of thanks to Lord Wimborne was unanimously passed.

A morning performance will be given at the Gaiety Theatre next Saturday, the 30th inst., by the "Busy Bees" A.D.C., in aid of the funds of the Central London Throat and Ear Hospital, Gray's-inn-road, on which occasion will be played "For Her Child's Sake," by Sir Charles Young, Bart., and "The Palace of Truth," by W. S. Gilbert. The performance will be under the direction of Mrs. Lennox Browne, 36, Weymouth-street, W., from whom tickets may be obtained, as well as at the theatre and the hospital.

THE SILENT MEMBER.

Parliament did not separate for the Whitsuntide holidays without receiving another earnest and somewhat plaintive hint from Mr. Gladstone that, in the ordinary course of things, he cannot much longer occupy the office of Prime Minister. The incident which caused the Premier to make this personal statement occurred on Monday. In Committee of Supply, the Government had moved for a vote of £3,360,000 on account for the Civil Service and Revenue Departments. Thereupon, Lord Randolph Churchill moved a reduction of the vote by two millions, and delivered an incisive attack upon the Ministry on the score of their Afghan policy, which lacked firmness, he argued. In the course of Mr. Gladstone's earnest protest against the motion, there were boisterous interruptions from the Opposition benches. The unruliness provoked the right hon. gentleman to remark that "If I take any notice of the interruption it is not really on my own account. They matter very little to a person whose future intervention in political conflicts is much more likely to be measured by weeks than by months, and certainly by months more than by years. It is because of the deep conviction I have that a great blow has been struck at the liberties and the dignities of this House." The loud Ministerial cheers evinced how sincerely one side of the House sympathised with Mr. Gladstone, who will, it is to be hoped, for the rest of the Session be treated with the courtesy due to so illustrious a statesman. Though Lord Randolph Churchill wished to withdraw his amendment, Mr. Biggar refused to give leave. The division gave a majority of 63 to the Government; and the vote was shortly after passed.

Parliament is plainly dying fast. The necessary business is being expeditiously pushed forward in order that all may be made smooth for the crucial General Election that is coming. Mr. Gladstone, on the 14th, had the satisfaction of securing the grant of £6000 as the Princess Beatrice's dowry; Mr. Labouchere's adverse motion being negatived by 357 against 38 votes. On the succeeding evening, Earl Granville and the Marquis of Salisbury followed suit, and agreed with the grant. In the House of Lords, on Monday, Lord Wemyss fruitlessly urged that the Souakim-Berber railway should be completed; but Lord Salisbury made the motion the text of a vigorous and barbed attack upon what is by courtesy called the policy of the Government in the Soudan—the policy of a barometer, really. The Scottish Crofters' Bill was at last introduced in the Lower House by the Lord Advocate on Monday. Though the estimable Mr. Warton occasioned a count-out at half-past six on Tuesday evening, and the interest of members desiring re-election becomes fixed more and more upon town and country constituencies, the existing Parliament will not expire without another flicker. There is the mitigated Irish Crimes Bill to be fought over by the Parnellites.

TEL-EL-KEBIR REVISITED.

The Egyptian campaign of September, 1882, though it has brought nothing but trouble, loss, and vexation to the British public, and its consequences, including the several campaigns in the Soudan, must have cost us altogether more than twenty millions sterling, was a brilliant piece of military arrangement. The party of English officers and young ladies whom our Artist has delineated, "revisiting the trenches of Tel-el-Kebir," may have some personal reminiscences, or some associations of private friendship, prompting a special interest in the battle of Wednesday, Sept. 13, in that year, when Sir Garnet Wolseley, at daybreak in the morning, with his thirteen thousand British troops, broke into the fortified camp of Arabi Pasha, and drove out the enemy in less than half an hour. We had fifty-four killed and 320 wounded; and it is possible that some of the sufferers may have been acquaintances of these holiday visitors, or that the gallant gentlemen may have taken part in the action, which they have now an opportunity of describing on the spot. It is not very likely that any of our fair countrywomen, under similar escort in a tourist party, will ever see the more recent battle-fields of Abou Klea and Kirbekan, of El Teb and Tamai and Hasheen, which would not have been heard of but for the action of Tel-el-Kebir. Most people at home wish, by this time, with all their heart, not to hear of any more battles in that part of the world. "But 'twas a famous victory," and the British Army won a deserved addition to its renown.

On Wednesday the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain gave a conversazione at the South Kensington Museum.

The Kempton Park Grand Prize of £1000 was won yesterday week by Mr. Abington's Necromancer, ridden by F. Webb. Sir M. Wood's Sir Francis won the Stewards' Cup, and the Park Cup was carried off by Mr. G. Trimmer's Iris.

On Monday the seven days' trial of Henry Burton and James Gilbert Cunningham, for complicity in the Fenian outrages at the Tower and Westminster, besides other crimes of a like character, terminated in a verdict of guilty, and a sentence on both prisoners of penal servitude for life.

The past week's arrivals of live stock and fresh meat at Liverpool from American and Canadian ports show a large falling off in the imports in comparison with those of the preceding week. The total arrivals amounted to 373 cattle, 4998 quarters of beef, and 830 carcases of mutton.

An action brought by Mr. Tennent against Dr. Stocker, of Peckham, for having confined plaintiff in defendant's lunatic asylum without proper certificates, terminated on Monday in a verdict for plaintiff, with £500 damages. Execution was stayed to allow of an application for the reduction of the amount on condition of £100 being paid to plaintiff and £400 being lodged in court.

In connection with the recent visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Ireland, her Majesty has conferred baronetcies on Mr. Edward Cecil Guinness, of Castlehuoch, county Dublin, and on Mr. Richard Martin, of Dublin. Mr. E. J. Harland, Mayor of Belfast, and Dr. Wycherley, High Sheriff of Cork city, are to be knighted.

A full meeting of the Victoria (Philosophical) Institute took place at its house, 7, Adelphi-terrace, on Monday evening, when a paper on the monuments and traditions among the native tribes in the West of America was read by Dr. M. Eells, whose investigations have been carried on there during nearly forty years. It was announced that sixty members had joined this year as yet, and that an important meeting of the institute will take place in June.

Mr. Phelps, the new United States Minister to the Court of St. James's, accompanied by Mrs. Phelps, arrived at Southampton yesterday week, and was met and welcomed by representatives of the local authorities and others. Acknowledging his reception, Mr. Phelps expressed a hope of being instrumental in continuing the kindly relations existing between the two countries. On Saturday, Mr. Russell Lowell introduced Mr. Phelps to Earl Granville. On Tuesday Mr. Lowell had a farewell audience of the Queen for the purpose of presenting his letters of recall, and Mr. Phelps presented his credentials upon the same occasion.

MUSIC.

THE CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY, DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

The present series of performances of operas in English is drawing towards a close, next week being the last. The past week, until Saturday night, was occupied with repetitions of works recently noticed. Mr. Goring Thomas's new opera, "Nadeshda" was given several times, and his earlier work, "Esmeralda" (first produced here in 1883), was performed for the second time this season. On Saturday evening Ambroise Thomas's "Mignon" was performed for the first time during the present season. The cast was similar to that of previous occasions. Madame Julia Gaylord, in the title-character, sang and acted with great effect, as did Madame Georgina Burns as Filina. Miss M. Burton was an efficient representative of Frederick; and the other principal characters were very efficiently sustained by Mr. Packard (Wilhelm Meister), Mr. L. Crotty (Lothario), and Mr. C. Lyall (Laertes). The opera was excellently rendered throughout, and drew a large audience. Mr. Carl Rosa conducted.

The concert of Mr. Geaussent's Choir at St. James's Hall, last week, brought forward a "Patriotic Hymn," composed by Antonin Dvorák, and performed for the first time on that occasion. The original text is a Bohemian poem, entitled "The Heirs of the White Mountain," by Vitéslav Hálek, the English version being by the Rev. Dr. Troutbeck. The music is for chorus and orchestra, and consists of one continuous piece, the opening portion of which is calm and somewhat melancholy in style, comprising much smooth vocal harmony, with some effective modulations, and some varied treatment of tempo and rhythm. Towards the close of the hymn, the music assumes a brighter and more hopeful tone, gradually rising to a jubilant and effective climax, in which the orchestral details are more prominent than before. The hymn was generally well rendered, especially by the chorus, the composer having conducted it. The concert began with Mr. A. C. Mackenzie's dramatic cantata, "Jason," which was produced at the Bristol Festival of 1882, and has been repeated elsewhere. For Wednesday's performance a new scena for Orpheus had been written by the composer. It is a fine piece of dramatic expression—quite worthy of the important work to which it has been added—and its rendering by Mr. E. Lloyd was in the highest style of vocal art. The solo music of Medeia and that of Jason was admirably rendered, respectively, by Madame Albani and Mr. Santley. The choruses were generally well sung, the performance of the elaborate orchestral details having occasionally been less satisfactory. The concert ended with the finale to the first act of Mendelssohn's unfinished opera, "Loreley," with Madame Albani's dramatic singing in the solo portion of Leonora. With the exception of the cantata, Mr. Geaussent conducted.

The Crystal Palace gave the second "Popular Instrumental and Vocal Summer Concert" last Saturday afternoon. On the first occasion Madame Biro De Marion, Miss A. Heale, Mr. J. D. Henderson, and Signor Foli contributed effective performances. Herr T. Werner played brilliantly in a movement of a concerto by Paganini, and shorter solos, and familiar orchestral pieces were rendered by the band. Last Saturday's concert included many interesting features, among them a symphony of Haydn's in E flat, which is comparatively unknown here. Mdlle. Pauline Cramer (from Munich) sang with great effect in several instances, other good vocal performances having been contributed by Miss H. Wilson, Mr. C. Chilley, and Mr. W. Mills. The Crystal Palace choir, the fine orchestra of the establishment, and Mr. Manns, the conductor, co-operated at both concerts.

The fourth Richter Concert of the present series took place, at St. James's Hall, on Monday evening, when a new overture, composed by Mr. E. D'Albert, was to have been produced, but its performance was postponed to a future concert. The programme included the fifth of Liszt's "Hungarian Rhapsodies," a sombre work of much less interest than the bright pieces which form the other numbers of the series. The other features of the concert were too well known to require mention. The orchestral playing was generally of the usual excellence.

The Highbury Philharmonic Society gave an effective performance, on Monday evening, of Dr. Gladstone's dramatic cantata, "Constance of Calais," with full band and chorus, and Madame Penna, Mr. I. McKay, and Mr. A. Moore as principal vocalists. The work contains some very pleasing music, especially in some of the choral writing. The programme of the concert also comprised portions of a symphony of Haydn and a selection from Handel's "Alexander's Feast."

Madame Jenny Viard-Louis is continuing her interesting Beethoven Concerts, in which her own clever pianoforte playing is a special feature. The second of the third series took place yesterday (Friday) week, when her coadjutors were Mr. Carrodus (violin), Mr. Libotton (violoncello), and Miss Rose Hersee, as vocalist.

The Philharmonic Society closed its seventy-third season this week with a strong programme, which included the first performance in England of a symphonic poem—for orchestra—entitled "Johanna d'Arc," composed and conducted by Herr Moszkowski. Of this, and of other features of the concert, we must speak next week.

The Tonic Sol-Fa College held their annual meeting on Tuesday evening at Exeter Hall; and the London Gregorian Choral Association held the thirteenth annual festival in St. Paul's Cathedral on Thursday evening.

Last week's recital by Herr Peiniger (a skilful violinist) possessed the special interest of bringing forward some old violin pieces of forgotten English composers. The concert-giver would do well to follow up his inquiries in this direction.

Sir Julius Benedict's annual concert is to take place at Drury-Lane Theatre on Tuesday afternoon, June 23; not on June 17, as previously arranged.

Among the miscellaneous concerts of the week were those of Mr. C. T. Speer (pianist), on Wednesday evening, at Prince's Hall; of Miss Rosa Leo (vocalist), yesterday (Friday) afternoon, at Steinway Hall; and of Mdlle. Ida Henry (pianist), in the evening, at Prince's Hall.

Mr. Oberthür will give a morning concert next Wednesday at Prince's Hall, under distinguished patronage; and the same morning Mrs. Dutton Cook's (Mrs. Charles Yates) morning concert will take place at 1, Belgrave-square, by permission of Mr. R. D. Sassoon.

THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL.

The programme for this great celebration has just been issued. The performances begin on Tuesday morning, Aug. 25, with "Elijah"; in the evening, Mr. F. Cowen's new cantata, "The Sleeping Beauty," and a symphony by Mr. Prout, will be produced. On the Wednesday morning the chief event of the festival will occur—the production of M. Gounod's new oratorio, "Mors et Vita," specially commissioned for this occasion. The Wednesday evening will bring forward Mr. T. Anderton's new cantata, "Yuletide," and a new violin concerto by Mr. Mackenzie. The next morning's performance will consist of "The Messiah"; and in the evening Antonin Dvorák's new cantata, "The Spectre's Bride," and a setting of Mr. Gladstone's Latin translation of "Rock of Ages," by Dr. Bridge, will be produced. The last festival day, Friday, Aug. 28, will bring forward, in the morning, Mr. C. V. Stanford's sacred cantata, "The Three Holy Children," followed by Beethoven's choral symphony, the evening being devoted to a repetition of M. Gounod's "Mors et Vita." The principal solo vocalists will be Madame Albani, Miss Anna Williams, Mrs. Hutchinson, Madame Patey, Madame Trebelli, Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Maas, Mr. Wade, Mr. Santley, Mr. F. King, Mr. W. Mills, and Signor Foli. Herr Hans Richter will conduct the performances, having succeeded the late Sir Michael Costa in this office.

OBITUARY.

FRANCES, COUNTESS OF GAINSBOROUGH.

Frances, Countess of Gainsborough, who died at her residence, 17, Hyde Park-square, was widow of Charles, first Earl of Gainsborough, and eldest daughter of Robert, third Earl of Roden, K.P., by his first wife, Countess the Hon. Maria Frances Catherine Stapleton, daughter of Thomas, twenty-second Lord Le Despencer. The deceased Countess—who was for many years a Lady of the Bed-chamber to her Majesty, resigned the appointment in 1872, and was made an extra Lady of the Bed-chamber the next year—was born Nov. 20, 1814, and married, as fourth wife, July 25, 1833, Charles, third Lord Barham, created, 1841, Earl of Gainsborough, by whom she leaves a son and a daughter, the Hon. Robert Berkeley Wriothesley Noel, and Lady Victoria Buxton, wife of Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton, Bart. The Countess was a member of the Royal Order of Victoria and Albert, Third Class.

THE HON. C. S. VEREKER.

The Hon. Charles Smyth Vereker died at Bournemouth on the 12th inst. He was born April 21, 1818, the only son of the second Viscount Gort, by his second wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Mr. John Palliser, of Comeragh, county Waterford; was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he was M.A.; and was Hon. Colonel 4th Brigade, South Irish Division, R.A. Colonel Vereker married, 1842, Kate, daughter of Robert Fannin, Esq.; but leaves no issue.

COLONEL VESEY, OF LUCAN.

Colonel Charles Vesey Colthurst Vesey, of Lucan House, county Dublin, J.P., D.L., who died at his residence on the 11th inst., was second son of Sir Nicholas Conway Colthurst, of Ardrum, county Cork, Bart., by Elizabeth, his wife, only daughter and heiress of Colonel George Vesey, of Lucan House. He was born in 1826, and assumed by Royal License, in 1860, the additional surname and arms of Vesey, in consequence of succeeding to the estates of his mother's family. He married, in 1858, Anne, daughter of Colonel David Fraser, by whom he leaves three sons. Colonel Colthurst Vesey was High Sheriff, county Dublin, 1858, and Hon. Colonel 5th Battalion Royal Dublin Fusiliers.

MR. TATTON, OF WYTHENSHOWE.

Mr. Thomas William Tatton, of Wythenshowe, in the county of Chester, J.P., D.L., died at his residence on the 10th inst., in his sixty-ninth year. He was eldest son of the late Mr. Thomas William Tatton, of Wythenshowe, the uncle of the present Lord Egerton of Tatton; was born in 1816. He married, in 1843, Harriet Susan, daughter of Mr. Robert Townley Parker, of Cuerden Hall, in the county of Lancaster, and by her, who died in 1873, he leaves Thomas Egerton Tatton, his successor, now of Wythenshowe, two other sons, and a daughter. Mr. Tatton, whose decease we record, served the office of High Sheriff in the county of Chester in 1848, and was Colonel of the 3rd Cheshire Rifle Volunteers.

We have also to record the deaths of—

Canon Worsley, of Ripon, on the 19th inst., at his rectory of Little Ponton, Lincolnshire, which he had held since 1829.

Mrs. Harriet Chambers, the widow of Dr. William Chambers, at Edinburgh, on the 16th inst., in her eighty-fifth year.

The Rev. J. C. Clutterbuck, known as the "father of hydro-geology," in his eighty-fourth year. He was for fifty-five years Vicar of Long Wittenham, Berks, and for many years Rural Dean of Abingdon.

Lucy Anne, Lady Hodge, wife of General Sir Edward Cooper Hodge, K.C.B., Colonel of the 4th Dragoon Guards, on the 2nd inst. She was daughter of the late Mr. James Rimmington, of Broomhead Hall, in the county of York.

General James Charles Innes, late of the Bengal Army, at Durnsford-place, on the 5th inst., aged seventy-three. His first commission is dated June 14, 1828. He served in the Bundlecund Insurrection.

Lieutenant-Colonel Alexander Plunket Van Homrigh, on the 11th inst., at Southsea. He served in the 61st, 2nd Queen's Royals, and 36th Regiments; was at the taking of Taku Forts, and the advance on Pekin, 1860.

Major Mordaunt Charles Boyle, the King's Royal Rifle Corps, died at Kurol, Upper Egypt, from the effects of enteric fever, on the 5th inst. He was grandson of Vice-Admiral the Hon. Sir Courtenay Boyle, third son of the seventh Earl of Cork.

Lieutenant-Colonel William McCulloch, who died at Shillong, Khossi Hills, Assam, India, on the 6th ult., was formerly Political Agent at Munneepoor. His father, the late John Ramsay McCulloch, was Comptroller of her Majesty's Stationery Office.

Captain William Harris, formerly of the 16th Lancers, who died at Yealmpton, in the county of Devon, on the 5th inst., aged eighty-eight, was one of the last survivors of those present at the battle of Waterloo. He was nineteen years of age at the battle, and was said to have been the youngest British officer on the field.

Mr. Thomas M. Waller entered last Tuesday upon his duties as Consul-General of the United States in London.

According to a return relating to Post-Office Savings Banks, there was at the close of 1884 due to depositors £44,773,773. The charges and expenses incurred in the management of the department amounted for the year 1884 to £248,617.

Mr. Mundella, M.P., presided at the first annual meeting of the Teachers' Guild of Great Britain and Ireland, held last Saturday afternoon at the Memorial Hall. Among the speakers were the Rev. Canon Percival, Sir G. Young, Mr. E. N. Buxton, Rev. Dr. Rigg, Dr. Weymouth, and Mrs. Bryant.

The Prince of Wales has honoured with a visit the thirty-second Annual Exhibition of Continental Pictures at the French Gallery, 120, Pall-mall. Carl Heffner's picture of "Ostia," which made a sensation in Mr. Wallis's Winter Exhibition, has been bought by the Government of New South Wales for their gallery at Sydney.

A new commodious house was publicly opened on the 15th inst., in presence of a large company of ladies and gentlemen, at Brook-street, Holborn, in connection with St. Giles's Christian Mission, with which is associated a Home for Discharged Prisoners. Sir W. Charley (the Common Serjeant), Mr. Flowers (the Bow-street magistrate), Mr. Chance (the Lambeth magistrate), and Mr. Howard Vincent took part in the proceedings. The cost of the new portion of the building is £650, towards which £512 has been received.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

Paris, Tuesday, May 19.

The sickness of Victor Hugo, with the prospect of national mourning, has thrown all other topics into the background. The great poet was taken ill in the night of Thursday; since Sunday he has been growing weaker and weaker and his respiration more and more difficult; and in spite of all care a fatal issue is feared. Victor Hugo is suffering from pulmonary congestion, probably brought on by some imprudence, for, after always enjoying splendid health, he forgot that advancing years rendered certain precautions at least prudent if not necessary. At the reception of M. De Lesseps at the Academy, for instance, he remained for some time in the courtyard without his hat; and never at any time could he be persuaded to wear an overcoat. The poet himself believes that the end has come, and when his friends tell him that he will be well in a few days, he replies, "No; it is the end—I feel that I am going to die." Victor Hugo is now in his eighty-fourth year, having been born Feb. 26, 1802. The reports to-night state that the illustrious patient's condition is unchanged, and little hope is entertained of his recovery. This morning Victor Hugo said, "How difficult it is to die! and yet I am perfectly ready!"

The Chamber of Deputies, overwhelmed with work, is hurrying through vast reforms after very brief deliberation. The Habitual Criminals Act, for instance, has been voted by a majority of 386 against 57, and relegation to Cayenne or New Caledonia pronounced to be obligatory after a certain number of offences, all intervention of the magistrate being suppressed. The law involves extreme legal rigour and extreme administrative arbitrariness, and, although it is voted, it is generally acknowledged that the new Chamber will have to take the matter up again, and render the details of the law practical. As a complement to this bill, the Chamber voted with equal precipitation the so-called Bérenger bill for bringing lost sheep back to the fold. The bill proposes three means—ticket-of-leave after proofs of repentance and good conduct; premiums to societies for the aid of prisoners having the conditional liberty of the ticket-of-leave; and, finally, greater facilities for civil and political rehabilitation. By voting this measure, the Chamber of Deputies has placed France on a level with England, Germany, and Holland, where the ticket-of-leave and aid to discharged prisoners have long been practised. The Senate has taken its share in these judicial reforms by voting a bill ordaining the non-publicity of capital executions, and thus suppressing a disgraceful and unhealthy spectacle.

On Saturday the Chamber rejected, by 278 votes against 122, a demand for an amnesty presented by M. Clovis Hugues. The Government very justly observed that there was no necessity to vote an amnesty for the sake of the eighteen political prisoners now in French jails, inasmuch as their cases could be satisfactorily dealt with by pardon. This afternoon the great debate on the scrutin de liste began in the Senate. The Senatorial committee has reported in favour of the proposed reform in the method of voting, but is opposed to an increase in the number of deputies.

The celebrated military painter, Alphonse De Neuville, died this morning at the age of forty-nine, after a long and painful malady. His death has been regarded as inevitable for some time past, for, like Bastien Lepage, he was suffering from an incurable cancerous affection.

The Paris theatres all appear to have been very unprosperous this season. One of the boulevard theatres has already closed its doors, and printed on its playbill the traditional "clôture annuelle," as if the summer had arrived, whereas in reality we are having a colder month of May than has been known for years. On the other hand, official reports show that from Nov. 1, 1884, to March 31, the Opéra has lost nearly 155,000f.; the Odéon has lost nearly 12,000f. from June 1, 1884, to March 31; and the Opéra Comique, from July 1, 1884, to March 31, made the very small profit of 2078f. 83c. The season at the Comédie Française has been equally unprosperous.

Apropos of the stage, I may mention the great success obtained both in a public performance and in many private salons by a beautiful blond English actress, Miss Helen Bruno, who comes from the Princess's Theatre, London. Miss Bruno plays both in French and English, and she has had the great satisfaction of receiving warm approbation and encouragement from no less a critic than M. Alexandre Dumas.

There is still one more picture exhibition to be mentioned; happily, it is the last of the season, and until next winter the critics and the public will enjoy a little rest. The Exposition de Peinture Internationale in the Rue de Sèze is choice, limited in number, and very interesting. The exhibitors are Bonnat, J. L. Sargent, Liebermann, Kroyer, Edelfeldt, Cazin, Gervex, Albert Besnard, Alfred Stevens, the "Impressionistes" Claude Monet and Raffaelli, and our English painter, W. Wyllie, who sends four fine marine and Thames river scenes.

New books, especially memoirs, are abundant this week, and some of the many interesting volumes must at least be mentioned, notably M. Alfred Darimon's "Histoire d'un Parti," which is the history of the beginnings of the Second Empire; M. Blaze De Bury's "Confidences sur Alexandre Dumas"; and M. Arsène Houssaye's "Confessions," full of interesting talk about famous people, which has, however, one fault—that of being, in all probability, to a large degree apocryphal. M. Houssaye has never been famous as a respecter of truth.

THE PLAYHOUSES.

The precise object that Mr. Toole evidently had in view when he produced "The Shuttlecock" in the morning instead of at night is likely to be attained. He obtained a critical audience: he saw the weak points of the comedy, and set about correcting every palpable defect before the play was put into the regular evening programme. "The Shuttlecock," as most people know by this time, is an unfinished sketch of a comedy left behind him by Henry James Byron, which was intrusted to the hands of his friend J. Ashby Sterry to finish. A more difficult or anxious task could not be confided to anyone; and it must be confessed that Mr. Sterry has done his work with considerable cleverness and with characteristic modesty. Briefly, then, when the completed play was produced last Saturday afternoon, the first act was declared to be uncommonly good; the second act certainly wanted reconsideration; and the third act was considered not at all amiss. Byron's idea was to make the popular Mr. Toole a comic Claude Melnotte, a love-sick journeyman tailor, who had fallen in love with a beautiful girl above him in social station, and his evident design was to follow Bulwer Lytton's story as closely as possible, transferring it from the regions of romantic drama to farce. Those who saw the "farci-drama" rushed to the conclusion that all that was good in it was poor Byron's, and all that was weak was Mr. Sterry's. This is scarcely fair on Byron's literary executor. In point of fact, a great deal of the successful first act was due to Mr. Sterry. The situation at its conclusion certainly was his; and I should not be surprised if the author of "The Shuttlecock Papers," who has written so much that is interesting concerning the Temple, the chrysanthemums, Garden-court, and the Thames from Oxford to the Nore, was the suggester of the luncheon party in the Temple, quite as much as the scene at the Trout Inn, at Tickleton-on-Thames. The puns which have been adversely commented on were certainly for the most part Byron's; and it was a delicate task to expunge or suppress any joke that really came from his fertile brain. Byron's text, so far as it stood, was reverently treated by Mr. Sterry; and no doubt by this time the actual story of "The Lady of Lyons" has been more closely followed than it was at the outset, particularly in the second act, where frequent opportunities occur for burlesquing the garden-scene, where Claude Melnotte, in the presence of Beauseant and Colonel Damas, poses so impudently as the Prince of Como. I should have thought that this would have been the finest moment for Mr. Toole's fun. The "snuff-box," the ring that "married the Adriatic," and once belonged to my uncle the Doge, even the duel with Damas, could have been, and no doubt are by this time, humorously treated, and will put the hall-mark of success on a very promising play. Mr. Toole as Job Pell, the sentimental tailor, is admirable; and the scene where, disguised as the captain's butler, he waits upon his beloved Araminta at luncheon, and in his flurry upsets the oysters over her father's bald head, is farce of the most amusing kind. The characters in Lytton's romantic drama are carefully imitated throughout. Mr. E. D. Ward, a clever young actor with a nice sense of parody, is the Beauseant turned into a cynical captain with iron-grey hair and an eye-glass; Miss Eliza Johnstone, whose comedy is always sparkling and refreshing, appears as the Widow Melnotte, or rather an old laundress in the Temple, who eventually becomes landlady of the inn to which Mr. Claude Melnotte Toole brings his charming Pauline. And she is indeed charming as presented by Miss Marie Linden in a boating costume of cream cashmere and Eton blue, an actress who is sympathetic and pretty in all she undertakes. Mr. Westland is the Colonel Damas, a character that will bear elaborating; and Mr. Billington with Miss Emily Thorne complete the idea as M. and Madame Deschapelles, who are in turn proud of and disgusted at their sartorial son-in-law, who, of course, comes into a fortune, and is reconciled to his æsthetic Araminta. There is far too much good stuff in this play to allow it to be blown to the winds by the first puff of criticism, and it would not be at all surprising to find that, like the once condemned "Private Secretary," it had been worked up into a genuine success.

Since the days of Robertson, I do not think I have heard more genuine laughter or more hearty applause in a theatre than were awakened by the first performance of Mr. Sydney Grundy's new comedy, "A Silver Shield." It was on the occasion of a benefit matinée, given at the Strand Theatre to Miss Amy Roselle; and the house was naturally crowded with theatrical people. As good luck would have it, the humour of the play deals mainly with the inner life of actors and actresses on the stage, and turns the limelight upon the petty anxieties and squabbles and slang and jealousies of professional people. The heroine, or one of the heroines, is a bumptious actress; the husband of the second heroine is a struggling dramatic author; the great character in the play is a manager who treats his artists as if they were slaves, and has about as much respect for the "art" with which he is connected as the butcher has for the ox he slaughters. How little did the actors and actresses know, who roared with laughter and tickled one another's sides with delight over the airs of the heroine actress and the uncompromising vulgarity of the theatre manager, what a splendid satire Mr. Grundy had prepared, and with what Mephistophelian skill he was digging a pitfall for the theatrical craze. "Ah! wad some power the giftie gie us to see ourselves as others see us!" Mr. Grundy has done it in one of the cleverest plays that has been produced in London for many a long year. Not even Mr. Gilbert himself could have conceived so apparently an innocent, but in reality so subtle and elaborate a bit of cynicism. At the outset, these innocent theatrical people, who are fonder of "shop" than any people in the world, think that they have only been laughing with Mr. Grundy. But when they get home and think over the play; when they remember what has been said and done; when they recall the fact that so much of the pettiness and insincerity connected with their so-called art has been ruthlessly exposed; when they remember how absolutely true to life is the Mrs. Blake of their clever play, and how faithful to Nature is Mr. Dick, the matter-of-fact and unsentimental manager, then they will know clearly enough that Mr. Sydney Grundy has been laughing at them. In Thackeray, in Robertson, and in Gilbert there was the same kind of acerbity of cynicism that exists in this latest and by far the most brilliant work yet produced by Mr. Grundy. But they had their tender moments. The sweet, as a rule, overpowered the bitter. It is the reverse with Mr. Grundy. He sees more cruelty in life than kindness. His cynicism outweighs his sentiment. In all the characters introduced in this play there is not one happy person. Reflect upon that. The old baronet has quarelled with his son; the son has not only quarelled with his father but is temporarily separated from his young wife; the worldly-minded actress is separated from her husband; the cynical artist has deserted his wife; the old parson, a humbug of the deepest dye, annoys the old partner of his life; the parson's wife is jealous of her elderly husband; even the young and pretty girl, who has tenderness and sweetness in her nature, is soured and disappointed after a few months or so of married life. No one can say that it is not all true—no one can deny the skill of the dramatist or can fail to praise his cutting retorts and incisive epigrams. But is it not a strange circumstance to find this eagerness to relish all that is heart-rending about us, and this delight of the theatre to trumpet forth to the world its own fallibility! Mr. Grundy is indeed a dramatist of the day. He understands the people about him; he has carefully studied the age in which he lives. Nay, more, he has proved, by the enthusiasm he has created over this work, that the bitterness of human nature is a more pleasant theme for contemplation than any sweetness that may exist in life. It is amusing, no one can doubt it; it is true, no one can gainsay it; but the after-taste is terrible. Instead of going to the theatre to be softened and made more charitable under its influence, we return from it more disgusted with life than before. The play was unequally acted. Once more Miss Kate Rorke distinguished herself and in a new department of her art. She is far more than the ingénue, she has promise of being an actress of considerable emotional power. In one strong scene of anguish, the young wife parting from her home, Miss Rorke brought down the house. Mr. Groves and Miss Amy Roselle were admirable as the manager and the actress. They relished the truth of Mr. Grundy's satire; but it seemed to me that the artist and the parson, played by Mr. Dacre and Mr. Rutland Barrington, were somehow misunderstood. They were both far too conscious, and gave unreality instead of reality to the scene. But of the success of the play there can be no doubt: whether a general audience, unposted in current dramatic journalism and gossip, will care for "theatrical shop" as much as actors and actresses do, is another point altogether. If they do, Mr. Grundy is perfectly right to exercise his gifts in his own way and to reproduce society as he finds it.

Morning performances, now so common, the trial-grounds for theatrical campaigns, have not resulted in much else of interest. The play called "Judael," by Mrs. Julius Pollock, produced on the occasion of the benefit of Mrs. Conover, at the Olympic, is too grimly serious for modern tastes, when hired assassins, miserly Jews, and entombed maidens provoke laughter instead of dread. The character of Judael, boldly sketched by the authoress, and admirably played by Mr. Fernandez, is striking enough, but the play is sadly lacking in female interest, and wants balance.

Mr. Austin Brereton, the industrious compiler of "Dramatic Notes," has brought that valuable and handy little periodical up to date, and given us a careful and accurate résumé of the theatrical history of the past two years. No theatrical library is complete without this book, which, by-the-way, is capitally indexed.

CITY ECHOES.

Wednesday, May 20.

By a further reduction of ½ per cent the Bank of England standard rate of discount has got to be but 2½ per cent. This time last year it was also 2½, and early in June it was further lowered to 2 per cent. The reserve had then remained nearly sixteen millions. It is now greatly in excess of that total, and unless something contrary occurs, the rate will need to be quickly reduced to 2 per cent. The full measure of the present depression in the money market is, however, even more apparent in the rates of discount current in the open market. Three months' bills are discounted at 1 per cent per annum, and loans from day to day are made at ½. There is consequently the greatest discouragement to depositors, and it is not surprising that the disposition to buy securities increases. Prices are generally still rising under the demand so originating, and, with some exceptions, the level is higher than it was a week ago.

With the defeat of Riel and his adherents at Batoche, and his subsequent surrender, it is assumed that the rising in the Canadian North-West has received such a fatal blow that its complete extinction can only now be a question of days. This has naturally had a beneficial effect upon Hudson's Bay shares, and it has helped to make Canadian Pacific shares rise, another consideration in this case being that some further progress has been made towards the harmonious working of this company with the Grand Trunk company. This time the agreement is as to through traffic from Europe, and speculators fairly conclude that if the joint use of the North Shore line and the taking of European traffic at agreed rates are regarded as desirable, there can be nothing to prevent similar association as to the Ontario and Quebec division. Some estimates have been put forward as to the saving to the Grand Trunk of these arrangements, but it is certainly not well to presume upon any figures. It is, however, undoubted that the loss arising from dividing the traffic with a newcomer is diminished by an agreement which should prevent cutting of rates.

Hitherto, it has been customary for many holders of foreign bonds to avoid income tax on their coupons by selling the coupons to agents, who remit them for collection to a non-income-tax country, when there has been this option; and as regards some Russian issues, the coupons have fetched good prices for remittance to Russia for use in the payment of import and other duties. The new Budget proposals include provisions for making the buyers of such coupons responsible for the deduction of income tax, and the payment thereof to the Commissioners. Each buyer is to deliver a statement of the coupons passing through his hands, and his evasion of what is required of him is to subject him to a penalty of £100 over and above the duty withheld.

The Victorian Government Four per Cent Loan of £4,000,000 and the Queensland Four per Cent Loan of £2,500,000 were both successful, the former being allotted at an average of £100 13s. 9d. per cent, and the latter at £97 19s. 3d. When deductions are made for delayed payments, &c., the prices are a little more to the advantage of the purchasers than these figures indicate. As is usual in such cases, the bulk of the stock was taken by syndicates, who look to gradually retail it to the public at an advance.

A first dividend of 4 per cent is announced by the Shanghai Waterworks Company, from which it would seem that that little British investment is safely through its preliminary trials.

The National Fire Insurance Company are to pay a dividend of 3 per cent, after doing nothing in that way for the two preceding years.

A dividend of 57½ is again announced by the Liverpool and London and Globe Insurance Company. The Atlas Insurance Company are to pay 16s. per share as compared with 15s. for 1883; and the Equity and Law Life are, for the next five years, to pay £1 2s. per share, as compared with 17s. 6d.

The Trust and Loan Company of Canada make a good report for the past half-year. The dividend is again 6 per cent per annum, while the amounts carried to reserve and to next account, respectively, compare favourably with recent experience.

KRASNOVODSK AND THE TRANSCASPIAN RAILWAY.

The schemes of Russia in Central Asia are likely to make Krasnovodsk more celebrated in the future than it is at present. This town is to become the terminus of the new Transcaspian Railway, which is to be carried to Merv, Bokhara, and Samarcand in one direction, and to Sarakhs, Herat, Candahar, and in the direction of India in another. A portion of this line is already made, and working from Michaelovsk to Kizil Arvat, a distance of 144 miles. Michaelovsk is on the Caspian, but the water is so shallow there that nothing but barges, drawing little water, can approach the place. Krasnovodsk is one of the few places on the shores of the Caspian which has deep water close to the shore. Russia has made more than one attempt to establish a port on the eastern coast of the Caspian, but they have all failed from the shallow water extending far out to sea. Fort Alexandrovsk had the disadvantage of being frozen about four months in the year; and at Chikishliar the water is so shallow that the steamers have to remain about a mile from the beach. Krasnovodsk has one great drawback as a town, it has almost no fresh water; the place has to be supplied by means of condensing the sea water; luckily, petroleum can be procured very cheaply from Baku, and from the island of Cheleken, and while the supply of fuel lasts it is no difficult task to provide the distilled water. The Bay of Krasnovodsk is so large and well protected that it is undoubtedly a splendid harbour. Troops and supplies for the Transcaspian province have all to be sent to Krasnovodsk, where they are transhipped into barges and towed to Michaelovsk, which occupies about a day, after which they then proceed by railway. The extension of the railway between Michaelovsk and Krasnovodsk will be nearly 100 miles. This extension is not intended at present, as the Russian Government are using all their endeavours in pushing on the line from Kizil Arvat to Askabad and Sarakhs. Krasnovodsk was only begun in the year 1870, from which it will be understood that it is still a very young town. Its history is still in the future; but probabilities point to its name becoming prominent as the policy of Russia develops itself in Central Asia. If war should take place, as the base of supplies, its military importance will be great. In peace it will be the starting-point from which Russian commerce will penetrate into Central Asia, Persia, Afghanistan, and even to India. As large portions of Turkestan will now be changed from a desert to a cultivated condition, Krasnovodsk will become the principal outlet for the productions of that part of the world. As Batoum, with its railway to Baku, on the Caspian, is superseding the older port of Trebizond, so this young naval station will soon take away the commercial influence of Astrabad and Resht, which have long enjoyed the privilege of being the gateways of trade into Persia and the far East. General Annenkoff, the head of the Russian railway system in Russia, has still further extended views regarding this port and the railway in connection with it. He anticipates that when the line is finished to Sarakhs, and when the Indian railway system has been carried on to Kandahar and Herat, the junction of lines will be made, and when this is accomplished, that the long-desired railway communication between Europe and India will be an accomplished result. When this takes place, the Suez Canal will have a formidable rival, and all persons who wish to save time in the journey from London to Bombay or Calcutta will travel by this new overland route. It has been estimated that if special trains and steamers were arranged, then the journey from Charing-cross to the Indus could be done in about eleven or twelve days, a very little more than half the time occupied now in London to Bombay by the Suez Canal. This new route would be through Europe to Odessa; then by steamer on the Black Sea to Batoum; here the Batoum-Tiflis Railway to Baku on the Caspian begins; from Baku to Krasnovodsk by steamer takes about eighteen or twenty hours; from Krasnovodsk the line passes by Kizil Arvat, Geok Tepé, and Askabad to Sarakhs; from that along the line of the Heri-Rud to Herat; and then on to Candahar and the Indus, where the Indian railways will convey the traveller to any point he may desire. Such is the scheme which Russian foresight is working out. Somewhere between Askabad and Sarakhs the line to Merv will branch off. This will ultimately be continued across the Oxus, and on to Bokhara and Samarcand, a very fertile and rich district, whose resources will thus find a way into Russia and Europe. It may be here pointed out that a large portion of Central Asia, although now a desert, is not necessarily so, and that in the past it was cultivated and populous; large cities existed which were famed in history. Peace only is required for this condition of things to return again; and a new era will begin in the history of Central Asia.

In the event of war taking place on the frontiers of India, this railway will enable Russia to forward on her soldiers and war material in a manner which will give her immense advantages. This new condition of things, which only dates from the last three or four years, has entirely changed the whole aspect of the Central Asian question. Previously, it was understood that a large and inhospitable desert existed between Afghanistan and the Russian position in Turkestan; and also that there was a high and almost impassable barrier in the Paropamisan range of mountains, between Central Asia and India. On the east this range is undoubtedly high, and presents difficulties; but on the west, between the Murghab and the Heri-Rud, the range is of no great height, and a railway through it is now known to be perfectly practicable. Skobeleff's campaign, which terminated in the capture of Geok Tepé, ultimately led to the occupation of Merv and Sarakhs. These events, with the construction of the Transcaspian railway, have completely altered Russia's position in the East, and given her a military base from which the invasion of India becomes a question of the most serious import to England. Russia can now push on her troops from the Caucasus, by means of the ports of Baku and Derbend, from Astrakan, to which the whole Russian railway system is connected. She can also send soldiers. The Mercury and Caucasus Steam Company on the Caspian have a large fleet of fine steamers. They are largely subsidised, on condition that their vessels are to be at the use of the Government whenever they should be required. There is also a small fleet of war steamers; and in addition to that there are the steamers engaged in the new trade of petroleum from Baku—the Nobel Brothers have themselves a fleet of forty vessels: all these could be utilised as transports. With such means Russia could now pour her regiments into Krasnovodsk, and by means of the railway they would soon be on the frontier of India. Russia is at present using every means to hasten on the works of this line. It is understood that a great many of the soldiers lately sent over to Central Asia are being employed in this way. It is expected that in another year the line will be open to Askabad, and two years more ought to see it in working order as far as Sarakhs. The ground is level, so there are no great engineering difficulties to encounter.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

THIRD NOTICE.

Resuming our survey of this exhibition, Mr. Alma Tadema's portrait of "My Youngest Daughter" (386) is, after Mr. Herkomer's work, already described, the most important work in Gallery IV. Studied simplicity, both in costume and accessories, has been kept in view by the artist; and he has been well inspired in allowing the work to appeal on this ground to public taste. A plain spotted dress, a glass of flowers in her hand, and a simple door, of which she is holding the handle, are the only materials which are skilfully brought together to set off a most lifelike likeness. Of the President's "Frieze" (344) we have already spoken; but his portrait of "Mrs. A. Hichens" (300) has a somewhat pinched look, which mars the gracefulness of the figure; whilst the "Phœbe" (346), although pretty, is somewhat inane. Mr. Bryan Hook's "Gathering Eggs in the Cliffs of Lundy" (312) is a clever and promising work, and is all the more interesting as adding another to the list of Academicians' sons who this year have acquitted themselves so well, Mr. W. F. Calderon and Mr. J. F. Faed, to whom we should also add an Academician's daughter, Miss Alma Tadema. Mr. Schafer's somewhat complicated allegory "Fame" (317) is pleasant in colour and careful as an academic composition; but seems to be wanting in the life with which Mr. Markham Skipwith's unpretentious "Kittens" (318), a girl playing with a white cat, is overflowing. Of Mr. E. J. Poynter's "Diadumené" (322), in spite of its affected title, one must speak with caution. The lower limbs of the woman about to step into the bath can scarcely have been inspired by a Greek or even an Italian model; but the whole of the rest of the figure is admirable, and the pose skilfully reproduces that of the bronze figure (now in the museum of the Capitol) which ornaments the alcove of the luxurious bath-room. Mr. Henry Wood's three little bits of Venetian street-life—"The Water-Seller of San Rocco" (337), "Bartering" (350), and "Returned from the Rialto" (379)—are full of rich colours and bright sunlight. Mr. Perugini's graceful figure "Cup and Ball" (361), with its delicate colouring, is absolutely ruined by hanging so close to Mr. Herkomer's brilliant work, and Mr. Albert Moore's "White Hydrangea" (356), a study of colour and a parody of pose, shares the same fate. Mrs. Perugini's delightfully arch child's portrait, "Mollie's Ball Dress" (366), is full of subdued childlike vanity and self-consequence, and is painted with a softer hand than usual. Of the works by less known names in this room, Mr. Hamilton Jackson's "St. Dorothea" (301), a Pagan Christian diptych, Mr. W. L. Picknell's "Brockenhurst Road" (339), Mr. Fred Brown's "Rural England" (335), and Mr. E. Matthew Hale's "Work" (391), deserve notice.

In Gallery No. V. an enormous expanse of wall is occupied by Mr. F. Goodall's "Gordon's Last Messenger" (432), a gaunt Arab on a dromedary flying across the starlit desert, possibly very accurate, but obviously evolved from the artist's inner consciousness. At any rate, it is in every respect more interesting than Mr. Herbert's two works by which it is flanked. Mr. Rudolf Lehmann's "Portrait of Dr. Priestley" (482), is without character; but that of "Sir Richard Wallace" (471), by Mr. W. B. Symonds, in spite of a straining after simplicity which is too obvious, gives promise of better things. Mr. J. W. Waterhouse's "St. Eulalia" (503) is quite the best thing in this room. The saint is lying at the foot of the cross on which she has suffered martyrdom—a miraculous snowstorm covering her body with its white flakes. The artist has somewhat missed the point of the legend by clothing the maiden, but the work he has done is good. It should be compared with Mr. Maynard Brown's still more ambitious work, "Zenobia" (121), in Gallery II., a picture cleverly composed and painted with spirit, but which loses much of its force for want of concentrated interest. Among the other pictures the most attractive are Mr. Tom Lloyd's "Supper for Three" (496), Mr. John Morgan's "Don't 'ee Tipty Toe" (433), and the fresh bit of English country scenery, "The Happy Valley" (513), by Mr. Arthur Reddie, whose name is quite unfamiliar, but who seems to have more than a mere amateur's appreciation of open air.

The brilliancy of Mr. L. Fildes' "Venetians" (559) eclipses many of its neighbours in Gallery VI. by its brilliant colouring. Starting with a group of handsome girls seated beside a canal, as in his last year's picture, Mr. Fildes has thrown more life and movement into the scene by the introduction of passers-by in the background, and a group of workmen playing cards and drinking in front of a cancora di vino. Mr. Henry Moore's "Newhaven Packet" (533) should ensure him a place amongst the next batch of Associates, for most certainly there is not one member of the Academy, Mr. Hook included, who could render the rolling sea and rain-charged storm-driven clouds with such truth. Mr. Arthur Cope's portrait of "Mr. C. Pelham Villiers" (549) somewhat painfully exaggerates the weakness which old age has impressed upon a face which was once strikingly bold and handsome. Mr. Leader's "Hedgerow elms on hillocks green" (555) is decidedly better than many of the landscapes which he produces with almost fatal facility. The bright sun on the weald below and the blue hills beyond are pleasant to look upon, but his treatment of them scarcely reveals the magician's power. Mr. Poynter, in his portrait of "Mrs. Skipp Lloyd" (571), seems to have imagined that the spectator would be more interested in the pattern of the Persian carpet, on which he has spent vast labour, than on the figure of the lady, whose pose is at once uncomfortable and ungraceful. Mr. Atkinson Grimshawe's "Salthouse Dock" (575) is among the noteworthy pictures in this room, and although it is less striking than the artist's other work, "Dulce Domum," to which we shall have occasion to refer, it will probably attract greater approval. It represents a Liverpool quay on a wet evening, when the gaslights throw sharp shadows across the gloom, and the driven clouds scarcely reveal the ships' masts in the pale moonlight. The picture is conceived in the spirit of Mr. Frank Holl's earlier works, is thoroughly realistic, and without even an effort at sentiment. Mr. John Sargent's portrait of "Lady Playfair" (586), though clever, is conceived in the very worst spirit of contemporary French art. Its technical ability may be generally admitted, although the modelling of the arms is the reverse of graceful; but the failure of the attempt to portray a "grande dame" is painfully conspicuous. Mr. Matthew Hale, on the other hand, who has also studied in Paris, grows stronger every year; and although "Rest" (588) is hardly up to the level of interest aroused by his picture at the Grosvenor—"In the Days of Phidias"—it shows careful study and an ever-increasing mastery over the technical difficulties of his art. Three landscapes of unequal merit, but which deserve attention, are Mr. Joseph Knight's "Solitude" (605), the green top of a mountain; Mr. A. Wallace Remington's "Edge of the Hallstadter See" (595), a peaceful scene of meadow and lake, but wanting in the sublimity of the original; and Mr. Laidlay's "Twilight on the Marsh" (615). Three single figures have also been hung in close proximity, as if to challenge comparison: Miss Henrietta Rae's "Bacchante" (623), Mr. Arthur Hill's "Mœnad" (629), and Mr. W. Lomas's "Almond-Blossoms" (630), a young girl in pink. Of these, the last-named, in spite of its unfavourable position, displays gracefulness of pose and delicacy of colour rarely met with among younger artists, and favourably distinguishes it among the pictures of the present year.

The honours of Gallery VIII. are divided, as far as hanging goes, between Mr. MacWhirter and Mr. Colin Hunter; but we expect that public taste will reverse this judgment in favour of Mr. G. H. Boughton's "Visit of Andrew Marvell to Milton" (663), "the poet blind yet bold." The scene is laid in Bunhill-fields, then almost country, whither Milton had retired to end his days with his young wife, who, in her pretty Quaker dress, is seated beside him. Marvell, dressed in courtly black, is bowing ceremoniously over the extended hand of the old man, who, in spite of his sorrows and troubles, is still a courteous and hospitable host. The other figures are of that type which Mr. Boughton's New England pictures have made familiar to us, and all full of a quiet grace and holy calm. Mr. MacWhirter's "Track of the Hurricane" (662) is the head of a rocky defile strewn with broken boughs and uprooted trees, once the scene of a giant's strife, but now all peaceful and smiling. Mr. Colin Hunter, in giving "The Rapids of Niagara above the Falls" (700), has over-estimated either his own powers or the artistic resources of the scene. The broken water, eddying and flashing in the sunlight, is well conceived; but there is a monotony of colour and a hardness of touch which mar the general effect. Mr. Andrew Gow's "Absolution for the Lost at Sea" (656) is a crowded scene, full of priests and choristers, who, from the summit of a rock, are praying "for those who go down to the sea in ships," and thus associating the lives of those afloat with those ashore. It is an effective scene, although wanting in Mr. Gow's ordinary dramatic verve. Mr. W. L. Wyllie's "Debatable Ground" (679), the muddy estuary of a river, left exposed by the retreating tide, and flecked by crows and falling snow, is a weird and chilly scene, most powerfully rendered. Mr. Inchbold's "Lac Leman" (682), as well as his "Dent du Midi" (716), are fairy-like studies of lake and mountain effects, not so fanciful as to place them outside the limits of the probable, but giving evidence of a strong imaginative power combined with a careful observation of nature. Mr. Weedon Grossmith's view of life (699) is, we fancy, somewhat highly coloured; but, as he has so skilfully mastered its perspective, we can only hope that he is equally sure of his tints; but Mr. Yates Carrington, in his triptych "Hamlet and Polonius" (713-5), the story of a dog and a rat told with admirable humour, comes, we fear, nearer to the truth of the life problem. Mr. Solomon Solomon's portrait of Mrs. Ludwig Messel, in a sea of light blue satin and brocade, is, in spite of its affectation, a very delightful work, and fully maintains this rising artist's early promise.

ART NOTES.

The Marquis of Lorne has consented to open the summer exhibition of the Yorkshire Fine-Art Institution, at York, on June 11.

The Duchess of Edinburgh, who was accompanied by the Duke of Edinburgh, opened at Grosvenor House last week the annual art exhibition in aid of the Parochial Mission Women Fund, in presence of a distinguished company.

The second exhibition in pastels of drawings and sketches, abroad and at home, by H. A. Seymour, will open next Monday at 102, New Bond-street; and an exhibition of paintings, drawings, and etchings will be opened at Messrs. Gladwell's Gallery, 14, Gracechurch-street, on Tuesday next.

The sculptors invited by the Corporation to compete for the new statue of Queen Anne in front of St. Paul's are Messrs. Macarthy, Fontana, Birch, Bult, Sheldon, and Lanteret. The Corporation have voted £1800 to defray the expense, but, having regard to the importance of the work, it is believed that that amount must be exceeded.

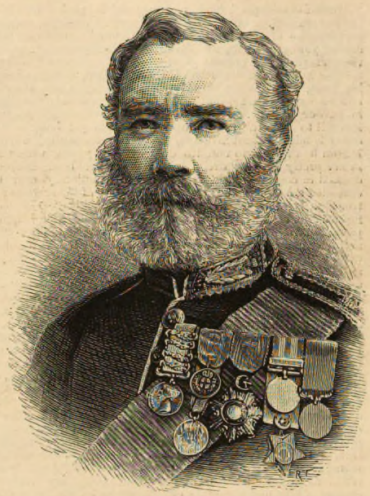
Messrs W. H. Weatherhead, H. Caffieri, John Scott, and Thomas Pyne have been elected members of the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours; and Mr. Edward Combes, C.M.G., of Sydney, New South Wales, has been chosen an honorary member of the Institute.—Messrs. E. Blair Leighton and Henry Robertson have been elected members of the Dudley Gallery.

The exhibition of engravings by William Woollett, brought together at the Fine-Art Society's rooms, New Bond-street, is especially interesting to those who saw the Eighteenth-Century French engravings at the same place a few months ago. Woollett, although not the founder of the English School of Engraving, did as much as anyone to bring it to a high degree of perfection under the enlightened patronage of Alderman Boydell. It was through Woollett that the English public first became acquainted with the classic works of Richard Wilson, "the father of English landscape"—and his renderings of that artist's "Niobe" and "Phaeton" would alone justify his claim to favour. It was, however, by a more recent work, the engraving of the "Death of General Wolfe," after Sir Benjamin West's well-known picture, that Woollett has been most widely known. As the picture itself was not exhibited until 1771, Woollett, who was born in 1735, must, at the time he undertook the engraving, have been at his prime; although, perhaps, there is greater artistic sense displayed in the engraving of the "Battle of La Hogue," where the treatment of the water is very successful. Woollett was probably the first engraver who, in the production of his plates, combined etching with engraving. Some of the "states" bear evidence of the extent to which he relied upon his graver to produce the more characteristic effects, leaving the foliage, clouds, and general setting of the principal figure to be done by means of the needle and acid. There are, in addition, a few of Woollett's own works, which, however, display but little originality. He had learnt to rely so completely on the ideas of others, that he stumbles in attempting to widen his own. The exhibition, which is due to the energy of Mr. Louis Fagan, is intended as a sort of centenary fête to the engraver, Woollett having died on May 23, 1785.

Messrs. Howell and James have for the tenth time offered hospitality to the ladies and amateurs who are working, with so much perseverance and no little success, to establish painting on porcelain as a national art. The constantly increasing demand upon the space available for exhibition is not the only sign of the results attained, for there is abundant evidence that the general average of merit rises year by year. For example, Miss Dorothy Palmer's "Chrysanthemums" (887) are a model of delicate colour and careful painting; and amongst the figure subjects, Miss Bessie Gilson's "Life's Young Dream" (902), a girl in a simple grey dress holding a branch of apple-blossom, is not less remarkable. To the former a silver medal and to the latter the Princess Alice Prize have been most justly awarded. Amongst the other prize-winners may be mentioned Madame Meichelheine's portrait of "Miss Schneider" (61), taking the silver medal offered to foreign professionals; Miss Rosa Jameson Strutt, whose large plaque, "Consider the Lilies" (912), carries off the Crown Princess of Prussia's gold badge; Mrs. Rose Swain's "Orchids" (329), which obtains Princess Christian's silver badge; whilst a similar prize, offered by the Countess of Flanders, is awarded to Mrs. Willingham Rawnsley, for an excessively pretty and yet simple tea service, in red and white (496). An almost equally useful prize is that offered by Princess Mary for a decorated dessert service, and carried off by Miss Weiss; but her prize work, charming as it is, is surpassed by that displayed in the decoration of a "Primrose" service ordered by her Majesty. The other principal prize-winners are M. G. Léonce, Mrs. Sparkes, Miss Welby, Miss Edith Mallett, and Mrs. Mansell; but these by no means exhaust the list of those who acquit themselves with more than credit in this branch of art.

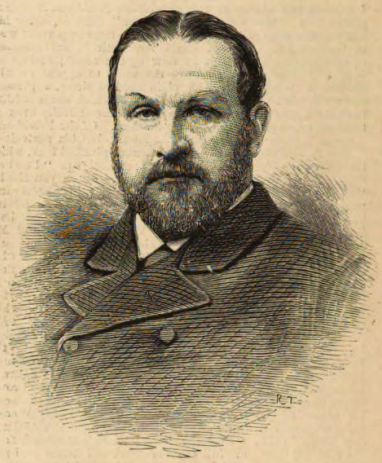
The portrait of General Gordon, by Mr. Lowes Dickinson, now on view at the British Gallery, Pall-mall, will be certain to attract many who have been fascinated by the career of that extraordinary meteor. The General, in his dark engineer uniform, rendered still more sombre by the black burnous, is represented on the roof of his residence at Khartoum at early sunrise, his bible in one hand, his field-glass in the other. There is more quiet dignity and repose in the figure than we expect, and the eyes are wanting in that strange wrapt look of the ancient seer which those who had once seen him could never entirely forget. But twelve months of anxiety and disappointment amid the burning sands of the African desert may well have subdued their fire, and supplanted rare hopefulness by sorrow and despair. The profits of the exhibition of the portrait of the modern "Cid Compeador" will be given to the Gordon Memorial Fund.

The managers of the Nineteenth-Century Art Society (Conduit-street) would, we think, have been well advised had they postponed their summer exhibition for a while. There are already too many picture galleries open where works of first-rate merit are to be seen, and the addition of another where the level is scarcely above the mediocre is unwise. Mr. Thomas Henry's "Old Sunderland" (218), Mr. A. D. Peppercorn's "Evening Star" (188), Mr. W. Padgett's "Moon Bring Him Home" (169), and the same artist's "Mellow Moon" (158), Mr. Aubrey Hunt's "Venice" (127), Mr. A. K. Brown's "Estuary of the Clyde" (113), and Mr. T. F. Goodall's "Tying Rushes" (39), are among the best of the landscapes; whilst among the figure-pictures Mr. W. Scott's "Zucca Sellers" (14), Mr. E. W. Blomefield's "Catechism" (140), Mr. W. Lomas' "Getting Better" (31), and Signor Guardabassi's "Native Minstrel" (273), are the most attractive. The water colours, on the whole, are more interesting than the oil pictures, and include some pretty sketches by Messrs. F. P. Barraud, J. B. Hardy, G. Guardabassi, Edwin Calvert, and others.



The directors of the Crystal Palace deserved a better response to the hospitality they offered to the "unlucky" of Burlington House. Out of two thousand works which were originally accepted by the "Veiled and Secret Council of Ten" who make and mar the fortunes of aspirants to art fame, only about a hundred have been sent to Sydenham; and some of these are not of the highest order. One must, therefore, surmise that a number of artists repeatedly send to the Royal Academy the same work; as a well-known artist is reputed to have done, at length obtaining upon the walls a favourable place for a picture which had been rejected for four or five successive years. If the idea put forward by the directors of the Crystal Palace had been taken up in the spirit it was offered, such suspicion would be out of place; but it is difficult to believe, after the cries of rage and disappointment to which the painters of the "want of space" pictures gave vent, that they would have thrown away the opportunity offered of challenging the decision of the Hanging Committee by an appeal to a popular verdict. The fear of offending the Burlington House authorities was, no doubt, present to the minds of many; but it is this very feeling which stands in the way of a radical cure of the abuses which on all sides are admitted to exist in the administration of the Royal Academy of Arts. In the hope, therefore, that next year the Crystal Palace proposal will be more warmly supported, we will mention a few of the works which, in our opinion, contrast favourably with many which for some occult reason commend themselves to the eyes of the "Hangers." Among such are Mr. L. Sutcliffe's "Sunlit Shore" (51) and "Swift Falls the Night" (273), two pictures rich in tone and colour, which may be compared with the same artist's "Early Morning Workers" (313), a study of French peasant life and of Millet's method of painting. Mr. Harry E. James's "Timber Barks" (309) is vigorous; and, amongst subject-pictures, Mr. M. E. Kindon's "My father urged me sair, my mither didna speak" (290), is a very simple and well-painted story, after the manner of Faed. Miss S. C. Harrison's portrait of "Miss L. E. Harrison" (279) is one of those very bold struggles with the difficulties of art which deserved a fuller recognition—the lights and shadows in the folds of a white dress being rendered with very scrupulous care, and without pedantry; whilst Mr. W. Lomas' portrait of "Mr. Luxmoor Marshall" (330), in a loose brown overcoat, has a dash and vigour too frequently wanting in the wooden, highly-stippled works which find favour in Piccadilly. The Baroness Von Preuschen's "Flowers" (314), Miss Katherine Bywater's "Lordling's Daughter" (319), Miss Florence Cooper's "Desolate," and Miss M. Grose's "Sunset at St. Ives" (6) are among the other deserving works. The hanging of the pictures, rendered easy by the space available, is very satisfactory; and much credit is due to Mr. G. A. Storey for his taste and advice in the arrangement of the exhibition, to which, by-the-way, he contributes a set of water-colour studies made ten years ago for his popular picture, "The Blue Girls of Canterbury."

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Lee, of 9, Savile-row, Burlington-gardens, gave a most interesting "At Home" a few evenings ago, at which they entertained 160 guests. During the evening Dr. Samuel Kinns, F.R.A.S., author of "Moses and Geology," gave a lecture upon "The Harmony of the Bible with Science," illustrated with numerous diagrams and geological specimens. Although the lecture lasted for an hour and a half, the audience listened the whole time with rapt attention. One special feature of the party was the large number of scientists present, who appeared to be greatly interested in the proceedings. After supper, music and a recitation by Mrs. Van Praag concluded Mrs. Lee's charming "At Home."



A deeply interesting ceremony in connection with the new Theatrical Institute Society took place last Saturday, when four memorial-stones of the new institute in Henrietta-street were laid by the Countess of Aberdeen, Miss Fowler, Mrs. Bond Cabbell, and Mrs. Horace B. Marshall. The sum of £392 in cash and promises was announced as the result of the gathering, completing the first £1000 of the £4000 required for the erection of the premises. The speakers were representative of every section of the Christian Church. Mr. Courthope Todd, the founder and director, told how the work had grown from one room in 1879, when the income was £18; and traced its successive stages to the present time, when ten rooms are in use by the young ladies and children, youths and boys of the profession as institutes and clubs. The income ending May 3 amounted to £1700. Any communications may be made to Mr. Courthope Todd, 21, King-street, Covent-garden.

THE CHURCH.

The Archbishop of Canterbury entertained at dinner at Lambeth Palace on Tuesday evening the Archbishop of York, the Archbishop of Dublin, the Bishops of London, Durham, Winchester, Bath and Wells, Carlisle, Chester, Chichester, Gloucester and Bristol, Hereford, Lichfield, Llandaff, Manchester, Newcastle, Oxford, St. Asaph, Southwell, Truro, Derry, Brechin, Dover, Bedford, Colchester, Melanesia, Pretoria, Antigua and Victoria, Hong-Kong, Bishop Perry, and the Dean of Windsor; Archdeacon Harrison, Canon Cadman, Canon Hole, Canon Smith, Canon Elwyn, Dr. Wace, the Rev. C. B. Hutchison, and the Rev. Montague Fowler (Chaplains).

On Wednesday morning the enthronisation of the Bishop of Lincoln took place in the Cathedral. The Mayor and Corporation met the Bishop at the sub-deanery (the deanery is vacant), and accompanied him to the Minster, passing through the 3rd Battalion of the Lincolnshire Regiment. All the members of the Chapter were present, forty-eight prebendaries, and 270 of the parochial clergy of the diocese, besides a large number of laity and ladies, the Dean of Manchester, the Rev. Dr. Gott, and many clergy from other dioceses.

In the theatre of the London Institution, Mr. Mundella on Monday evening presented to the Rev. W. T. Thornhill-Webber, the Bishop-Elect of Brisbane, a handsome testimonial which has been subscribed for by the teachers of the Board schools in the metropolis, by way of marking their appreciation of the great services he has rendered in the promotion of education.

The Bishop of Exeter was entertained at a banquet on Tuesday by the Mayor and Corporation of the city in the Guildhall. Amongst those who were present on the invitation of the Mayor to meet his Lordship were Earl Fortescue, the Dean of Exeter, Colonel Fremantle, commanding the brigade depôt, and some Nonconformist ministers.

The installation of the Very Rev. H. Montagne Butler, D.D., Head Master of Harrow, as Dean of Gloucester, is fixed to take place in the cathedral at Gloucester to-day (Saturday).

The Rev. Canon Jacob has been informed by the anonymous donor of £15,000 towards the erection of a new parish church for Portsea, that he is willing to extend the time for raising a similar sum, the condition upon which the offer was made, from August 1 to a date to be hereafter named. Altogether about £10,000 has been raised or guaranteed. The new church will be one of the finest in England.

Mrs. Gladstone laid the foundation-stone of the Sunday Schools in connection with the Church of St. Michael and All Angels', Walthamstow, on Wednesday afternoon.

The committee having in hand the work of restoring St. Michael's Church, Coventry, have provisionally accepted a tender for the execution of nearly the whole of the restoration, at a cost of £31,163.

The Goldsmiths' Company have contributed £200, and the Mercers' Company £100, to the fund which is being raised for carrying out the restoration of the fine old Norman Church of St. Bartholomew the Great, West Smithfield.

At a meeting of the council of the Soldiers and Sailors Families Association, held last Saturday, the Princess of Wales presiding, the following amounts lately received were reported:—From the Kent committee, second and third instalment, £204; Lancaster committee, £60; Warwickshire committee, second instalment, £50; Oldham committee, £200; Yorkshire committee, first and second instalment, £631; Liverpool committee, third instalment, £140; Staffordshire committee, £140; per Lady Constance Stanley, Preston, and neighbourhood, £117. It was resolved, notwithstanding the more hopeful prospects of peace, to use every effort to complete the organisation by the establishment of committees all over the country. Communications from those willing to help, or applications for assistance, should be made to Major James Gildea, 20, Phillimore-gardens, W.

JAY'S, REGENT-STREET.

EXTRACT from "The Queen, the Lady's Newspaper."
"THE Novelties shown by Messrs. JAY, Regent-street, in Dresses, Mantles, and Bonnets, are a striking evidence of the manner in which good taste and style can triumph over the difficulties of the trying costumes required in a maison de deuil."
SPECIAL INFORMATION.—The latest French silk Costumes, composed of black silk, with some very novel garnitures. Ladies are specially invited to view these productions of the French modiste's art and good taste.
JAY'S, REGENT-STREET.
SPECIAL.—New pattern Black Silk Costumes, trimmed handsomely with fashionable garnitures, 5½ guineas each, including silk and trimmings for making a bodice.
JAY'S, REGENT-STREET.
DINNER DRESSES.
Messrs. JAY have a new and most fashionable assortment for evening wear, suitable for ladies who are in mourning, or for those who wear black from choice. Bodices are also made up by experienced dressmakers, if required, in a few hours.
JAY'S, REGENT-STREET.
COSTUMES, of the latest designs and fashion, 2½ guineas each, material for bodice included. "A remarkably cheap dress for this season of the year."
JAY'S,
THE LONDON GENERAL MOURNING WAREHOUSE, REGENT-STREET, W.

THE SKIN.—The Glory of Woman, the Pride of Man. It contains the delicate lines of beauty, and constitutes all that we term "Loveliness"; yet how many have their skins blemished by irritant soaps, carbolic, coal tar, glycerine—made of putrid fats. THE ALBION MILK AND SULPHUR SOAP is the purest of all toilet soaps. It cleanses and purifies the skin, guarding it against infection, and removing all skin irritation. It is a boon to sensitive skins, and as a shaving soap is unequalled. Beautifully white, delicately perfumed. Sold in Tablets, by all Chemists.
INVENTIONS EXHIBITION, Group 13.
DR. HARRY LOBB'S system of Medical Electrization, Batteries, Conductor, &c. CURATIVE ELECTRICITY. Free by post, 13 stamps.—DR. LOBB, 66, Russell-square, London.

THE CHILD'S PICTORIAL:
A MONTHLY COLOURED MAGAZINE.
PRICE 2d. No. 2 to be published June 1, 1885.
This Magazine is intended for children of the ages between four and eight years, and it is hoped that the letter-press will serve at once to edify and interest them; while the fact that the pictures are printed in Colours will doubtless furnish an additional attraction.
CONTENTS.
FIFINE AND HER CAT. By Mrs. MOLESWORTH.
THE OWL IN THE IVY BUSH. By Mrs. EWING.
THE TWO LOST LAMBS.
ONLY A BUNCH OF LILAC. Illustrated by GORDON BROWNE.
TWO COUSINS. By F. SCARLETT POTTER.
The price of the Magazine—2d. per month—will place it within reach of every family in the land, and it is not therefore too much to hope that it may become popular with its merits.
Copies can be had from any Bookseller or Newsagent, or at the Railway Bookstalls.

THE P. AND O. POLKA. By P. BUCALOSSI.

MON AMOUR WALTZ. By P. BUCALOSSI.
The "Daily Telegraph" says:—"In Bucalossi's 'Mon Amour Waltz' the leading theme, relieved by vigorous passages, is particularly graceful."
The "Queen" says:—"Mon Amour Waltz' and 'P. and O. Polka,' by P. Bucalossi. These pieces, both waltz and polka, will be very acceptable in the ball-room. The waltz is singularly tuneful and the polka quite brilliant; both happily illustrated."

PHYLLIS WALTZ. By P. BUCALOSSI.

MERRY FOOTSTEPS POLKA. By P. BUCALOSSI.

BLACK AND TAN POLKA. By CAROLINE LOWTHIAN.

FAHRWOHL WALTZ. By CAROLINE LOWTHIAN.
"Truth" says:—"The 'Black and Tan,' by Caroline Lowthian, is perfectly enchanting. I did not think a polka could be made so absolutely tempting to the feet; but this one is so full of spirit and 'go' that I don't think I could resist it. . . . The 'Fahrwohl Valse' is another excellent composition by Caroline Lowthian."
The "Daily Telegraph" says:—"Miss Caroline Lowthian's 'Fahrwohl' will supply strains free and flowing. . . . Yet the firm beat in the music of 'Black and Tan' (C. Lowthian) may lead others to prefer this."

THE CLAIRE WALTZ. By LEONARD GAUTIER.
"Truth" says:—"You will also like the 'Claire Waltzes,' so full of melody are they and so good to dance to. The composer is Leonard Gautier."

LE ZEPHYR POLKA. By G. DELBRÜCK.
The "Daily Telegraph" says:—"For several reasons Delbrück's polka, 'Le Zephyr,' will be selected by those engaging in that characteristic dance."

LES GRENOUILLES (FROGS) POLKA. ALFRED DELBRUCK.

SOUVENIRS ADORÉS WALTZ. G. DELBRUCK.

TOI SEULE VALSE. LUKE WHEELER.

SEA BREEZE POLKA.
"The Sea Breeze Polka" is one of the best and most spirited polkas which has been published for a long time."—Morning Post.

VALUABLE DISCOVERY for the HAIR.
If your hair is turning grey, or white, or falling off, use "The Mexican Hair Renewer," for it will positively restore in every case Grey or White Hair to its original colour, without leaving the disagreeable smell of most "Restorers." It makes the hair charmingly beautiful, as well as promoting the growth of the hair on bald spots, where the glands are not decayed. "The Mexican Hair Renewer" is sold by Chemists and Perfumers every where, at 3s. 6d. per Bottle.

FLORILINE. For the Teeth and Breath. Is the best Liquid Dentifrice in the world; it thoroughly cleanses partially-decayed teeth from all parasites or living "animalculæ," leaving them pearly white, imparting a delightful fragrance to the breath. The Fragrant Floriline removes instantly all odours arising from a foul stomach or tobacco smoke; being partly composed of honey, soda, and extracts of sweet herbs and plants, it is perfectly delicious to the taste, and as harmless as sherry. Sold by Chemists and Perfumers everywhere, at 2s. 6d. per Bottle.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

THE PROMOTION OF MR. LARKINS.

An author or an artist who has established himself firmly in the good graces of the public may, no doubt, produce rubbish from time to time with comparative impunity. His rubbish, unless it be of a very rubbishy order indeed, is likely enough to pass undetected; and even in the contrary case, he may count upon being pardoned, as carelessness is pardoned in an old servant. But it is quite otherwise with him who has scored but a single hit. He stands as yet upon no pedestal, he is still upon his trial; and his first success tells rather against than for him, as fixing a standard which he is bound at least to reach and is rather expected to surpass. Adrian Vidal knew this as well as anybody; and yet, after managing to make himself famous with "Two Lovers," he sat down and wrote as ill-considered, long-winded, and pointless a story as ever came from the pen of a clever man. It was in a great measure the fault of the editor of the Cosmopolitan Magazine, who had offered high pay for a serial tale, to be commenced forthwith, and who, on learning that Mr. Vidal had no such tale ready, had declared that that need not stand in the way of an arrangement, provided that monthly instalments could be forwarded to him as they were wanted. Good novels have been written upon this plan sometimes, but probably not very often. Adrian started without having the slightest idea of how he was going to end, never got a grasp of his characters, and, having undertaken other work which interested him more, soon found this particular task a heavy burden, grievous to be borne. When he had written the last words, he was so relieved at getting the dreadful thing off his mind that he hardly realised how bad his performance had been, although he knew that it had been bad.

The consequence was that, as soon as he cast his three-volume novel among the critics, they sprang up and choked it. Nobody had a good word for it; and, judging by the eloquent silence of his friends, Adrian concluded that their opinion fully coincided with that of their appointed guides. One acquaintance, more outspoken than the rest, caught him by the arm, as he was walking through the Park one morning, and said, "My dear fellow, I've just been reading your book, and I'm sure you'll excuse my telling you that it's the stupidest book I ever read in all my life. How on earth came you to write such bosh?"

"You are very kind," answered Adrian; "you seem to imply that I can write something that is not bosh."

"Oh, that's of course. I read your other book—what was it called? 'Free Lovers,' or something—and thought it first-rate. I'll tell you what it is, old chap, you've been over-doing it—writing too much, you know. You take my advice, and go easy for a bit. You'll find you'll come up as fresh as paint next season."

"Very likely," said Adrian. But he added under his breath, as he walked on, "Always supposing that I survive to see another season."

He was not a man who knew how to play a losing game, or to profit in any way by failure. Discouragement numbed his faculties and soured his temper; and it was not only the ill success of his novel that weighed upon his spirits just now. That, to be sure, was a serious matter enough, for he had arranged with his publishers for payment contingent upon the sale of the book, and there was now every reason to fear that he would get hardly a fourth of the sum upon which he had calculated; but what distressed him more than this was the unquestionable fact that he had ceased to be in request socially. Had the case been that of any other man than himself, he would have understood easily enough that the people who had wanted to know a small celebrity a year ago had now satisfied their curiosity and wanted to know somebody else; but it was no more given to Adrian than it is to the generality of us to take an impartial survey of his own circumstances, and so he tormented himself with the notion that he was a sinking ship and that the rats were leaving him.

That he was not quite in a seaworthy condition must be admitted. He had spent a good deal more money of late than he had any business to spend; he had counted upon receipts which had not come up to his expectations, and when he had found himself becoming somewhat seriously involved had grown indifferent to small extra expenses, after the time-honoured fashion of those who exceed their incomes. Upon the whole, he had very good and sufficient reasons for feeling depressed; although loss of popularity was perhaps not the most legitimate of them. He thought it a little hard that there should be neither consolation nor sympathy for him at home. Of course, both Clare and Georgina must have heard of his literary fiasco; but neither of them made the most distant reference to the subject or betrayed any knowledge of his having published a new novel at all. It is true that if they had attempted to pity him he would promptly have resented their pity; but he would have liked them to say that they were sorry nevertheless. Everyone who has been in trouble must be aware that to snub one's comforters is one of the most precious privileges of affliction. This privilege was denied to Adrian, and he could not quite understand it. He was always expecting Clare's icy reserve to melt. "She could not be so unrelenting if she had any real love for me," he thought bitterly. And yet he might have known that if she had not loved him she would have been ready to make friends with him at once.

Once, and once only, she seemed to waver in her purpose. Entering the drawing-room softly, one evening before dinner, she found Adrian reclining in an arm-chair, his head supported by his left hand, while his right hung listlessly by his side. His back was turned towards her, and she stood for a moment watching him and wondering what that attitude of exhaustion and dejection meant.

"Are you tired, Adrian?" she asked at length.

He started and looked up. "Tired? No—not more than usual, I think."

"You are not ill, are you?" pursued Clare, after pausing awhile.

Adrian rose and walked to the window. "Oh, no; I'm not ill that I know of," he answered, rather peevishly. "I don't feel in very rollicking spirits, that's all. Perhaps it would be rather odd if I did."

It was then that Clare was very nearly forgetting all her wrongs. She followed her husband to the window and said, gently, "May I know why you are out of spirits?"

"Oh, certainly," replied Adrian, with a short laugh. "I have discovered that I have made a big mistake in my life, and I am afraid the discovery comes rather too late to be of much use."

Clare froze again instantly. "I am afraid it does," she said, and left the room.

He was provoked with her for misunderstanding him so wilfully. He had meant her to question him further. Had she done so he would have explained that he was referring to his career as a novelist; and then she might have tried to encourage him; and then perhaps——But since she was pleased to assume him capable of alluding to his marriage as "a big mistake"—a thing which no gentleman would say to his wife—why, it was scarcely worth while to undeceive her. If that was the sort of opinion that she had of him, there would evidently be little use in attempting to interest her in his troubles. The latest addition to these had reached him half an hour before, in the shape of the following letter:—

"Office of the Anglo-Saxon, May, 188—.

"Dear Sir,—You have, no doubt, heard already that Mr. Pilkington has resigned the editorship of this journal, finding that his other occupations are likely to prevent him from discharging the duties connected with it in a manner satisfactory to himself. Under the new management some changes will be introduced into the character and appearance of the paper, with a view to increasing its popularity; but we fully expect to retain our customary list of contributors; and I may say, both on my own behalf and on that of the proprietors, that we shall be glad to receive from you such articles as you have been in the habit of writing for Mr. Pilkington. As regards remuneration, the proprietors think that this has hitherto been calculated upon rather too extravagant a scale, and it is probable that a temporary diminution, at all events, will be decided upon; but I shall be able to give you more definite information as to this in a few days' time.

"Believe me, dear Sir, faithfully yours,

"J. Larkins, Ed. Anglo-Saxon."

There was a good deal in this communication which was highly displeasing to Adrian. He had not been informed of Pilkington's retirement, and he thought that he ought to have been informed of it. He disliked Larkins personally, and had no belief at all in his power to improve the sale of the Anglo-Saxon. The proposed reduction of pay was not altogether agreeable. Finally, those references to the supreme will and pleasure of the proprietors struck him as being a trifle cool, seeing that he happened to be himself one of them. "I'll be hanged if I'll be one of them much longer, though!" he said decisively to himself, as he walked up the Strand on the ensuing morning. "I didn't quite like to draw out my money so long as Pilkington held on; but I shall make no bones about it with this fellow."

On reaching the Anglo-Saxon office, he found the editorial chair already occupied by its new tenant, a stout, vulgar-looking man, with a shock of iron-grey hair, bushy whiskers which met under his chin, and dirty nails.

"How are you, Vidal?" called out this unprepossessing person, cheerfully, as our hero entered. "Come to talk things over, hey?"

"How do you do, Mr. Larkins?" said Adrian, laying a very slight emphasis upon the prefix. "I received your letter, and I was sorry to hear of our loss."

"What—old Pilkington, do you mean? Well, between you and me and the post, he aint very much of a loss. It was about time he went. He's a good fellow and a gentleman all over, is Pilkington; but I can't call to mind that I ever met a much worse editor. Now that we've got rid of him, we shall work the paper differently—put a little more life into it, and get some new blood. We mean to keep on most of the old lot, though, all the same."

"That is, if you can," observed Adrian. "You mentioned something about lowering your scale of payments."

"My good fellow, it's a case of needs must. I should delight in seeing you all paid at the rate of a guinea a word; but it don't quite run to it, you see. If any of the old contributors aren't satisfied—why, it won't be a very hard matter to replace 'em. I hope you aint going to quarrel with your bread and butter."

"I don't know as yet whether I shall continue to write for you or not," answered Adrian, repressing a strong inclination to assault his new chief; "but independently of that, I have an interest in the paper. I put £2000 into it when it was first started, and I haven't received a farthing of interest from that day to this. I think I should now like to realise."

Larkins frowned, and pulled his whiskers. "Oh!" said he.

"I suppose," continued Adrian, interrogatively, "that I can do that?"

"I suppose so. Oh, yes; you can do that, no doubt. Only, if you do, you'll be the first that has done it; and I don't know that we should care to have you writing for us under those circumstances."

"I am quite prepared," answered Adrian, smiling, "to accept my dismissal."

"That's what I call quarrelling with your bread and butter. However, please yourself. As I tell you, you'll be the first that has thought fit to act in that way. Pilkington now—he hasn't said a word about taking out his money, though he has left us for good and all."

"Really," said Adrian, "I can see no reason why I shouldn't withdraw from a bad investment when I am convinced that it is a bad one."

"It all depends on how you look at it. When a few friends join together to start a paper it isn't quite the same thing as if they went to their brokers and told them to purchase securities. And as to bad investments, a newspaper seldom becomes a paying investment from the first."

"I had nothing to do with the starting of the Anglo-Saxon," said Adrian. "Am I to understand that I shall be looked upon as a traitor now if I ask for the £2000 which I can't afford to lose?"

"Well, I don't know about that. I fancy that Mr. Egerton and the others won't be best pleased. You see, it isn't only the loss of a couple of thousand pounds that they'll look at; it's the example. There are always plenty of people ready enough to do a shabby thing, if somebody will only give them a lead."

"I consider that a most offensive expression," retorted Adrian, hotly. "I am not in the habit of doing shabby things—nor of allowing anyone to call me shabby either."

"Well, well, Mr. Vidal, we needn't quarrel over it. I'm not speaking for myself; I'm only telling you what I believe will be the opinion of the proprietors. They naturally think that you owe something to them, considering that they took you up when you were a comparatively unknown writer."

"I can't admit that I am under any obligation whatsoever to them," said Adrian.

"You may depend upon it that they think you are, and if you throw them over now, when the paper is passing through what one may call a sort of crisis, they won't like it. Of course, it's for you to decide what course you will adopt. Personally, I should be sorry to lose you as a contributor. With the money part of the business I am only indirectly concerned; but I don't think that, under any circumstances, you would be in much danger of losing your £2000. Supposing that the worst came to the worst, and the paper failed altogether, I should doubt whether the gentlemen who have provided the bulk of the funds would wish those who have taken a smaller share in the undertaking to be out of pocket. Mind you, I have no authority for saying this; I merely mention it in confidence as my own impression. But you may be sure that the paper will not fail, if I can help it; and I have had rather more experience in this line than Pilkington."

From all this Adrian perceived that Mr. Larkins was very unwilling to give him his money and let him go. That, perhaps, would have made a prudent man all the more determined to take his money and go; yet the upshot of the interview was, that both Mr. Vidal's pen and his purse remained at the service of the Anglo-Saxon. He had made too many enemies of late, he thought: he had no wish to add to their number. Moreover, the representations of Mr. Larkins were not without their effect upon him.

"Between ourselves, Mr. Vidal," that worthy remarked, "what we want is not so much a high-class literary journal as something that people will buy at the bookstalls. We shall come out weekly now, instead of monthly; our price, of course, will be sixpence; we shall devote more of our space to politics and a good deal more to personalities: and we shall drop that stupid practice of making our writers sign their articles. I'll allow that Pilkington's notion was more original; but when originality don't pay its way, the best plan is to try being commonplace. Don't you think so?"

There seemed to be something in that.

CHAPTER XXXV.

CLARE'S VISITORS.

"Far be it from me," said Georgina, "to speak a word against those who give themselves up to good works. I feel that I may slip upon a piece of orange-peel in the street any day and be carried to the nearest hospital with a broken leg; and if that should happen to me, I have no doubt that I should fully appreciate the privilege of being nursed by a woman in my own rank of life. Besides, I have a genuine admiration for people who prefer being of some service to humanity to sitting at home and twirling their thumbs. But you will not get me to admire a woman who spends the best part of her time at the hospital merely in order that she may have an excuse for crying her eyes out when she comes home."

It was on a fine afternoon in June that Miss Vidal addressed these pointed remarks to her sister-in-law. She was waiting for a friend who had promised to call for her and take her to the Park, and her costume was in all respects worthy of the season and the occasion. The summer had begun all of a sudden; the boxes outside the drawing-room windows had become gay with flowers; the hazy London sunshine was flooding the air, and the water-carts were going about the streets.

"You are the less likely to be called upon to admire her," observed Clare, with a touch of asperity, "as it is in the last degree improbable that such an idiot can exist."

"She does exist, though," rejoined Georgina, imperturbably. "I know that she exists, because I have the honour of being acquainted with her. To be more precise, she is sitting in your chair at the present moment."

"I go to see the children at the hospital," said Clare, "because I like it, and because I believe they like having me. As for crying my eyes out, I certainly never do any such thing."

"I will withdraw the words 'crying her eyes out,' then, and will substitute 'looking heart-broken.' You can't deny that you look heart-broken; and I don't care if you do deny it: the fact remains. Isn't it nearly time that all this came to an end?"

"All what?"

"This general discomfort. It can't be kept up for ever, you know, and I have to propose that we now eat humble pie. To do Adrian justice, he looks quite as miserable as you do; and he hasn't the solace of a Children's Hospital, remember."

"I thought," said Clare, "that we had agreed to let this subject alone. I promised that I would not mention Mr. De Wynt again if you would only allow me to live my own life in my own way."

"I recollect your making that handsome offer; but I don't recollect accepting it. You have my full leave to say anything that you please about Mr. De Wynt; only I should prefer your saying something unflattering, because I hear that he is likely to be married to an heiress, whose property adjoins his, and I will go so far as to admit that my feelings are hurt. I don't think it is very pretty of him to console himself with such rapidity."

"I don't believe it," exclaimed Clare.

"It is too true, I fear; the report reached me on excellent authority," said Georgina. "But, after all, I don't want to be a dog in the manger, and I trust the heiress will prove satisfactory. Do you know," she added presently, looking out of the window beside which she was seated, "that you are about to have a visitor? That is quite an event in these days. He is a man—rather a feeble sort of man, judging by the time that he is taking to get out of his hansom—still, not advanced in years. I do believe it is Mr. Heriot!"

Heriot indeed it was; and the first sight of him, as he entered the room, was somewhat of a shock to Clare. She had been accustomed for so long to hear her old friend spoken of as being in a dying state that she had come to regard that as more or less of a figure of speech; but the moment that she saw his face now she knew that he was far worse than he had ever been before. She could not even ask him about his health; nor did he seem desirous of being questioned, for he merely mentioned that he had been ill all the winter and had not been able to get farther than Cannes; after which he immediately changed the subject.

Georgina was soon taken away by her friend, and shortly afterwards Clare, chancing to look up at Heriot, discovered that he was scrutinising her with an earnestness which brought a faint flush into her cheeks.

"You have not been well since I saw you last," he said, abruptly.

"Not very," she answered. "It was—I don't know—there was nothing really the matter; and I am quite myself again now."

Heriot stroked his beard and made no comment upon this assertion. "And Adrian?" he resumed, after a minute or two. "He has not written to me for a long time. I suppose that is a sign that he is very busy?"

"Yes; he is always busy, I believe." Clare hesitated, and then went on: "He is not satisfied with his last book—perhaps you have heard? I am afraid it has been a great disappointment to him."

"Ah, that is the inevitable consequence of taking up art or literature as a calling. There must be disappointments every now and then; and poor Adrian is sure to take disappointments to heart. Now tell me about yourself. Have you become a confirmed Londoner yet?"

Clare shook her head. "I shall never be that; but London suits me well enough. I go out very little in the evening now, and during the day I don't have many visitors."

"That sounds rather a negative way of enjoying life," Heriot remarked.

"I suppose it does; but negative enjoyment is better than positive—discomfort; and I should never have acquired a taste for society. I told you so last year, you know."

"I remember," answered Heriot; "it was at Lady St. Austell's garden party. By-the-way, are the St. Austells in town?"

"I have no idea," replied Clare; and she was conscious of a change in her voice which could hardly fail to be perceptible to her interrogator. By way of accounting for it, she was proceeding to explain, "I don't like Lord St. Austell"—— when the door was thrown open, and who should walk in but that estimable nobleman himself!

Considering what were the circumstances under which this honour had last been conferred upon her, Clare certainly had not expected that it would be repeated. She was taken aback, and showed that she was so; but Lord St. Austell did not seem to notice her embarrassment. He advanced with the smile of a guest whose welcome is assured, saying how delighted he was to see Mrs. Vidal looking so well—might he be allowed to add, looking so charming? Then he screwed his glass into his eye, and was scarcely less delighted to recognise his friend Mr. Heriot, also looking—looking—er—as usual. It was perfectly impossible to assert that Heriot was looking well; but Lord St. Austell went on, with creditable readiness: "After a certain time of life, we must be contented with looking as usual, mustn't we?"

"At no period of my life," remarked Heriot, quietly, "have I been accused of presenting a charming aspect to the eye; but I humbly trust that I have not always looked as if I had one foot in the grave."

"Oh, you're all right—you wear as well as any of us," said Lord St. Austell, who disliked allusions to the grave, and thought them in very doubtful taste.

He sat down and began to converse with easy fluency, addressing his observations for the most part to Clare, who found herself quite unable to respond to them. She was so obviously uncomfortable that Heriot took pity upon her at length, and got up. Thereupon she threw him an imploring glance, which he rightly interpreted to mean that she did not want to be left alone with Lord St. Austell; so he said to the latter,—

"Is that your brougham that I see at the door? Perhaps you will take pity on a sick man and give me a lift home?"

"My dear fellow, by all means!" cried Lord St. Austell, with alacrity. "The brougham shall take you to your own door, and then you can send it back for me. In the meantime, I dare say Mrs. Vidal will give me a cup of her excellent tea."

This was not exactly what Heriot wanted. "Oh, I'll wait till you have had your tea," he said.

But Lord St. Austell declared that he couldn't think of such a thing. "Now, Mrs. Vidal, you must not ask him to stay; he has no business to be out so late. Invalids always ought to be at home before six o'clock." And he caught Heriot by the arm and hurried him out of the room before another word could be said.

"I think I disposed of our friend rather cleverly," he remarked, on his return, seating himself complacently in a chair close to his hostess's elbow.

Clare made an inarticulate murmur. She was really frightened of this leering old man; and indeed his next speech showed that her alarm was not altogether groundless.

"I have so hoped for this moment to come!" he murmured. "I can't tell you how I have suffered since I saw you last. I have had no peace."

Indignation restored to Clare a measure of courage. She rose deliberately and moved to a chair a couple of yards away. "I am sorry to hear that," she replied. "What has been the matter with you?—gout?"

Lord St. Austell jumped up and followed her with an agility which sufficiently refuted this cruel suggestion. "Ah, don't pretend to misunderstand me!" he pleaded, rather huskily—for, alas! there comes a time of life when the human voice refuses to take pathetic modulations—"You know why I have suffered; you know that it is you who have made me suffer. Not intentionally—ah, no! you are too angelic to inflict pain willingly upon anyone; but"——

"I assure you that I am not at all angelic," interrupted Clare, "and I can't imagine what you mean by saying that I have inflicted pain upon you. I—I don't want to know what you mean," she added, hastily, perceiving that Lord St. Austell was about to explain.

"But I must tell you!" cried that susceptible veteran. "It is impossible to conceal any longer the feelings of—er—of adoration with which the sight of so much beauty and—er—unhappiness has inspired me. Dearest Mrs. Vidal, don't be unhappy any more. Your husband has shown himself unworthy of you; but there is one who"——

"Please don't trouble yourself to say any more," broke in Clare, coldly. "You are very impertinent; but I suppose that is because you know no better."

Now Lord St. Austell had often been called impertinent before, and did not mind it in the least. He regarded it, indeed, as a purely conventional phrase, commonly employed by ladies under certain circumstances, and no more intended to be taken in a literal sense than the dismissal by which it was just as commonly followed. So with unabated confidence he proceeded to make his next move, and seizing Mrs. Vidal's hand, pressed it fervently to his lips.

This was too much alike for Clare's temper and her self-respect. "Lord St. Austell," she exclaimed, "if you were not such an old man—such a very old man—I would ring the bell and have you turned out of the house. As it is, I can only suppose that you have become imbecile. Is it possible that you can imagine that any woman, whether married or single, could be in love with you?—you! I dare say many people would not be able to help laughing at you; but to me you are too horribly repulsive to be ludicrous. Of course, you will understand that I cannot receive you again after this."

She had risen to her feet, as had also Lord St. Austell. His face had turned white, his eyes were glittering, and his lips quivering. He seemed as if he were going to speak; but controlled himself. The fact was that his system of ethics, which permitted him to insult a lady in the manner above described, forbade him attack her with angry words. So he said nothing at all—not even "Good-bye"—but took his hat and went away.

Clare, as soon as she was alone, sank down upon the sofa and covered her face with her hands in an agony of shame. It was bad enough that any man should have presumed to address her as Lord St. Austell had done; but it was almost worse that she should have allowed herself to retort upon him so coarsely. Her cheeks burned when she thought of the words that she had used in her haste, and she felt that she could hardly have got rid of her tormentor in a less dignified manner.

Yet, if she had but known it, she had achieved a triumph of a certain kind; for she was the only woman who had ever succeeded in putting Lord St. Austell into a genuine rage.

NOVELS.

Once more stories of mystery and crime are in vogue, and Wyllard's Weird: by the author of "Lady Audley's Secret" (J. and R. Maxwell) is one of the successful novels of this type. Although the murderer is recognised early in the first volume, the interest in bringing the three murders home to the perpetrator is sufficiently developed and maintained to carry the reader on; and Julian Wyllard's reception of the discovery is thoroughly dramatic. The first time, perhaps, that any sympathy is felt for Marie Prévol and her ill-fated lover is on reading the touching description of the Baronne de Maucroix's solitary life, and the further account of the deserted rooms in the old French château. With the cunning of an experienced hand, a dexterous touch is given by the simultaneous occurrence of the deaths of the Baronne and Julian Wyllard. Mrs. Maxwell's knowledge of Paris is admirably used, and the initial chapter has the merit of embarking the reader fully in the business of the plot. The part of the book least felicitous is the superficial interest of Lady Valeria's and Bothwell's loves; and both these characters, although necessary to the story, are very bodiless personages.

A very good historical novel, though perhaps a little heavy in parts, after the German fashion, is The Chancellor of the Tyrol: by Herman Schmid, translated by Dorothea Roberts (T. Fisher Unwin), which is pure literature in every sense, and especially in the best sense of the adjective. The hero, the Chancellor, a certain Dr. Wilhelm Biener, is a fine, noble, edifying character, a little, or more than a little, after the pattern of our celebrated Sir Thomas More; and in his tragic end the German also bears a strong resemblance to the Englishman. The Duchess Claudia of Tyrol, when Tyrol was an independent or quasi-independent duchy, in the seventeenth century, is left a widow, with a son, heir and successor; and from admiring she proceeds to love her Chancellor. He also loves her, but he is too patriotic, too unselfish, too grand, too regardful of her and her interests to take advantage of her love, which she confesses, and of his own, which she accepts. There is mutual confidence and mutual renunciation; and the scene or scenes in which they reveal their feelings, acknowledge what would be for their happiness were their social position different, and make up their minds to a double self-sacrifice, are almost sublime, if they were not so human and so touching. The exposition of what high-minded persons in lofty stations of life may be capable of thinking, saying, and doing, is a lesson worthy of being read, marked, learned, and inwardly digested, not to mention that it is taught in language full of dignity and poetry. After, all, however, the Duchess was a woman, as she most pathetically and impressively admits; and it is therefore the more difficult to believe that she could have brought herself not only to give up her Chancellor but to promote, and even exact as it were as a condition, his marriage with one of her own maids of honour. The maid of honour who had dared to marry Essex or Leicester would have had a bad time of it with "good" Queen Bess. But the Duchess Claudia was a better woman, if a weaker vessel, than the Virgin Queen. Well, in course of time, the Duchess dies, having already abdicated and been succeeded by her son; so noble a man as the Chancellor is sure to have enemies by the score, and so flighty a youth as the Duke is sure to have his better self kept down by evil counsellors; and the result is easy to divine. False charges are made against the Chancellor; then comes degradation and sentence of death. True, a reprieve is dispatched in all haste at the last moment; but messengers who carry reprieves may be tampered with, and even a pardon may come too late. It is possible that most readers will be a great deal shocked at the exceedingly blasphemous utterances of the Chancellor's wife when she finds herself made a widow; but it must be remembered that the story is German, and that Germans do indulge sometimes in some very "tall" blasphemy—in writing. Besides, there is not much of it, and it is very near the end.

A fresh, pleasant, original, charming little story is Major Frank: by A. L. G. Bosboom-Toussaint, translated from the Dutch by James Akeroyd (T. Fisher Unwin), a story calculated to surprise in the most agreeable manner any reader who may imagine that "Batavian grace" is incompatible with ease and sprightliness. "Major" Frank is, in fact, one of the airiest as well as loveliest and liveliest young women, for all her military title, that ever flitted through the pages of a romance. This characteristic may be attributed, if the reader pleases, to the fact that she is partly of English extraction: her moral solidity, of which she exhibits a noticeable amount, may be due to her combined Dutch and English parentage. She has been set down in the category of young "women" advisedly; for one of her peculiarities is that she—not altogether without reason—dislikes particularly to be regarded or described as a young "lady." She ought to have been a boy, her father thought; and she was therefore called "Francis" (whence "Frank") instead of "Frances." She was brought up in her early days as a boy; she was taught riding and fencing, and other exercises of a similar or dissimilar kind to the exclusion of more feminine accomplishments; and, when the reader is first introduced to her, though she has by that time gone through a curriculum better suited to her sex, she is living in Dutchland with her old grandfather, a Dutch general, whose very curious establishment she manages, holding the brevet rank and the title of Major, dressing as much like a man as she very well can, riding about the country by herself, eschewing society, scorning marriage, and giving the "ladies," among whom she declines to be numbered, considerable cause to be jealous of her beauty and very free with her reputation. She is reported, not without foundation, to have challenged to a duel with rapiers, then and there, a very eligible young aspirant who dared to demand her hand, so that he fled as from a mad woman. Such is the heroine whom the hero of the story sets out to "prospect," because he has had a large fortune left to him with the expression of a wish that he will be so good as to marry her, if he should find upon investigation that it is possible for him to do so. His experience in his course of "prospecting" forms the staple of the entertainment: and very good entertainment it is.

PROBLEM No. 2148.

By Dr. Conrad Bayer.

BLACK.

WHITE.

White to play, and mate in two moves.

Played recently at Bath, the Rev. G. A. MacDonnell yielding the odds of Q Kt to another Amateur.

(Remove White's Q Kt from the Board.—Evans' Gambit.)

WHITE (Mr. M.)	BLACK (Mr. R.)
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th
2. Kt to K B 3rd	Kt to Q B 3rd
3. B to B 4th	B to B 4th
4. P to Q Kt 4th	B takes Kt P
5. P to B 3rd	B to R 4th
6. Castles	Kt to B 3rd
7. Kt to Kt 5th

Not so good, of course, as 7. P to Q 4th; but the attack seems good enough in this case.

7.	Castles
8. P to B 4th	B to Kt 3rd (ch)
9. P to Q 4th	Kt takes Q P

Black's game is not sufficiently developed for the clearance of the board, to which this move leads.

10. P takes Kt	B takes P (ch)
12. B to B 3rd	P to K B 3rd

12. P to Q 3rd is better.

13. Q takes B	P takes Kt
14. P takes Kt P	Kt takes P
15. B takes R	Q takes B

This capture is ill-judged, and Black loses his last chance of developing his forces in time to be of use. 15. P. to Q 4th seems the best line of play here.

16. R takes P	Q takes R
17. B takes Q (ch)	K takes B
18. Q takes P	Kt to Q 3rd
19. P to K R 4th	Kt to K sq
20. P to Kt 6th (ch)	K to B sq
21. Q to Q 5th	K to K 2nd
22. Q to B 7th (ch)	K to Q sq
23. P to R 5th	P to Q 3rd
24. K to R 2nd	P to B 3rd
25. Q to B 8th	B to K 3rd
26. K to Kt 3rd	K to Q 2nd
27. K to R 4th	R to Q sq
28. P to Kt 4th	B takes K Kt P

Overlooking the resource at White's disposal.

29. Q to B 7th (ch)	K to B sq
30. K takes B	P to Q 4th
31. K to B 3rd	P to Q 5th
32. K to K 2nd	P to Q 6th (ch)
33. K to Q 2nd	Kt to B 3rd
34. Q to K 6th (ch)	K to B 2nd
35. P to R 6th	R to Q 2nd
36. Q takes R (ch)

The coup de grâce.

36.	K takes Q
37. P to R 7th,	and Black resigned.

White: K at K B 6th, R at K R 2nd, Kt at K R 4th, Pawn at K B 2nd. (Four pieces.)

White to play, and mate in four moves.

Chess students do not often meet with a two-move problem by Dr. Conrad Bayer, so seeing one recently in the Zlata of Prague, we have this week reproduced it on our diagram. It is new to us, but must, we think, have been composed many years ago. A study of it suggests the inquiry, which was first in the field, Dr. Bayer's problem, or the following by Mr. S. Loyd? The latter we know was published more than a quarter of a century ago.

White: K at Q B sq, Q at K R 3rd, R at Q 2nd, Kts at Q Kt 2nd and Q B 7th; Pawns at K 3rd, Q B 3rd, and Q Kt 6th. (Eight pieces.)

Black: K at Q B 6th, Q at Q B 4th, Kts at K 4th and Q R 4th, B at Q B 3rd; Pawns at Q 6th, Q Kt 2nd and 6th. (Eight pieces.)

White to play and mate in two moves.

The Right Hon. R. N. Fowler, M.P., Lord Mayor, has been elected Master of the Salters' Company for the year commencing next month.

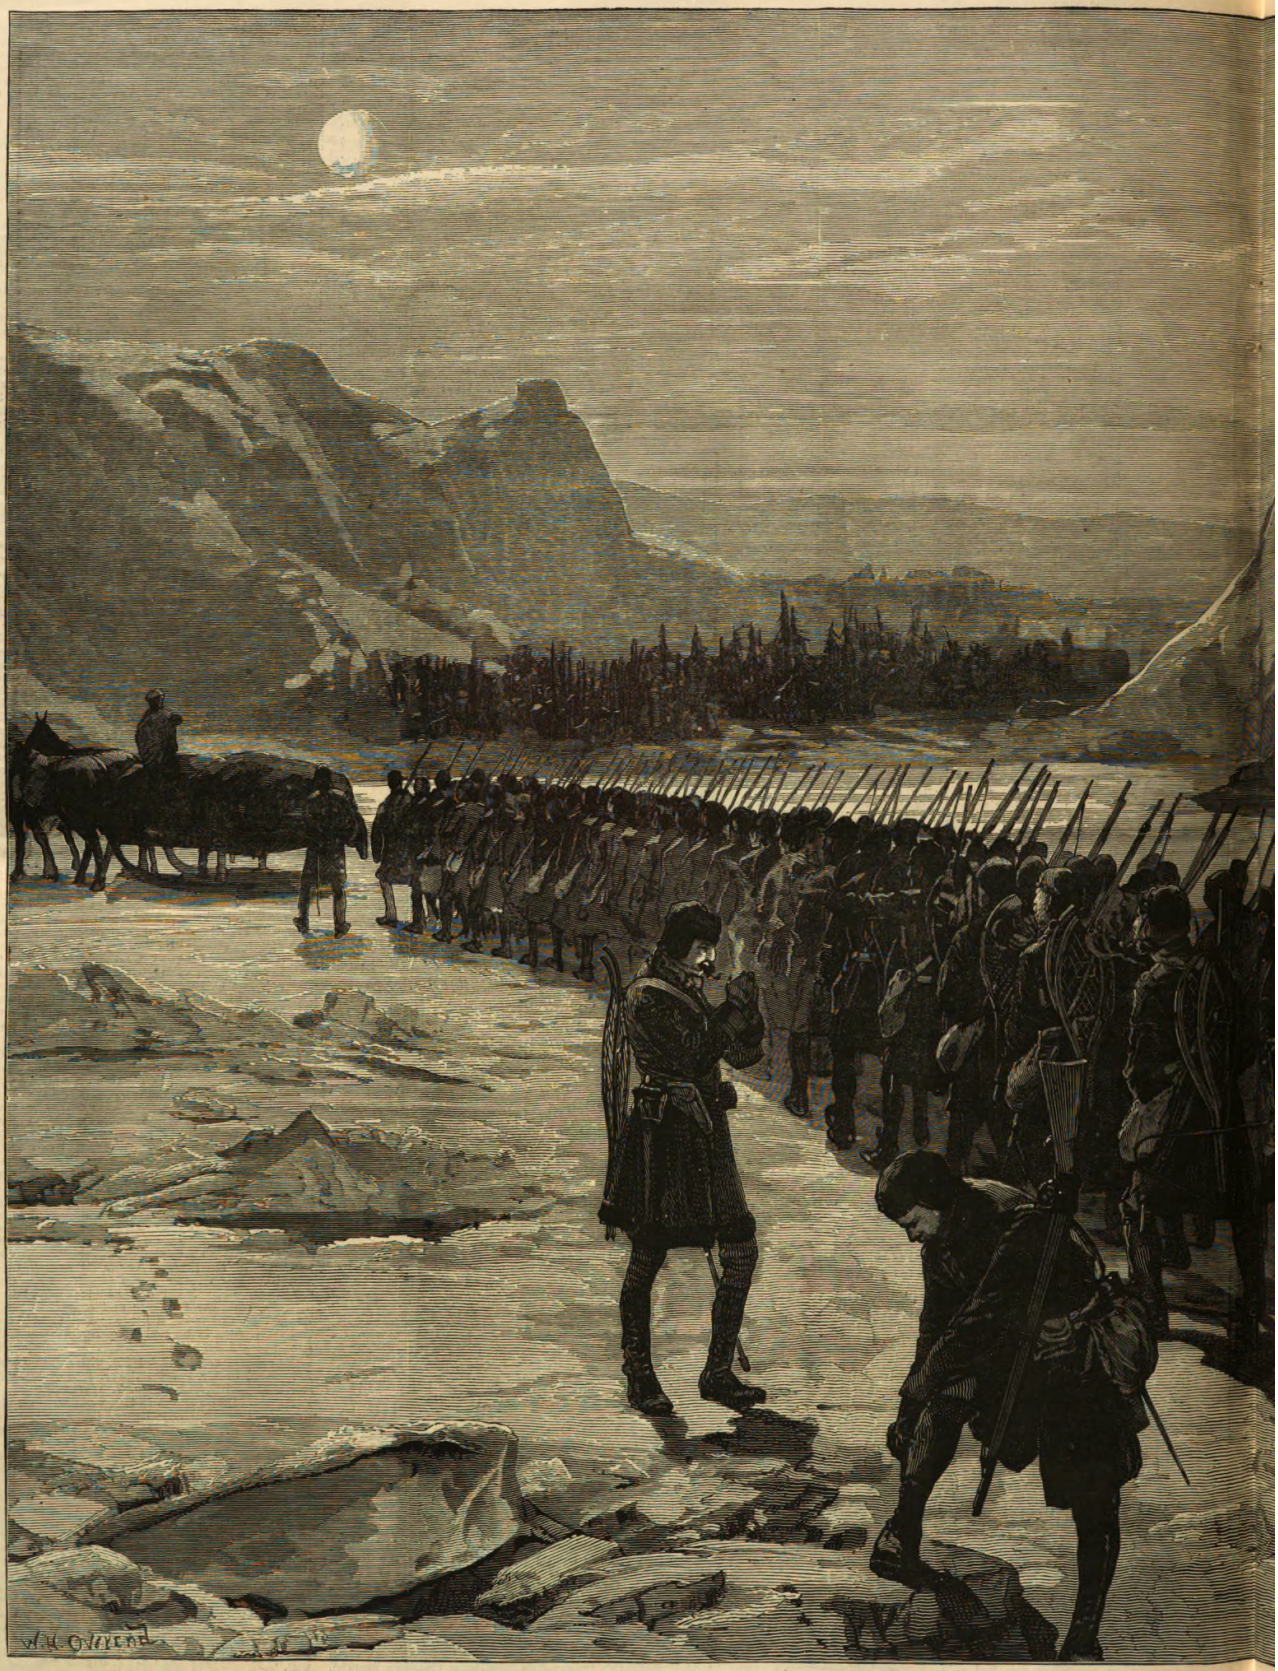
The Lord Chancellor reports that the claim of Charles Henry John, Earl of Shrewsbury in the Peerage of England, and Earl of Waterford in the Peerage of Ireland, to vote at the elections of representative Peers for Ireland has been established to his satisfaction.

There was a considerable decrease of emigration last month. In the four months ending April 30 there left the United Kingdom for places out of Europe 58,739 persons of British origin, 14,781 foreigners, and 891 whose nationality was not distinguished, the total thus being 74,411.

"The Prodigal Son," a service of Song in aid of the Metropolitan Police Relief Fund (patron: Sir E. Y. W. Henderson, K.C.B.), was given in the Exeter Hall, Strand, last Saturday afternoon, by the Police Choir, in connection with the Christian Policemen's Association (Western Branch).

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated July 28, 1882), with a codicil (dated March 9, 18 5), of Sir Curtis Miranda Lampson, Bart., late of No. 80, Eaton-square, and of Rowfant, Sussex, who died on March 12 last, was proved on the 7th inst. by Sir George Curtis Lampson, Bart., and Norman George Lampson, the sons, James Timker, and James Stewart Hodgson, the executors, the value of the personal estate in England amounting to upwards of £401,000. The testator leaves his residence at Rowfant, with the pleasure-grounds and such part of the park as she may select up to twenty acres, to the use of his wife, Dame Jane Hannah Lampson, for life, and, subject thereto, he devises his Rowfant estate and all his freehold and copyhold property in Sussex to the use of his daughter, Mrs. Jane Hannah Locker, for life, with remainder to her first and other sons successively, according to seniority in tail male, and provision is made for the person becoming entitled to the said property taking the name and arms of Lampson. He also bequeaths to his wife £20,000, all his plate, pictures, wines, household furniture, and articles of use and ornament, horses and carriages, and for life £5000 per annum, and the use of his residence in Eaton-square, with the stabling; to his son George Curtis, who has succeeded to the baronetcy, £175,000; to his daughter, Mrs. Locker, his house, buildings, and land at Cromer; to his son Norman George, £40,000; to his son-in-law, Mr. Frederick Locker, £5000; to his executor Mr. Hodgson, his sister, Mrs. Laura Ann Brooks, his nephews, Frederick and William Lampson, his niece Mrs. Wortel, Caroline Lampson, and Miss Emily Clarke, £1000 each; to his niece Miss E. M. Curtis, to Mrs. Cyrus Curtis, and to Mr. Nuttingham, if in the employ of his firm at the time of his death, £500 each; to each clerk who has been five years in the employ of his firm at his death, £250; and to each domestic servant, including gardeners, coachmen, and grooms, who have been a like term in his service at his death, £50. He also leaves £100,000 and one third of the residue of his real and personal estate, upon trust, for his son Norman George, for life, then as to one half of the income to his present wife, for her life, and, subject thereto, to his issue as they shall jointly appoint; £100,000 and another third of the residue, upon trust, for his daughter, Mrs. Locker, for life, then to her present husband, for life, and then to her issue as she shall appoint; and the remaining one third of the residue to his son George Curtis.



The will (dated Oct. 31, 1874), with five codicils (dated Dec. 19, 1874; June 4, Sept. 10, and Nov. 24, 1877; and Jan. 16, 1879), of Mr. Robert Barbour, formerly of Manchester, but late of Bolesworth Castle, Cheshire, who died on Jan. 17 last, was proved at the Chester District Registry on the 14th ult. by George Barbour, the son, the acting executor, the value of the personal estate in the United Kingdom amounting to upwards of £472,000. The testator leaves to his wife, Mrs. Janet Barbour, all his wines, spirits, horses, carriage, and harness, and, for life, £5000 per annum, and Bolesworth Castle, with the outbuildings and grounds, and the furniture, plate, books, pictures, and effects; at her death the said furniture and effects are to go to his said son, except what she chooses to give to their daughter, Janet, Lady Anstruther, by will or otherwise; and he bequeaths £50,000, upon trust, for his said daughter, for life, and then to be at her disposal, in addition to what he has already settled upon her; £5000 to his son-in-law, Sir Windham C. Anstruther, Bart.; £5000 to his brother George Freeland Barbour; £5000 to the family of his late brother John; £2000 each to his two sisters; £5000 to be invested and the interest applied in giving bursaries, exhibitions, or scholarships to aid and encourage young men attending the Presbyterian College, London, and studying for the ministry; £5000 to the Presbyterian Church Building Fund; £500 each to the Manchester Deaf and Dumb Institution, and the Chester General Infirmary; £100 to the Chester Ragged and Industrial School, and other legacies. The residue of his real and personal estate he gives to his said son, George.

The will (dated March 5, 1883), with a codicil, of Mr. Frederick William Heilgers, of Champion-hill, and 22, Great St. Helens, E.C., merchant, was proved on the 9th inst. by Mr. William Heilgers, the son, and Mr. Egmont Bieber, two of the executors. The testator's estate in London and Calcutta amounts to upwards of £100,000, exclusive of £10,000 settled upon his daughter at her marriage. He gives to his wife his furniture, plate, pictures, household and personal effects, horses and carriages, absolutely, and his residence at Champion-hill, for her life; and, after certain pecuniary legacies, gives the income of the residue of his estate to his wife, for her life, and, subject thereto, divides his property equally among his five children.

The will (dated July 3, 1883) of Mrs. Maria Sperling, late of Caldana, Cannes, France, who died on Nov. 20 last, was proved on the 11th ult. by Arthur Sperling, the nephew, one of the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £67,000. The testatrix leaves all her real and personal estate, including the residuary personal estate of Henry John Sperling, deceased, over which, under his will, she has an absolute power of appointment, upon trust, for her sister, Emma Sperling, for life, and at her death, subject to some annuities, to her two nephews, Arthur Sperling and the Rev. Frederick Hayne Sperling.

The will (dated Aug. 12, 1884), with a codicil (dated Dec. 3 following), of Mr. Joseph Blakeley, late of Dewsbury, Yorkshire, merchant and colliery proprietor, has been proved in London by Alfred Brooke Blakeley and Stanley Blakeley, the sons, and John Whitehead Blakeley, the brother, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £44,000. The testator leaves £20,000, upon trust, for his daughters, Alice Maud and Ethel; Hollyroyd House and grounds, with the furniture and effects, to his son Alfred Brooke; another freehold house and £1000 to his son Stanley; and the residue of his real and personal estate to his said two sons, in equal shares.

The will (dated Jan. 26, 1885), with a codicil (dated Feb. 11 following), of Mr. Charles Baker, late of No. 11, Sackville-street, Piccadilly, and of No. 7, Westbourne-crescent, Hyde Park, who died on March 12 last, was proved on the 22nd ult. by Miss Eleanor Hetty Baker, the daughter, and Henry Morton Baker, M.B., the son, the executors, the value of the personal estate exceeding £30,000. The testator leaves £100 and his wines and consumable stores to his wife, Mrs. Eleanor Sheen Baker; the furniture, plate, and household effects at his residence to his wife, for life or widowhood, and then to his two daughters, Eleanor Hetty and Mary Beatrice; the lease of No. 11, Sackville-street, with the books and furniture, to his son Charles William John; and there are other bequests to his children, partner, sisters, and daughter-in-law. The residue of his real and personal estate is to be held, upon trust, to pay the income to his wife, for life or widowhood; then each of his said daughters is to have an annuity of £250 until marriage, when £5000 is to be settled on her; the ultimate residue he gives to his two sons. The testator in his will states, "Whereas I have in previous wills left small pecuniary legacies to various friends to acquire mementos of me; but, seeing that Mr. Gladstone has taxed these little gifts, I refrain from making any such bequests in my present will."

THE REBELLION IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORY OF CANADA: COLONIAL TROOPS

THE GROSVENOR GALLERY.

CONCLUDING NOTICE.

Among the subject pictures of the gallery, Mr. C. W. Mitchell's "Hypatia" (111) occupies a prominent place. The moment chosen by the artist (who by-the-way has no American parentage, but is the son of a member of the world-known Elswick firm) is of intense dramatic interest, and he has availed himself fully of the opportunity. The maiden philosopher, hooted and hunted by the populace of Alexandria led by Cyril's brutal monks, has taken refuge in the cathedral, and is standing "naked, snow-white," against the altar, above which is the figure of the God whom her pursuers pretended to honour and reverence. Mr. Mitchell has shown great power in concentrating all interest in the single figure, and almost as much self-command, in not being led away by the ornamentation which an Eastern altar might naturally suggest. The background is carefully but not extravagantly painted, suggesting the repose which ought to pervade the spot, and with which the heaving agitated figure of Hypatia is in admirable contrast. If we passed any criticism upon this part of the work, it would be that the face wears too plaintive an expression for such a moment; the pose is a trifle too studied, whilst the drawing of the bent leg is not quite successful. In spite of these slight drawbacks, the picture is a very remarkable one, and foreshadows a great career for the artist. Mr. Van Haanen's "Death of Juliet" (194) will scarcely raise his reputation, and would seem to mark a phase of art into which he would do well to venture no further. Whether the death here intended is the real or supposed, we are at a loss to guess; but the rich colour of Juliet's cheeks hardly suggests that "monumental alabaster" to which her lover alludes. A cascade of black hair falls over the pillow on which she is lying, and on her bosom is a cross and some half-faded flowers. There is, as in all Mr. Van Haanen's, evidence of great power; but there is also a total absence of that refinement of feeling which we associate with the episode he has undertaken to portray. To Mr. Alma Tadema's two small works, "Who is It?" (57) and "Expectations" (81), we have already alluded: the former represents a group of three girls, of whom one is standing upon the marble bench on which the others are sitting, and is looking over the wall. In the other, a young girl, most exquisitely painted, is awaiting the arrival of a boat, which is to be seen making its way across the bay. Of the technical skill—approaching the marvellous—displayed in both works, it is impossible to speak too highly; but as Mr. Alma Tadema is realistic in the fullest sense of the term, he must subject himself to the laws of Nature, and study them elsewhere than in his studio, or through the medium of his imagination. Tested by these laws, we venture to say that "Expectations" is an impossible picture. The full blaze of sun which causes the girl and the marble bench on which she is seated to cast the shadow defined in the picture, would not leave the sea between the terrace and the shore in the deep uniform blue depicted, but would throw off myriads of bright golden tints. It is not competent for Mr. Tadema to reap the rewards of realism in one part of his picture and to claim the privileges of conventionalism or artistic necessity in the other.

Mr. P. R. Morris makes a new departure in his "Eve's Second Paradise" (135), where the mother of mankind is represented as watching her two infant children. There is some very good work in both the mother's figure and the surrounding foliage; and one is glad to have got away from the over-dressed children which Mr. Morris has of late years produced so bountifully. Even in this Arcadian work, however, he has been apparently unable to realise that a woman's second Paradise can be wholly free from finery—for he has placed dyed ostrich-feathers under the sleeping infants. Of Mr. C. E. Hallé's subject pictures, we prefer "Pets" (83) to either "The Fortune-Teller" (185), an old woman with a cunning leer, or "The Mirror" (76), to which the application of the motto quoted is not quite apparent. Although there is nothing very original in Mr. David Carr's "Bridge of Sighs" (9), a flower-girl asleep in one of the recesses on Waterloo Bridge, the moral has frequently been painted less forcibly. There is much character and even sentiment in the figure of the girl; and the grey dawn breaking over the smoky city is evidence of the artist's sense of colour and atmosphere. In a very different key is the happy scene of Mr. Stanhope Forbes' "Rope-Walk" (61), one of those studies in perspective in which he delights. The difficulties of light and drawing are honestly met and dealt with, and the result is a very interesting work. Mrs. Gardiner Hastings' "Ruth" (203), not "breast-high amid the alien corn," but in the threshing-floor of Boaz, displays a very marked advance upon her previous work. There is a sense of completeness, rather than of finish, about the picture, which suggests the pursuit of a definite purpose from the outset, and the result is that the whole picture is harmonious in colour and composition.

Of the works of the more orthodox, or rigid followers of Mr. Burne Jones, Mr. Strudwick is, perhaps, the most successful in his complicated but delicately-painted allegory, "A Golden Thread" (4); but neither Mr. Walter Crane in his "Pandora" (16), prostrate on a chest into which she might enter in search of Hope, or in his still more exaggerated "Freedom" (157); nor Mr. Holman Hunt in his "Bride of Bethlehem" (14), a hackneyed treatment of the subject; nor Miss Pickering's "Dryad" (43), a too close imitation of her master's work; nor Mr. Spencer Stanhope's "Birth of Venus" (130), can suffice to arouse our flagging interest in the neo-classics. For the moment at least, their vogue seems to have passed, and until some more vigorous exponents arise its return is a doubtful chance.

Amongst the landscapes and sea-pieces there are plenty of more than average merit, but few of any distinctive character. Mr. Napier Hemy's grey "Venice" (20), in spite of its title, is full of colour, thanks to the flowers and the ladies' dresses, with which the foreground is somewhat loaded. Mr. Alfred Parsons' "April is Coming" (104) is a very charming country lassie in a spotted cotton dress, standing in a meadow surrounded by primroses and daffodils—as pretty a suggestion of spring as one may hope to meet, and far more permanent in its attractiveness. It hangs beside Mr. Herkomer's oddly named "First Warmth of Spring" (103), which in reality is a remarkable study of lichen and moss-covered rocks, with a faint and meaningless landscape vaguely indicated in the distance. Mr. W. B. Richmond so seldom appears as a paysagiste that his "Athens in a Mist" (87)—a very poetical rendering of a classical subject—is doubly welcome. Mr. Mark Fisher has this year forsaken the Southdowns and gone to Ireland for his inspirations. His "Sketch" (25) and "Kerry Pastoral" (41) are soft and full of colour, whilst his "Low Tide" (2) is suggestive of that "melancholy ocean," the cause, according to Lord Beaconsfield, of so much of Irish sorrow. Mr. Edgar Barclay is especially strong in his moonlight effects—"Crossing the Beck" (45) and "Mushroom-Gathering" (46)—a dangerous subject to handle after F. W. Walker's masterpiece. Mr. David Murray's "Twixt Croft and Creek" (47), fishermen mending their nets in a pleasant green field under an open sky; Mr. M. R. Corbett's view of the "Ponte Molle" (63); Mr. Herkomer's somewhat ghastly "Gravedigger's Firewood" (73); Mr. James Orrock's "Summer on the Trent" (92); and Mr. J. Hope M'Lachlan's "Russet Woods" (184) are all marked by signs of careful work and of a certain revolt against traditional teaching; whilst Mr. W. J. Hennessy's "Flowers of May" (212) and the "Return from School" (206) of a group of happy children, above whom the spring moon is rising in chilly splendour, mark a very decided advance on the part of an artist who is thoroughly imbued with Corot's feeling for country life. Mr. Boughton appears in a new character as a salmon-fisher "On the Spey" (128) and on the "Beauley River" (178), and seems to have plied his rod—let us hope with as great success as he does his brush—in the twilight. Mr. A. Helcké's "Noontide Heat" (145) and Mr. Ernest Parton's "Country Bridge" (177) and "The Separation" (132) show to good effect; but Mr. J. W. North's "English Wood Nymph" (151), in spite of the extraordinary elaboration of the gorse and bushes, leaves too indistinct an impression on the eye to become popular.

Among the sea and water pictures, Mr. Keeley Halswelle's "Loch Awe" (8), with the mist dispersing, and "Flying Scud" (199), with the rushes shivering in the wind, are both full of movement, and in strong contrast with the long waves breaking lazily along Signor Costa's "Seashore" (40), or Mr. Talmage White's "Sands of Viarreggio" (146), across which through the dawn the rosy-tipped blue mountains of Carrara are just becoming visible. Mr. J. W. Inchbold's "Drifting" (247) has, at all events, the merit of boldness of conception; but we are unaccustomed, in these latitudes at least, to find so dominant a tone of green in sea and sky. There is, nevertheless, much that is attractive in the harmonious scheme of colour, which is not, we presume, intended to be regarded as other than a poetic fancy. On the other hand, Mr. Henry Moore in his "Queen of the Night" (120) can trace the rich blue tones of a summer sea even in the moonlight—a power denied to ordinary dwellers in our cold latitudes. Mr. C. E. Holloway cannot be accused of too pronounced a leaning to either green or blue in his work: he takes pleasure in muddy waters and dirty skies, and of this "The Harbour Bar" (59) is a typical instance. A far more ambitious, and also a more attractive, work is Mr. W. H. Bartlett's "First Sprats of the Season" (91), brought ashore in the boat round which the fisherfolk, young and old, are standing ankle-deep in the water, which gleams like molten silver under the oblique rays of the winter sun. Mr. Eugene Benson's "Venetian Lagoon" (156) is a still bolder and more remarkable attempt to deal with clouds and water; but Mr. Hamilton Maccallum's "Ship that Goes" (35) will appeal more strongly to the general public, as well as to all who value solid work.

The other pictures to which we especially desire to call attention are Mr. David Murray's "Château Gaillard" (34), Mr. Francis Bate's "Florentine Beauty" (18), a remarkable tour de force; Mr. Mortimer Menpes' series of little studies, Mr. W. S. Jay's "Valley of the Teme" (79), Mr. J. Ireland's "Avon, near Ringwood" (84), Mr. Padgett's "Son of Pan" (89), and Mr. George Clausen's "End of a Winter's Day" (182).

Police-Sergeants Cole and Cox, whose courage in connection with the dynamite explosions at Westminster Hall has already received public recognition, were yesterday week presented by Mr. Coleridge Kennard, M.P., with £108 10s. each, as the result of a subscription made on their behalf by members of Parliament. The presentation was made in the conference-room of the House of Commons, and was attended by several members of Parliament. Sergeant Cole, in addition to the money gift, was presented with a gold watch and chain.

MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS.

"Nadeshda," a romantic opera, in four acts; the libretto by Julian Sturgis, the music by A. Goring Thomas (Boosey and Co.). This is the new work by the composer of "Esmeralda," both having been commissioned by Mr. Carl Rosa, and brought out by him at Drury-Lane Theatre—the earlier in 1883, the later last month; each having been greatly successful, as recorded in our notices of their production. Having already commented on the merits and characteristics of "Nadeshda," we have now only to draw attention to the publication of the vocal score, in a handy and inexpensive form; the orchestral accompaniments having been skilfully adapted for the pianoforte by Mr. M. B. Foster.

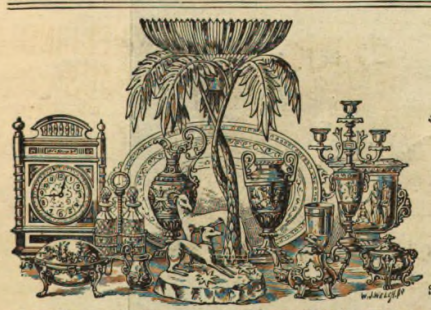
"The Mikado; or, The Town of Titipu," by W. S. Gilbert and Sir Arthur Sullivan (Chappell and Co.). This new comic opera, in which the literary skill and humour of Mr. Gilbert and the musical genius of Sir A. Sullivan are—as on many previous occasions—so happily combined, was spoken of fully in our notice of its production at the Savoy Theatre last March. It is now published for voice and pianoforte in a portable shape, at a small price; the accompaniments well adapted from the full score by Mr. G. L. Tracy, of Boston, United States.

"Te Deum," by Berlioz (Stanley Lucas, Weber, and Co.). This is another publication, just issued, of a work recently commented on. The extraordinary piece of service-music now referred to was first produced at Paris in 1855, and remained unheard until performed at a Crystal Palace concert last month, when it was noticed by us. It is now available in a cheap and neat edition; the elaborate orchestral accompaniments skilfully arranged for the pianoforte by Mr. C. A. Barry, who has also written an explanatory preface.

"Irma," opera in three acts, written and composed by J. H. Bonawitz (Stanley Lucas, Weber, and Co.). This work, with an English text written by Mr. Sinclair Dunn, was performed at St. George's Hall, Langham-place, in March last, when it was noticed by us. The edition, published as stated above, contains both the German and the English words, and is neatly engraved and printed, at a moderate price.

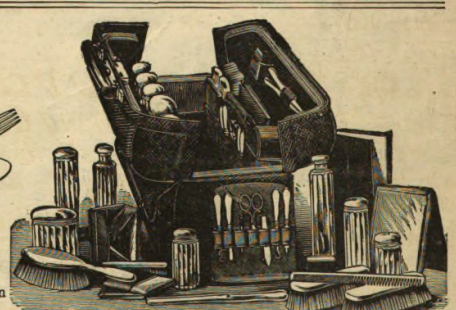
Mr. Carnegie has consented to continue Master of the Essex Union Hunt for another season.

By 29,946 votes against 22,755, the ratepayers of Glasgow have refused to sanction the adoption of the Free Libraries Act.



According to the bills of entry, 20,276 oxen and bulls were imported into the United Kingdom in April. The number of cows received was 3935, of calves 5929, and of swine, 320. The number of sheep and lambs imported was 70,197, of which Germany sent 54,790.—There was a large increase of imports of foreign live stock and fresh meat last week, the total being—2024 cattle, 13,132 quarters of beef, and 1609 carcases of mutton.

The Duke of Devonshire, in order to encourage an extensive fishing industry on the Sussex coast between Eastbourne and Langney Bay, has offered the fishermen a large tract of land as a gift for ever, besides £1000 for protection against sea encroachments. Mr. Davies Gilbert has promised similar gifts in land and money to complete fishermen's quarters, representing over £10,000 in fishing property.



The testimonial to the Lord Mayor, which was subscribed last year, will be presented next Thursday, the 28th inst. The testimonial consists of a diamond necklace and pendant to be presented to the Lady Mayoress, and a silver centrepiece to be given to the Lord Mayor, together with his portrait, by Mr. F. Holl, R.A. The presentation will be made at the Mansion House, at 4.30 p.m., on the 28th inst., by Sir George Chambers, the chairman of the fund.

A medallion portrait of the late Mr. Peter Squire was unveiled by Sir Spencer Wells, Bart., F.R.C.S., at the house of the Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain, in Bloomsbury-square, on Wednesday afternoon. Mr. Squire was one of the founders of the society in 1842, was thrice elected President of it, and was its Examiner in Botany for twenty-seven years. He was Chemist in Ordinary to her Majesty for forty years; and he wrote the widely-known "Companion to the British Pharmacopœia."

The report for the year ending Dec. 31, 1884, of the governors of Queen Anne's bounty states that the grants for the year amounted to £17,800, and the benefactions attracted thereby were of the value of £21,157. The governors have been enabled to make grants in respect of seventy-six applications, and for special reasons have made a second grant to nine, and a third grant to two of them. The grants were in respect of eighteen livings not exceeding £100 per annum, thirty-seven over £100 and not exceeding £150, twenty over £150 and not exceeding £175, and one over £175 and not exceeding £200. The amount received from first fruits and tenths, after deducting the expenses in respect of collection, management, and distribution, was a net sum of £13,858. This sum, increased by the surplus of the general revenue of £5699, shows the total sum available for distribution by the governors in the year 1885 to be £19,557. The governors have outstanding on mortgages of benefices the sum of £1,088,836, lent for residence houses and other purposes, in pursuance of various Acts of Parliament. The trust funds held by the governors amount to a capital sum of £4,398,159, and comprise nearly 7000 open accounts.

THE WEAR OF EVERY YARD IS GUARANTEED by the Manufacturer, and every yard of the genuine bears the name "LOUIS."

Patterns and Prices post-free from nearly all Drapers throughout the kingdom.

The strictest examiner may try every test of touch and sight without discovering that these are other than the Genoa Velvets which they so closely resemble, while the peculiar arrangements resulting in the fast woven pile enable them to stand interminable and rough wear, which would ruin real velvets at four times the price. For Costumes and Trimmings it is unequalled, and, in fact, for all purposes in which Silk Velvet may be used we specially recommend the "LOUIS" VELVETEEN.

Every yard of the genuine bears the name "LOUIS."

IMITATION GOLD WATCH,

WITH ALBERT AND PENDANT,

FOR ONLY A SOVEREIGN!

THE CHEAPEST WATCH IN THE WORLD. JEWELLERS PUZZLED AND ASTONISHED.

ROYAL KEYLESS GOLD WATCH.

REGISTERED.

Gives the New as well as the Old Time.

A Limited Number of our CELEBRATED ENGLISH MOVEMENT WATCHES will be sold to the Readers of this Journal at only 20s. each; with each Watch we also will send a beautiful ALBERT and COMPASS PENDANT. We are induced to make this sacrifice knowing that anyone ordering a Watch will be so highly pleased that he will continue to be a regular customer, and buy other jewellery from us, as shown in our Illustrated Catalogue, which we send with each Watch. We guarantee these Watches to be PERFECT TIME-KEEPERS. The works are of ENGLISH MAKE, celebrated for their excellence the world over. The face is covered with SOLID CUT CRYSTAL, the case is finished with our new imitation GOLD, the best substitute for gold ever discovered. It puzzles jewellers to tell that it is not Solid Gold, even by the chemical test, as it will STAND ACID, and resembles gold very closely. It gives the new as well as the old way of reckoning time, as shown in design. The Government has recently changed the Standard Time at Greenwich, and there is no doubt but that the New Time will be in universal use in a short while, some of the Railway Companies having already adopted it; but, for the convenience of persons who may be confounded by the New Time, our New Patented Dial gives the New Time as well as the Old, so that the Old System forms a key to the New. Directions sent with each Watch. They are suitable for use on Railways, Steamers, and all other places where Accurate Time is required.

We append one of the testimonials out of the thousands we have received from Professional Men, School Teachers, Mechanics, Farmers, Young Men, and Labourers, who are using the Watch.

"8, Somerset-street, Portman-square, W.

"Gentlemen,

"I think it is only due to you that, although unsolicited, I should testify to the great value of your 20s. Keyless Watch. I bought one from you for my son some five months ago; but on his telling me that it kept such accurate time, I have preferred carrying it myself in lieu of my expensive gold lever, and I can conscientiously say that a better time-keeper could not be desired by anyone.

"Yours faithfully, WALTER SCOTT.

"H. C. Wilkinson and Co., Limited, 135, Regent-street, W."

In fact, we GUARANTEE the WATCH, and WILL REFUND THE MONEY if it is not as represented. Wishing to immediately place one of these valuable Watches in every locality throughout the world, we make the following offer:—

OUR GRAND OFFER. ON RECEIPT OF 20s., we hereby agree to forward by Registered Post, to any address, one of the above-described Watches, a beautiful Gold-Plated Albert, with a handsome Pendant attached, all securely packed in a strong casket.

We can only send out a Limited Number of these Watches at price named, and, in order to protect ourselves from jewellers and speculators ordering in large numbers, we will insert this Advertisement in THIS JOURNAL BUT ONCE.

Under no circumstances will we send MORE THAN ONE WATCH AT ABOVE PRICE to any one person, and if others are desired, we will furnish them at regular prices. If you do not want a Watch yourself, you can sell it to some neighbour, and make a handsome profit. Many of our Agents sell these Watches at from Two to Four Guineas. We will post you Catalogues containing valuable certificates at the same time we send Watch, and feel that you will be so highly pleased that you will exhibit Catalogues and Watch to your friends, thus ASSISTING us in selling OTHER GOODS OF STANDARD QUALITY, which we manufacture from new and original designs, and guarantee to give satisfaction. Our firm is known all over the world, and we always do just as we say we will. If you do not order at once, PRESERVE THIS ADVERTISEMENT FOR FUTURE USE. Send money by Registered Letter, P.O.O., Postal Order, or Cheque. If you are in London at any time, we shall be pleased to have you call on us. Address—

OUR NOTE-BOOK

It is scarcely too much to say that the poet Gray owes all his popularity to a single poem. It is not as the author of "The Progress of Poesy" or of "The Bard" that his name is familiar to every English reader. Students of poetry admire those odes; but the "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard" is the best known poem in the language. We learn to love it as children; we repeat it with more exquisite delight in manhood and old age. Such a poet needs no external testimony to his merit, for he lives in the hearts of his countrymen. It is fitting, however, for the credit's sake of Cambridge, that his genius should be acknowledged on the spot with which his memory is associated. Three years ago, Mr. Gosse wrote—"Not a medallion, not a tablet within Pembroke College bears witness to any respect for the memory of Gray on the part of the society among whom he lived for so many years." Thanks to Mr. Gosse's exertions, that reproach exists no longer, and Lord Houghton probably never performed a task with greater pleasure than when he unveiled the poet's bust last Tuesday in the college where he died.

France has lost her most illustrious man of letters. Victor Hugo's rank in literature must be determined by posterity; but the position he occupies at the present time in the eyes of his countrymen is of the highest order. To them he is something more than a great poet and romance writer. He is an incarnation of the spirit of the age in France, an "apostle of Humanity," whatever that term may imply—a Republican of the strongest type, an enthusiastic politician, a cosmopolitan in theory, but a cosmopolitan who regarded France as the centre of the universe. Englishmen have been perplexed and astounded again and again at utterances from Victor Hugo that seemed to them like rodomontade, but they have always appreciated the passionate love of country that has inspired his eloquence. And they can understand, too, his generous self-abnegation, his freedom from petty aims, his indomitable courage, his exhaustless activity. His faults were chiefly on the surface, his virtues appealed to the highest aspirations of his countrymen; and the loss of such a man, although at a ripe age, is one that may justly call for the sorrow of a great people. Ultimately, and out of France, the name of Hugo will be probably remembered as that of a splendid lyric poet.

Everybody must know by name Messrs. Gaze and Cook, the rivals who "personally conduct" the unprotected tourist; but everybody does not know what a humorous treasure is possessed by one of those firms. Within the last few days a tourist, wishing to compare the methods and rates of Messrs. Gaze and Messrs. Cook, paid a visit to the office of the former, and, having purchased a "guide," candidly avowed the object in view, and requested to be informed where the office of Messrs. Cook was to be found. The representative of Messrs. Gaze assumed an air which would have done credit to a student trying to solve a difficult problem, and replied: "Cook! the name seems to be familiar to me, but I can't tell you exactly where the place is." So a Gladstone might say that the name of Beaconsfield seemed familiar to him, but he couldn't say exactly where the owner of the name did business.

A great counting over of the money and securities in the vaults of the United States Treasury at Washington has just taken place, and the only discrepancy between accounts and assets is that two cents are missing from a package of small money in the cash-room. In the course of the investigation, a curious discovery was made in one of the vaults, where a heavy square box, secured with red tape, was found in an obscure corner. The key was not forthcoming, so a locksmith was sent for; and when the box was opened, it was seen to contain a bottle of diamonds and a bottle of pearls, with a flacon of otto of roses, and a lump of gold. An employé who has grown grey in the service of the Treasury identified these valuables as presents sent by the Japanese Government to President Monroe as long ago as 1823. He could not, or would not, accept them until an Act of Congress had been passed authorising him to do so; but Congress, having weightier matters in hand, postponed legislation on the Japanese present, which was deposited in the Treasury for safety, and, being out of sight, passed completely out of mind, and has remained perdu ever since.

We hear sometimes of cruel parents, and at others of those who, by undue sparing of the rod, spoil the child; but for kindness and forethought there is a man in Kansas who stands facile princeps as a considerate father. He has twelve children. Six only of them are named; the remainder are known by numbers, and will be called one, two, or three, as the case may be, until they arrive at what their parent may deem years of discretion. Not to allow his progeny to go through life with Christian names which may be objectionable to them or unsuitable to their special talents or tasks, he waits until they are of an age to consider for themselves what they would like to be called; then the numeral gives place to a prenomen, and all parties interested are satisfied. "What's in a name?" said Shakspeare's Juliet. Under similar circumstances, a sweetheart of one of the Kansas family would sigh, "What's in a number?"

An attempt to introduce trout into Cape Colony has not proved so satisfactory as could have been wished. A fund was organised to pay the expenses of the experiment, and Messrs. Donald Currie and Co. carried the ova free. A large majority of fish died through lead-poisoning, but the survivors are doing fairly well. Fresh consignments will be sent out each season, so there is yet a chance of the Cape streams being stocked with trout.

The general depression, which has affected every description of merchandise, has reduced the value of silver as compared with gold to such an extent that the Government are now making an enormous profit out of silver coinage. About fifteen years ago the profit was only nine per cent; last year a pound of silver, which made sixty-six shillings, could be bought in the market for 46s. 6d. At home we are not disposed to consider such trifles. So long as the coin passes current according to its supposititious value, we are satisfied to accept it and pay it away; but the decrease in value must, if the depression continues, cause inconvenience abroad to those who want to change English money for foreign, or vice versâ. Shall we ever have societies agitating for the big shilling as they used to cry out for the big loaf?

Pessimists who are always grieving over the decadence of art and wailing over the lack of public appreciation of pictures will be surprised to hear that nearly double as many people visited the National Gallery on Monday last as were there on the corresponding day in the previous year. Of course, the wet weather, which prevented out-door enjoyments, is to some extent responsible for this result; but the recent acquisitions to the exhibition, and the effect of education on the masses, no doubt have something to do with the gratifying increase of those who prefer art to Aunt Sally and pictures to pothouses.

Hall Place, near Bexley, about thirteen miles from London, is to come under the auctioneer's hammer next month, and it is to be hoped that the purchaser, whoever he may be, will duly appreciate all the picturesque charms of the old edifice. It has been kept in admirable order of late years, but was long dilapidated and used as a school, the fine old hall being the school-room. There is an ancient water-mill on the premises, and the River Cray, dear to anglers, flows at the back of the house. It was at Hall Place, within easy reach of the Palace at Eltham, that Edward the Black Prince lived with his wife, Joan, the Fair Maid of Kent, and a long series of black crosses are still distinctly visible in the thick roofed wall that divides a marvellous old fruit-garden from the high road, which runs very near the front of the building.

The literary and artistic worlds have a treat in store; for Professor Ruskin has compiled his reminiscences, with which we are to be favoured in monthly parts, the first making its appearance on the first day of June. True to his old raid against the profits of the publishing trade, our queer though kindly art critic will have the numbers printed at Orpington, instead of issuing them through any great firm. It is unkind of him thus to hide his light under a bushel; for he will never be "read of all men," as he deserves, while his works are so difficult to procure. They would be rapidly snapped up if they only figured in the catalogues and advertisements of popular publishers.

The idea of the Gordon Boys' Camp is a thoroughly practical one, and completely in harmony with the views of the humanitarian hero after whom it will be named if it ever becomes an actuality. Two ladies have given, through Miss Gordon, £2000 towards the undertaking, on the understanding that if no camp is started it shall be returned, and with the further stipulation that if the camp come into existence, it shall not be denominational, and shall be open to the lowest and poorest. The nineteenth century ought to be clear-sighted enough to take these things for granted, not only in the Gordon Camp, but in all schemes for the benefit of the masses.

A series of articles on "Nature and Art at the Academy" has been begun in the Pall Mall Gazette, and many curious discrepancies are pointed out, arising, probably, from the fact that so many artists are town born and bred, and have never lived with nature as Wordsworth and Thoreau did. It really is a very usual thing for painters to represent blue hyacinths blossoming side by side with dog-roses, and poppies keeping company with primroses. A similar instance has just occurred in the coloured picture of a popular Transatlantic magazine, where a hedge-sparrow's nest is shown on the ground among the grass and flowers. If the nest had only been a lark's, nature would not have been outraged; but evidently to that artist a nest was a nest, just as to Peter Bell a primrose was a primrose.

The enormous supplies of natural gas which have been discovered in some parts of the State of Ohio, and laid on to several important manufacturing towns, have awakened a great deal of interest among scientific men, as might have been seen by an article in Macmillan's Magazine a short time ago. This month a still more marvellous vein of gas has been struck at a place called Shelby, at a depth of 480 ft. The men who were prospecting for it, knowing by a peculiar roaring sound they had heard on similar occasions that the object of their search was at hand, fled for their lives, escaping just before the gas rushed from the orifice with a tremendous report, and shattered all their machinery. A long pipe was laid into the well as soon as possible, and it has ever since furnished a steady stream of fire 25 ft. in height.

Women, however exalted their rank, are not usually supposed to have much weight in the councils of nations; but it is confidently affirmed on the Continent that the Princess of Wales and the Czarina have had great influence in bringing about a peaceable solution of the Afghan difficulty. The Crown Princess of Germany, though entirely sympathising with them, judged it wise to stand aloof, but has expressed her affectionate admiration of her sister-in-law by calling her the Goddess of Peace.

The scratches on the pictures at the Royal Academy are mysterious, yet not more so than the extraordinary impulses that cause the barking of trees, the breaking of iron railings, and the knocking over of gate-posts everywhere. A propensity for wanton mischief, unhappily, is one of the signs of the times.

At Newmarket last week the match between the Duke of Portland's extremely moderate Iambic and Admiral Tryon's Asil, a pure or "natural" Arab (who won the Arab race at Newmarket last July), bred in England, was noteworthy because it proves for about the *n*th time that the "son of the Desert," though receiving 4½ st. (the almost feather-weight of 7 st. against the welter-weight, and even hunting-weight, of 11 st. 7 lb.), is of no use whatever against an ordinary English racehorse over three miles of the Beacon Course, or, indeed, over any distance of any sort. Nor is there much reason to think that the "Arab steed" is not equally played out as a sire; though in that capacity he was undoubtedly of great service to us before, and perhaps a little after, the days of Eclipse, Highflyer, Pot8os, and Waxy. But it seems as if nothing more can now be made of him; Admiral Tryon (among other enterprising gentlemen) has "tried it on," as became so suggestive a name, but hitherto without much, if any, success. Perhaps it might be worth while, until some new kind of horse is discovered, to try a cross of the quagga, if naturalists do not forbid the banns.

The Derby, which is considered (by stable-boys and others) to be one of the bulwarks of the British Constitution, is close at hand. Its "blue ribbon" will be lost and won on the 3rd proximo. The date this year is unusually convenient, as it falls during the Parliamentary recess, so that we shall be spared the farce which is generally acted in the House of Commons just before the Derby, and in which poor Sir Wilfrid Lawson, unmindful of his namesake who was so conspicuous in old times upon the turf, was wont to play a prominent part.

June 3 is the birthday of Prince George of Wales; but "The Prince" this year is "not in it," though he ran for the Derby two years ago. As for running the Derby in June, it is common enough, as has already been pointed out in these Notes. The reason why an idea prevailed that to run the Derby in June is irregular was due, no doubt, to the accident whereby it came to pass that between 1840 and 1859—that is, for eighteen successive years—it so happened that Derby Day fell in May, though Oaks Day, two days afterwards, and at the same meeting, was the 2nd of June in 1843 and in 1854. The Derby Day has fallen on some day in June nineteen times (since the institution of the race in 1780) before this year—in 1791, in 1794, and in 1797 (when an "unnamed" colt won), in 1802, in 1808, in 1810, in 1813, in 1821, in 1824, in 1829, in 1832, in 1835, in 1840, in 1859, in 1862, in 1870, in 1874, in 1878, and in 1881; and five times—in 1802, in 1813, in 1824, in 1840, and in 1874—the momentous day has been, as it is this year, the 3rd.

As regards the Oaks, which has come to be completely overshadowed by the Derby, it is the earlier institution by one year, and though fillies are very "kittle cattle," has displayed the greater constancy, as regards its conditions. From 1779 (the first year of the Oaks) to this day the distance has always been a mile and a half, and the fillies always carried 8 st. 4 lb. up to 1841, when the weight was raised to 8 st. 7 lb., as it remained up to 1862 when it was altered to the 8 st. 10 lb. of to-day. In the Derby, on the other hand, the distance was at first one mile, which was altered to a mile and a half in 1784; and the weights have varied from time to time as follows: from 1780 to 1783, both included, colts 8 st., fillies 7 st. 11 lb.; from 1784 to 1800, colts 8 st. 3 lb., fillies 8 st.; from 1801 to 1802, colts, 8 st. 3 lb., fillies 7 st. 12 lb.; from 1803 to 1806, colts 8 st. 5 lb., fillies 8 st.; from 1807 to 1861, colts 8 st. 7 lb., fillies 8 st. 2 lb.; from 1862 to 1883, colts 8 st. 10 lb., fillies 8 st. 5 lb.; which was altered last year to colts 9 st., fillies 8 st. 9 lb. So that, so far as the Derby is concerned, the tendency is towards higher weights, if not also towards the longer distances which Jeremiahs of the "old school" would fain re-establish. With the exception of 1786, when the race was run on a Wednesday, the Derby was always decided on a Thursday (the Oaks being run the very next day) up to 1838, when Wednesday and Friday were definitively assigned to Derby and Oaks respectively. The "off day" thus intervening was probably appreciated by Blink Bonny when she won both Derby and Oaks in 1857; but Eleanor, the only other filly that has ever performed that double feat, does not seem to have required the interval of rest in 1801. It is a wise and humane provision, all the same.

The first year of the Stakes instituted and named at Newmarket Second Spring Meeting in honour and memory of the late Mr. George Payne, a gambler after the heart of the illustrious Charles James Fox, was 1880, and since then, it may be remarked, for Melton's sake, that of the winners of the Payne Stakes, to wit Mask, Monarch, Little Sister and Executor (a dead-heat, after which Little Sister walked over, and stakes were divided), Splendor, and Harvester (last year), the last is the only one that has been near winning the Derby, and he won just half of it.

To lean on precedent (which, however, is but a broken reed), Melton cannot win the Derby; for he won the Middle Park Plate, and no winner of the "two-year-old Derby" has yet won the three-year-old. On the other hand, it stands to reason that the spell must some day be broken, and Melton is as good a name as any other to conjure with.

The Iowa Indians of Kansas, once a great and powerful tribe, have now been reduced by war, disease, and the pressure of civilisation, to about one hundred and fifty souls, and have decided to withdraw permanently into the wilds, or Indian territory, where some of their brethren have preceded them at different times during the last five and twenty years. They have therefore decided to sell their reservation of land on the Great Nemaha Agency to the United States Government, and deposit the price in its keeping, which they consider perfectly safe and trustworthy. This small remnant of the "noble redmen" is decidedly wealthy, and the State already holds a great many bonds belonging to them. This is a very curious result of the mingled instincts of civilisation with those of savagery.

THE COURT.

The Queen, accompanied by Princess Louise (Marchioness of Lorne), Princess Beatrice, the Princess of Leiningen and Princess Margaret, and Prince Arthur of Connaught, left Windsor on Thursday evening last week for Balmoral, arriving there on Friday afternoon. Prince Henry of Battenberg had previously left for Germany. Sunday was the anniversary of her Majesty's birthday. Divine service was conducted at Balmoral Castle by the Rev. Archibald Campbell, minister of Crathie, in the presence of the Queen, Princess Louise, Princess Beatrice, and the Princess of Leiningen. The Queen's dinner party included Princess Louise, Princess Beatrice, and the Princess of Leiningen, the Countess of Erroll, the Hon. Horatia Stopford, the Hon. Evelyn Moore. Viscount Bridport, Lord Edward Clinton, and Sir Henry Ponsonby, K.C.B. On Monday the Queen, accompanied by Princess Louise, Marchioness of Lorne, and Princess Beatrice, went out in the morning, and her Majesty in the afternoon drove with the Princess of Leiningen. Princess Louise and Princess Beatrice went out riding. Monday was the anniversary of Princess Helena's (Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein) birthday. The Rev. Archibald Campbell had the honour of dining with the Queen and Royal family.

Letters of grateful acknowledgment have been received by the Archbishop of Canterbury from her Majesty the Queen and his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, for copies of the revised version of the Bible, presented on behalf of Convocation. In both, the revisers are congratulated on the successful termination of their labours.

The Prince of Wales will, by command of the Queen, hold a Levée at St. James's Palace, on behalf of her Majesty, on Tuesday, June 9. The first State Concert is fixed for June 2, and the first State Ball for June 12; the second State Ball, June 26, and the second State Concert, July 3.

The Prince of Wales paid an informal visit to Yarmouth last week, inspecting the Smack-boys' Home, the Home for Convalescent Children, and other places of interest. His Royal Highness was received everywhere with loyal enthusiasm. The Prince, accompanied by Prince Albert Victor, arrived at Sandringham from Great Yarmouth on Saturday afternoon. The Princess, accompanied by Prince George and Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud, also arrived at Sandringham in the afternoon from London. On Sunday, the Prince and Princess of Wales, with Princes Albert Victor and George, Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud, accompanied by the guests staying in the house, and attended by the ladies and gentlemen of the household, were present at Divine service at the Church of St. Mary Magdalene, in the park at Sandringham. The Rev. F. Hervey, M.A., Chaplain to the Queen, Domestic Chaplain to the Prince of Wales, and Rector of Sandringham, officiated and preached. At the annual meeting of the Royal Agricultural Society yesterday week, Sir Massey Lopes, M.P., presiding, the Prince of Wales was elected president of the society for the coming year. Prince Albert Victor left Sandringham on Monday, and proceeded to Cambridge for the purpose of resuming residence at Trinity College. Prince George of Wales also left Sandringham, and proceeded to Portsmouth to resume his duties on board her Majesty's ship Excellent. Monday, June 29, has been fixed for the presentation of the freedom of the City of London to Prince Albert Victor. After the ceremony a State déjeûner will take place in the Guildhall.

The Duchess of Edinburgh and suite witnessed the second representation of "Excelsior" last Saturday evening at Her Majesty's Theatre. The Duke and Duchess have left Clarence House, St. James's, for Eastwell Park for the holidays. Prince Alfred and the young Princesses left for Eastwell on Friday, last week. The Duke, and the five young Princes and Princesses, on Tuesday visited the College at Ashford, when the new carillon was started, and performed the tunes which have been arranged to be chimed by the instrument for a fortnight. The Marchioness of Lorne has joined the Duke and Duchess at Eastwell, where she will remain for a few days.

The Duke and Duchess of Connaught arrived at Bombay last Saturday, and embarked for England on Tuesday last.

The Duke of Cambridge, as Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief, held a Levée at the Horse Guards on the 21st inst. There was a full attendance.

Princess Mary Adelaide (Duchess of Teck), the Duke, and Princess Victoria Mary, and their younger sons, arrived at St. James's Palace on Tuesday morning from Florence, after a lengthened absence abroad.

FASHIONABLE MARRIAGES.

The marriage of the Hon. Alfred Lyttelton, brother to Lord Lyttelton, with Miss Sarah Tennant, daughter of Mr. Charles Tennant, M.P. for Peebles, was solemnised on the 21st inst. at St. George's, Hanover-square, before a large and fashionable congregation. The bride wore a magnificent dress of white satin, the orthodox veil, and a wreath of orange-blossoms, fastened with diamond stars, while she carried a very large bouquet of the choicest white flowers. The best man was the Hon. E. Lyttelton. The service was partially choral. Among the crowd of guests who filled the church were, beside the immediate relatives of the two families, the Prime Minister and Mrs. Gladstone, the Duke of Devonshire, the Marquis of Hartington, and Lord Houghton.

A marriage is arranged between Lord Norreys, son of the Earl of Abingdon, and Miss Glyn, daughter of the late Vice-Admiral the Hon. Henry Carr Glyn, C.B.

The first meet of the coaching clubs this season will take place to-day (Saturday), when the Four-in-Hand Club will assemble at the Magazine, Hyde Park, at 12.30.

Mr. E. N. Fenwick, barrister of the North-Eastern Circuit, has been appointed the first stipendiary magistrate for Bradford, at a salary of £1000 per annum.

Messrs. Field and Tuer, of the Leadenhall Press, have issued a curious little volume, entitled "Old London Street Cries and the Cries of To-Day," illustrated by a series of quaint cuts.

The Irish Lawn-Tennis Championship Meeting concluded on Tuesday, in Dublin, when Mr. E. Renshaw played for the championship of Ireland and the silver challenge cup against Mr. Lawford, the holder, who maintained his position as champion.

Mr. Lloyd Jones on Monday presided over the first of the three days' sittings of the Co-operative Congress at Oldham, and delivered an address in which he declared that co-operation, which had been the growth of years, had now been tested by severe, extensive, and long-tried experiment, and had come out of the trial triumphantly.

The polling for the county of Antrim, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of the late Mr. Chaine, took place on the 21st inst., the candidates being Mr. W. P. Sinclair, Liberal, and the Hon. Robert O'Neill, Conservative. Mr. Sinclair polled 3971 votes, and Mr. O'Neill, 3832. As Mr. Chaine, the late member, was a Conservative, Mr. Sinclair's return is a gain of a seat to the Liberal party.

THE LATE MR. PETER SQUIRE.

On Wednesday week, the ceremony of unveiling a portrait medallion of the late Mr. Peter Squire, in the Pharmaceutical Society's house, Bloomsbury-square, was performed by Sir Spencer Wells, Bart., in the presence of a large company, which included Sir Oscar Clayton, Dr. Morell Mackenzie, Mrs. Rose Mary Crawshay, Dr. Protheroe Smith, Dr. J. W. Ogle, Dr. Hare, and the Rev. W. Barker. The President of the Pharmaceutical Society (Mr. Carteighe) read letters from Sir Henry Acland (President of the General Medical Council), Sir John Clark, Bart., Sir Edwin Saunders, Dr. Quain, F.R.S., Dr. Charles West, Dr. Buchanan, F.R.S., Mr. White Cooper, F.R.C.S., and others, expressing sympathy with the object of the meeting. Sir Spencer Wells spoke of the regard felt by a great many of the medical profession for Mr. Squire, and how much they valued the association of the work of the pharmaceutical chemist with their own. He referred to the ability, energy, and industry with which Mr. Squire worked in arranging our present Pharmacopœia, and in bringing together the Scotch, Irish, and English pharmacopœias, so as to form one British work. He mentioned that when anæsthesia was first attempted in this country, Mr. Squire constructed the apparatus by which the operation was performed, which apparatus is now in the museum of University College. It will be remembered that Mr. Squire was three times President of the Pharmaceutical Society, and was its Examiner in Botany for twenty-seven years. Dr. Garrod, F.R.S., Mr. Haynes Walton, F.R.C.S., Dr. Theodore Williams, and Professor Bentley also spoke of the merits of Mr. Squire. The sculptor of the medallion is Mr. T. Brock.

THE REBELLION IN CANADA.

The rebellion of the French half-breeds and some Indian tribes in the North-West Territory of Canada was described last week. It seems nearly over; Louis Riel, the author of this folly and mischief, whose capture was announced, is to be tried at Regina for treason; an attempt will be made to prove him insane. The Indian Chief Poundmaker has made his submission, which will be followed by others more remote, but several will have to take their trial for cruel murders. Our correspondent, Captain H. De H. Haig, R.E., Assistant Quartermaster-General of the Staff of General Middleton, C.B., the able Canadian Commander-in-Chief, whose prompt and successful action merits the honours of a K.C.B. and of a K.C.M.G., has sent us a few more Sketches. One of them represents the Artillery at Clark's Crossing, on the South Saskatchewan, waiting for the ferry which was contrived, by the method of a wire-rope stretched from bank to bank, with a "scow" attached to it hauled by pulleys, to cross the river, three hundred yards wide; this could be done in two minutes and a half, and the whole operation, loading, passing over, and unloading, was performed in sixteen minutes. Captain De Haig sketched also the portraits of the three Indian spies, the two sons and the brother-in-law of White Cap, the former chief of the Sioux tribe in the United States' Territory, who had come into the Canadian Dominion to join this insurrection. It is now stated that White Cap, as well as Poundmaker, has surrendered to the authorities, and we believe none of his tribe belong to the native Indians of the Canadian Territory. Sitting Bull was another Sioux chief who came a few years ago, red-handed from the crimes he had committed, seeking refuge in Canada, but was quickly arrested and brought back by the Canadian Mounted Police, an excellent force of five hundred men, having their head-quarters at Regina, who have just lost one of their best officers by the death of Captain French in the recent fighting. The principal native tribe on the Saskatchewan and its branches is that of the Blackfeet, most of whom are peaceably disposed; the Iroquois are settled in Ontario, the Micmacs in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and in British Columbia there are the Chinnooks and other tribes; but they have nothing to do with each other. In general, the Canadian Indians are fairly quiet subjects; in the year 1883, in the whole North-West Territory, there were but 386 criminal charges among them, mostly for very slight offences, and but one case of murder. The Dominion Government has long taken great pains to provide for their welfare, giving them lands, keeping up agricultural and industrial schools for them, and supplying them with cattle, seed, and farming implements. Those on the seacoast and estuaries find regular employment in the fisheries. The Iroquois of Ontario are quite civilised folk, not only cultivating their farms, but keeping the local roads and bridges in repair; and some have obtained a superior education. The total number of Indians in the whole Dominion of Canada is 131,000, including the Esquimaux of the Arctic regions; there are 12,000 in the province of Quebec, 18,000 in Ontario, 34,000 in the North-West Territory, and 36,000 in British Columbia. There is not the slightest danger of their ever combining in a general rebellion.

The Whit-Monday holiday in the metropolitan district was marred by unfavourable weather, rain falling heavily during the afternoon, while the temperature was cold. Nevertheless, vast crowds of holiday-makers visited all the favourite places of public resort, the attendance in some cases being larger than on any corresponding day.—The Volunteers in camp in the neighbourhood of London went through a number of drills, and some gun practice, notwithstanding the very unfavourable weather.

VICTOR HUGO.

"The Late Victor Hugo" seems hardly the correct style of mentioning that famous old man of genius who expired at Paris yesterday week. He was so intensely full of life, and so much of his life, being mental and spiritual, subsisting in ideality and in vast and sublime aspiration, cannot depart from this world by the removal of his bodily presence. Had he not been, as he was, a rational believer in personal immortality and in Divine Providence, many unbelievers might be led to ask themselves again, contemplating such minds as his, with so grand and various a range of intellectual and moral sympathies, whether they could be wholly extinguished by what is called death.

Victor Hugo, though not the greatest of poets, and certainly not much as a philosopher or as a politician, had the aspiring, far-seeking, idealising kind of imaginative power in the highest degree. It inspired him with the vehemence of a prophetic strain, in the utterance of passionate appeals on behalf of humanity, of mercy, and of liberty, which have often touched the heart not only of France, but of Europe. His love of mankind was not merely that political enthusiasm for the masses, which values them as the source of democratic advancement; he cherished men, women, and children individually, and most tenderly the poor, the simple, the weak, the distressed, the degraded. That is a spirit which cannot be supposed to die; its mission cannot be ended in four-score years on this earth; but all we actually know is the work it has left behind it here—in his case, literary work, an immense quantity and diversity of compositions, the quality of which, from a critical point of view, appears sometimes admirable, sometimes very faulty, while its spirit, in general, is pure and noble. Great powers, exerted for great and true and lofty aims, entitle their possessor, in spite of many defects and failings, to be called a great man.

Victor Hugo was of a Lorraine family, and was born at Besançon, in March, 1802, son of an officer of the French Army, who afterwards rose to the rank of General, and whose wife, mother of the poet, was a native of La Vendée, in Brittany, an ardent Catholic and Royalist. He was educated in a rather desultory manner, his childhood, from removals of the family, being spent partly in Italy and Spain, partly in French provincial towns, and in Paris; he never became an exact or profound scholar, but gained a large acquaintance with the Latin poets, historians, and orators, from whom he made copious translations. While yet in his teens he produced a large quantity of poetry, and wrote several romantic tales. He married at twenty-one, and devoted himself to literature as a profession, receiving a small pension of £80 a year from King Louis XVIII., as his political sentiments at that time were favourable to constitutional monarchy. Under the reign of Charles X., when a reactionary system of government provoked Liberal minds to opposition, Victor Hugo joined their party, but scarcely as a politician; there was a literary and artistic revolt against orthodox rules and standards, especially those of the classical French drama, in which he soon took a leading part. The Romantic School, as it was called, allying itself with protests against every form of despotic authority in Church and State, delighted to expose the crimes of Princes and Courts, of a feudal nobility, and of a bigoted priesthood in the Middle Ages. These became themes of imaginative fiction and of theatrical representation, to which Victor Hugo contributed the most effective pieces, but they were often forbidden on the stage till after the Revolution of 1830. "Hernani," acted a few months before that memorable event, had an exciting effect on the Parisians; it was followed by "Marion Delorme," "Le Roi s'Amuse," "Ruy Blas," "Les Burgraves," and others of similar tendency. The prose romance, "Notre Dame de Paris," better known in the English translation as "The Hunchback of Notre Dame," gained popularity all over the world, and is a most interesting story of its kind.

Victor Hugo was in favour with the Government of King Louis Philippe, who made him a member of the Chamber of Peers in 1845; he had been elected to the French Academy four years before. At the Revolution of 1848, he became one of the most frequent orators in the National Assembly, having finally embraced Democratic Republican principles; and after the coup d'état of December, 1851, going into exile, he began to lash the Emperor Napoleon III. with tremendous severity in prose and verse. "Napoléon le Petit" and "Les Châtiments," which there is no need to quote at the present day, can never be forgotten by those who read them at the time, knowing the circumstances of the perfidious treason, the foul conspiracy and usurpation to which they related. Victor Hugo resided at first in Jersey, afterwards, during fifteen years, in Guernsey, at Hauteville House, Port St. Pierre, and did not return to Paris till the downfall of the Empire, in 1870.

His best works, those upon which his fame will chiefly rest, were written in this interval; "Les Contemplations" and "La Légende des Siècles," in verse, the latter being a religious epic, of the evolution of moral good and ultimate defeat of the powers of evil, the concluding book of which came out in 1883; and in prose, in 1862, "Les Misérables," a story of the most pathetic interest, with the most exquisite delineations of character, and breathing the finest spirit of human charity, while its scenes and incidents are most vividly described. "Les Travailleurs de la Mer," published in 1866, a Guernsey fisherman's story of labours, perils, and adventures, has even stronger narrative interest as a mere romance; but "Les Misérables" is of wider and higher scope.

It is unnecessary here to mention Victor Hugo's many other writings, some of which are extremely wild and fantastic. After his return to Paris, he was elected to the National Assembly; and under the Republican Constitution became, in 1876, a member of the Senate, but could no longer exercise much influence over the politics of the day. He presided in 1878 at the celebration of the centenary of Voltaire, and at the International Literary Congress. His own contemporaries, in February, 1881, celebrated, with public festivities and signal honours, the entrance of Victor Hugo upon the eightieth year of his age, and there was a renewed demonstration of esteem upon his eightieth birthday. He had been long a widower, and had lost two sons and two daughters, but took great delight in two young grandchildren. He has left property to the amount of £180,000, derived from his literary earnings.

What shall we say of this great French author? That we admire his genius, and feel much sympathy with his spirit, and hold him one of the literary glories of the age? If we had to assign him a place in literary history, we might say that, so far as a free-thinking Frenchman of the nineteenth century may be compared with a Florentine and scholastic Catholic of the thirteenth century, Victor Hugo has some affinity with Dante. Across the space of ages, despite the enormous difference of creeds, of institutions, of social life and manners—substituting the modern ideal of Human Progress for the mediæval ideal of a Theocracy in its twofold administration of spiritual and secular rule—Victor Hugo's "Divina Commedia" sounds a tone of similar fibre. He has the same prophetic attitude, the same oracular delivery, though he is a Parisian homme de lettres and not a companion of pedants and monks. The world, however, in all ages of history, goes its own way, obeying common motives and habits, while the Apostle of an Idea delivers his message and departs.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

"AN END OF HIM."

If Lord St. Austell very seldom permitted himself to be thoroughly angry, he was frequently out of sorts, and would snarl savagely at those about him because the weather was bad, or because he had received some troublesome letters, or because of fifty trifling vexations for which they were in no way responsible. His wife, on the other hand, who was easily moved to wrath and easily pacified, was too essentially good-natured to indulge often in a fit of general ill-temper. But these two people, like the rest of the world, had their exceptional days; and it so chanced that while one of them was allowing passion to get the better of him, as narrated in the last chapter, the other was sitting in her boudoir in Grosvenor-square, looking as cross and sulky as any shrew.

Lady St. Austell had various reasons for being at odds with Fate. To begin with, an uncle of hers had chosen that inopportune time of year to have a long illness and die, at the end of it, so that she had only just been able to return to the city that she loved. And as though it were not bad enough to be defrauded of half her season, and to have to wear mourning (which was not becoming to her) for two months, the dress-maker must needs send her home half a dozen new frocks, of which four could not, by any amount of squeezing and struggling, be made to meet, while the remaining two were disgraceful misfits. Such trials were enough to upset anybody's equanimity; but over and above these Lady St. Austell had that morning had the mortification of discovering that there was something dreadfully wrong with her hair, which was coming out in positive handfuls; and this had led her into an altercation with her maid, in the course of which the latter had addressed her most disrespectfully.

It was indeed rather of this maid's behaviour than of her other annoyances that she was thinking as she sat alone and idle, one plump little hand supporting her cheek while the other beat the devil's tattoo upon the arm of her chair. The woman had been disagreeably familiar of late, and occasionally insolent. She had taken her own way rather too openly, and had even thrown out some veiled hints that if she were interfered with, she would know how to retaliate. Lady St. Austell understood pretty well what these hints meant, and had thought it better not to notice them; because it might, perhaps, be inconvenient if Bowman were to divulge all that she had seen and heard during the past six months or so. But what was more disquieting, was that Bowman seemed to be aware of certain things which she could not possibly have either seen or heard. "I wonder whether she reads my letters," Lady St. Austell mused. "I don't very much care if she does. There are only a few that I shouldn't like her to see, and they are locked up, fortunately."

She glanced down at her châtelaine, upon which she kept the little Bramah key of the despatch-box that held these compromising documents, and suddenly started to her feet, exclaiming "The wretch!" The key was gone; and, at the same moment, she remembered that it was the first thing that she had seen, on waking that morning, had been her despatch-box, which—owing, no doubt, to the confusion attendant upon the unpacking of a host of trunks—had not yet been carried down to its accustomed place on her writing-table. Without losing a moment, she flew up stairs and burst impetuously into her bed-room.

A shriek and a loud crash greeted her entrance. There stood the guilty Susan, with an open letter in her hand; and there, at her feet, lay the overturned despatch-box, its contents scattered over the carpet.

Susan's previous experience of her mistress's ways may have led her to expect a violent outbreak; but if that was what she looked for, she was disappointed.

"Bowman," said Lady St. Austell, quite quietly, "you will receive a month's wages, and leave the house before night. You need not apply to me for a character."

Susan made for the door without replying. But upon the threshold she halted and turned round, with a malicious smile. "I think, my Lady," said she, "you had better give me a character, if I ask for it."

"You had better not ask for it," replied Lady St. Austell, coldly. "If you do, I shall give you the character that you deserve."

"Oh, very well, my Lady; thank you. I'll do as much for you—and more. I'll give you the character that you deserve without waiting to be asked for it. You see, I've got something here that's as good as a written character."

It was the letter which she had been perusing when she had been so unexpectedly interrupted, and she now held it up between her finger and thumb with a nod of triumph.

Lady St. Austell seemed alarmed. She drew a step or two nearer to her maid and said, appealingly, "You wouldn't do that, Bowman! You wouldn't really steal one of my letters and give it to somebody else to read!"

"Not unless you force me to it, my Lady."

"Not unless I force you to it?" repeated Lady St. Austell, musingly. She approached a little closer still, her eyes were cast down, and she appeared to be lost in thought. All of a sudden she made a spring at the sheet of note-paper which was being waved menacingly over her head, and snatched it out of the grasp of the astonished Susan, who had not supposed that anything of that kind was coming. "Now you can go, Bowman," said she.

Susan cast a glance at the papers with which the floor was strewn. It would have been easy enough, perhaps, to possess herself of some of them; but whether she would not lose more than she would gain by a personal conflict with her employer seemed open to doubt. "I'm sure I don't want to make mischief, my Lady," she said; "but I can't afford to be ruined either. Find me another place, and I'll hold my tongue. Refuse me a character, and I speak to his Lordship this very day."

Lady St. Austell was neither a very courageous nor a very wise woman; but she knew better than to fall into such a trap as this. "You can say what you please and do what you please," she replied; "but you will leave the house to-night, as I told you. If you are not gone by nine o'clock, I shall send for a policeman and give you in charge for breaking open my despatch-box."

It is not likely that Miss Bowman was much frightened by the latter threat; but Lady St. Austell's coolness was not without its effect upon her. She did as she was told, and went away, merely remarking, "Very good, my Lady. Don't say I didn't let you have your choice, that's all."

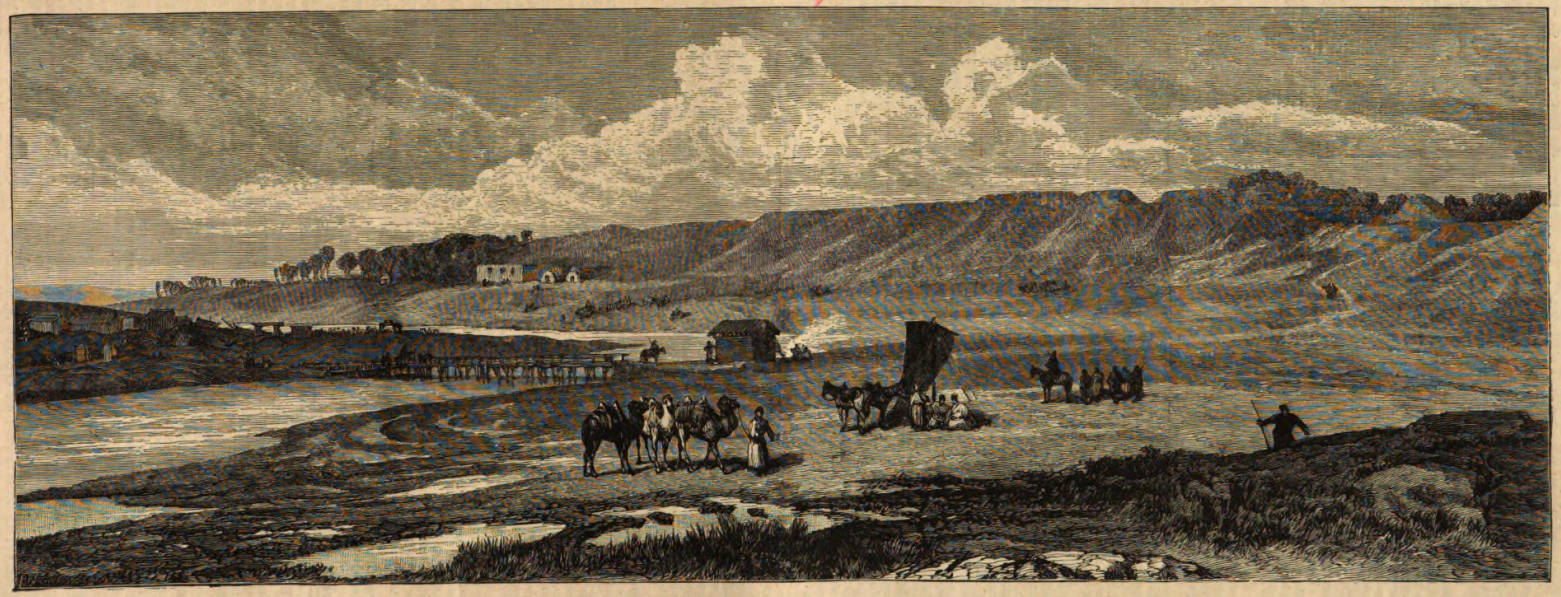
The moment that she was gone, Lady St. Austell gathered up the scattered letters and ran down with them to her boudoir. She sat down, and sighed once or twice as she gazed at the various samples of masculine handwriting that lay on her lap. It grieved her to break these few remaining links with the past, some of which carried her back to a period when she had owed allegiance to no aged lord and had dreamt of love in a cottage as a not altogether impossible form of happiness. But there was no time for indulging in sentimental retrospection now. She had chosen a castle in preference to a cottage, and it would never do to let written evidence remain which might deprive her of the residence that she had selected. In truth, that result was hardly one which could have been brought about by a perusal of the correspondence in question, and had it been submitted to a jury of her Ladyship's fellow-countrymen, they would probably have come to the perfectly just conclusion that she had been nothing worse than indiscreet. But Lady St. Austell, not being quite so sure of that, and having an unreasoning dread of her husband, thought it best to be upon the safe side. She hastily dragged away the stand of flowers in pots which concealed the fire-place, and, casting the cherished relics into the empty grate, applied a lighted match to them.

No one who has not tried to burn a bundle of letters in a hurry can have any idea of the time that it takes to consume a few dozen sheets of paper. Quite half an hour elapsed before Lady St. Austell threw herself back in her chair, with flushed cheeks, muttering, "There! Now, unless Johnny Spencer has kept some of my notes—which I don't for a moment suppose that that hag of a wife of his will have allowed him to do—I think I am pretty safe."

Hardly had she breathed these words when she was startled by a smart tap at the door, and before she could say "Come in," she found herself confronted with her husband. Decidedly, it was not a lucky afternoon. Lord St. Austell looked very black; his customary grin had vanished altogether; his thin lips were tightly set, and it was easy to see that he was in one of his least amiable humours.

"Burning letters?" he asked, with a glance at the shrivelled shreds of paper on the hearth. "An excellent plan. There is only one better as far as I know, and that is not to receive any."

"How can one help receiving letters?" asked Lady St. Austell, faintly.



"I'm sure I don't know—I wish to goodness I did! But your letters, I should imagine, are chiefly answers, and I can give you as practical a piece of advice about them as 'Ask no questions, and you'll be told no lies.' Don't write rubbish to young fools, and you won't have to scorch your face till you look like a cook by burning their replies on a hot summer afternoon."

"How coarse you are!" cried Lady St. Austell, indignantly. "I am not given to behaving in the way that you describe."

"Are you not? But I haven't asked any questions, you know, so you needn't—well, you needn't answer. In point of fact, I don't feel the slightest curiosity about the matter. All the same, I wouldn't keep such a rascally lady's-maid, if I were you."

"I am not going to keep her; I have just dismissed her. Has she been speaking to you?"

"Yes; she has. Bounced out at me as I was coming up stairs and began to pour out such a stream of venom that she positively frightened me. I told her to go to blazes."

"Did you, really?" exclaimed Lady St. Austell, gratefully. "Thank you, Sidney; you acted like a gentleman."

"That appears to surprise you. Personally, I am not certain that it is very like a gentleman to use strong language to one's inferiors; but she ought not to have bounced at me. I can't stand being bounced at. She is a good-looking woman, too," continued his Lordship, meditatively. "Cursed with a vile temper, though, I should think."

His own temper seemed to have improved since he had entered the room; but presently his brow grew dark again. "I don't often interfere with you," he resumed. "I let you choose your own acquaintances, as a rule. You don't choose them wisely; but that is rather more your affair than mine. Every now and then, however, I must claim a right of veto; and, just now, you will oblige me by striking those Vidal people off your visiting-list."

"By all means, if you wish it," answered Lady St. Austell, with the most heartless alacrity. "I had almost forgotten that we knew them."

Even Lord St. Austell could not help smiling at this. "The extraordinary part of it," he remarked, addressing himself to no one in particular, "is that she is speaking the simple truth."

"Of course I am speaking the truth," she returned; "what is there so extraordinary in that? I generally do speak the truth, if you only knew it. I told you nothing but the truth that unfortunate day when you found me at Mr. Vidal's house; and if you imagine that I have the least wish to see him again"——

"I assure you I have never indulged in any speculations upon that point. All I know is that I don't wish to see him again—or his wife either. They are objectionable, vulgar sort of people; and we will not receive them any more, if you please."

And with that, Lord St. Austell, who, perhaps, feared that if he lingered he might be drawn into explanations which he would afterwards regret, picked up his hat and stick, and went off to his club.

On his way down Bruton-street he encountered a young man of amiable, but somewhat jaded aspect, who smiled and half stopped as though with the intention of accosting him; but perhaps he did not recognise this young man, for he passed on, staring blankly at vacancy through his eye-glass, and Adrian, proceeding towards Grosvenor-square, muttered, "I wonder whether that was an intentional cut."

Adrian had heard that Lady St. Austell was in London, and, after some hesitation, he had decided to call upon her. He had been able to give himself various good reasons for so doing. It would be an act of common politeness; it would show her that the unpleasant circumstances of their last meeting had not lessened his friendly regard for her, and so forth. But in reality he was going to Grosvenor-square, because he was anxious to see how Lady St. Austell would receive him. Would she express any regret for having got him into trouble with his wife by her imprudence? Would she show him the cold shoulder, as so many others had taken to doing of late? Above all, would she join in the general condemnation of his new book? There was little enough danger of her offending him in this last particular, seeing that she did not so much as know that he had published another work; but such ignorance as that he may be pardoned for not having foreseen, and he stepped on towards his doom with more or less of cheerful anticipation.

He was admitted into the long drawing-room which he knew so well, and was kept waiting about a quarter of an hour before Lady St. Austell appeared. When she did appear, it was with an air of hurry and preoccupation. She said, "Oh, how do you do?"—and sitting down, began to open and examine a number of notes—invitations apparently—which she had carried in with her, addressing a little perfunctory conversation to her visitor while she did so.

Presently, she rose, crossed the room to her writing-table, and began to scribble off replies. "May I trouble you to ring the bell?" she said, and when a servant presented himself, she wanted to know why the menu had not been sent up to her? Let it be brought immediately. And covers were to be laid for sixteen not fourteen. Had the flowers arrived from the country? and had anybody unpacked them yet? From time to time she threw a remark or a question over her shoulder at Adrian. "How hot it is to-day, is it not?" "Can you tell me what the day of the month is?" "Have you been long in London?" &c., &c.,

All this evidently meant, "I don't want to be bothered with callers just now, and I should be much obliged if you would take yourself off." It is never exactly agreeable to receive such broad hints; but if Adrian's mind had been in its normal condition, he would have retired gracefully, without showing any foolish consciousness of having been snubbed. His condition of mind, however, happened at that time to be abnormal, and he could not for the life of him help showing that he was angry.

"My name is Vidal, and I live in London," he said at length. "I mention these facts because you appear to have forgotten who I am."

"Oh no," answered Lady St. Austell, laughing a little; "I remember you quite well."

"Then may I ask whether I have offended you in any way? Because, if you remember me at all, you must remember that we were rather friends a few months ago."

Lady St. Austell laughed again. She would have preferred that Mr. Vidal should go away in a huff without demanding explanations; but the main thing, after all, was to get rid of him, and she knew that she could do that in a very few minutes.

"I don't go in for undying friendships," she replied. "When people begin to claim the privileges of friends, they invariably begin to be bores."

"I should be sorry to be a bore," said Adrian, getting up, "and I think I may safely take upon myself to say that you will not find me one; for I shall certainly claim no privileges of any sort or kind in future. You are quite right to throw me overboard; you only follow the fashion. Everybody else is doing the same."

"Can't you swim?" asked Lady St. Austell, with an air of innocent wonder.

"I am almost afraid not; but whether I swim or sink, I suppose the ship will sail on without me much as usual. Good-bye."

"Good-bye," said Lady St. Austell, sweetly; and thus Adrian left the house in Grosvenor-square for the last time.

"So there is an end of him," mused her Ladyship, after he had gone. "I don't think I regret him much. He was extremely good-looking; but he didn't seem to know how to use his advantages, and I was getting very tired of him. I wonder what he meant by people having thrown him overboard. Perhaps they are getting tired of him, too. That would not astonish me."

CHAPTER XXXVII.

UNCONDITIONAL SURRENDER.

Among the oral traditions of the Vidal family, it is related that, at the tender age of five and a half, Adrian, who had been guilty of some infantile misdemeanour, was sentenced to a period of solitary confinement extending over several hours. At the expiration of the term, the nurse was sent to release the prisoner, and, on approaching the apartment in which he was locked up, was horrified at encountering a strong smell of burning. "I do believe that wicked boy have gone and tumbled into the fire, just to spite his mar!" she is reported to have exclaimed. Adrian, however, had not adopted quite so extreme a measure. He was found seated on the heathrug, in a state of absolute nudity, pensively contemplating the slow combustion of his boots, which, together with his shirt, tunic, and other articles of apparel, he had placed upon the red-hot coals, and which by this time were reduced very nearly to ashes. When Mrs. Vidal, in her cold way, asked him what he had expected to gain by this act of incendiarism, he replied to the effect that his object had been twofold. In the first place, he had wanted something to do; in the second, he had considered that the punishment inflicted upon him was out of all proportion to his offence, and, as it had not been in his power to lessen the former, he had felt it incumbent upon him to establish an equilibrium by increasing the latter. The destruction of his clothing had seemed to him the readiest means of achieving this end, and he had destroyed his clothing accordingly.

More than once in later life Adrian acted upon a similar principle, though perhaps without acknowledging it so plainly either to himself or to others. At the period of his history to which we have now come, he was suffering under a deep sense of wrong. Everybody had treated him badly—his wife, the critics, Lady St. Austell, the editor and proprietors of the Anglo-Saxon—in short, the world at large; and his nature forbade him to sit down and brood over unmerited ill-usage. It was no discredit to him that he felt the same necessity in his manhood as in his childhood to be doing something; but it was certainly unfortunate that he had not grown out of the childish notion that that something, in order to be at all satisfactory, must be more or less naughty.

If he had been asked why at this time he joined himself to a rather faster set than any that he had hitherto been mixed up with, and why he made himself conspicuous by his attentions to certain ladies who were known to delight in conspicuous attentions, he might have replied that he wanted to drown care; but it may be assumed that the pain thus inflicted upon his wife was not only known to him, but in a measure agreeable. He had spoken of being thrown overboard; but in reality he could still go to two or three parties on most nights, if he was so inclined; and it suited him to do so. There was no longer any question of Clare's accompanying him; she, as has been seen, had adopted another method of dealing with care. Sometimes, however, he had the honour of escorting his sister into the world.

Georgina so far resembled her brother that she was fond of society, and could not endure inaction. Possibly, she may have resembled him in the further particular of thinking society the best cure for low spirits. She was, at all events, not so cheerful as she had been the year before, and many of her friends noted a disposition towards silence and listlessness on her part, which had never been among her characteristics, and for which they were at a loss to account.

A still more remarkable phenomenon—nothing less, indeed than a genuine and vivid blush—might have been seen upon the countenance of Miss Vidal one evening in July, at a ball to which she and her brother, among several hundreds of others, had been invited. But as nobody could have expected to witness such a manifestation, it probably escaped notice, and was certainly not observed by the individual who was responsible for it. He said, "How do you do, Miss Vidal?" without any apparent embarrassment, and Georgina quickly recovered her self-possession.

"So here you are back in London again," was her greeting.

"Yes," answered De Wynt "here I am again; and I want to talk to you, if I may."

Georgina drew her skirts away from the few extra inches of bench which they had been covering. "Sit down," she said, "and proceed. What is your news?"

"It isn't exactly news," answered De Wynt, squeezing his small person into the space cleared for him. "That is, I am not sure how far it may be news to you; but most likely you don't hear all that I do. You know your sister-in-law was awfully kind to me while you were away."

"Was she? I have no doubt you deserved her kindness."

"I don't know about that; but she was kind to me. And your brother—well, he is your brother."

"That is undeniable."

"So that even if I didn't care about him for his own sake, I should for the sake of others; and I don't like to see him going to——to——may I speak plainly?"

"By all means. You don't like to see him going to the devil."

"I meant to say, the dogs; but perhaps the other expression comes nearer the truth."

"And how are you going to prevent him from reaching his destination, whatever it may be?"

"I don't suppose I can prevent him; but you might. I know you think I attach too much importance to what the world says; but I do assure you that no man can afford to be talked about as people are talking about Vidal now. And that isn't all. I am afraid he is coming to grief in other ways. I am afraid he is getting indifferent about his work, and running into debt. I don't apologise for repeating what I hear to you, because I am sure you won't misunderstand my motives. No doubt a great part of it is not true; but it is safe to conclude that a small part is."

"As far as I can judge, it is all true," said Georgina, with a sigh.

"Well, we know pretty well what the meaning of it is, and the cause of it, and that the whole thing could be set straight if only one of two persons would give way just a little bit. Now, I don't think there's much good in speaking to Mrs. Vidal."

"I don't think there is," agreed Georgina. "I made my little effort in that quarter, and the result was discouraging."

"Heriot might help; but he's too ill to leave his house, poor beggar, and Vidal won't go near him. He told me so the other day, when I looked him up. So you see, there really is only you."

"And what am I to do?" inquired Georgina.

"I shouldn't venture to suggest. I am rather dull, as you know; and you are very clever."

"Clever as I am, I confess that I don't quite see my way. If people will insist upon marrying, I am afraid they must accept the natural consequences of their folly."

"Quarrels and misunderstandings are not the natural consequences of marriage," said De Wynt, dogmatically.

"Are they not? Well, I never was married myself, so I can only judge by appearances. You, I hear, will soon be in a position to speak authoritatively upon the point."

"What do you mean?" asked De Wynt.

"It is currently reported that you are about to be married—and to an heiress, too. I don't mean to assert that marriages of that kind are acts of folly."

"Whoever told you that I was going to be married told you a—a deliberate falsehood!" cried De Wynt, warmly. "No one can possibly have believed such a thing—you least of all."

"I did believe it, though; why should I not? You will probably marry one of these days."

"I don't know. It will depend upon whether the only woman whom I shall ever ask to marry me persists in refusing me or not. But, as I was saying, marriages don't necessarily bring about dissensions. When they do, it is because there has been no previous understanding. Now, I do think that you and I understand one another perfectly. You have your tastes and I have my little prejudices. We should both have to give way to a certain extent; but I don't think we should mind that—at least, I am sure I should not. Only, I should have to bar the South Sea Islands. When one has a property to look after, one can't go quite so far as that every winter."

"It seems to me," remarked Georgina, "that we are getting very far indeed from the subject that we started with."

"No, not so very; because, supposing that we could act together, we might see our friends through their troubles, I think; and I am sure that I could be of use in many ways, if only you would give me the right to be of use."

"But, Mr. De Wynt, I have told you already that I cannot accept your offer."

"You never gave me any reason for refusing it, though. If you tell me that you don't care enough about me to marry me, there's an end of it, and I won't bother you any more; but if it is only that I happen to have come into a little money"——

"You have been writing to Clare!" broke in Georgina, suspiciously.

"Yes, I have; I am not ashamed to confess it; and it was she who told me what you said about not choosing to marry a man who had just inherited a fortune. As though I should be likely to think that you would accept me for that reason! Now, Miss Vidal, I have a right to an honest answer. Can you or can't you care for me?"

"You are very peremptory. A ball-room is not the proper place for this sort of thing."

"Nobody is looking at us; and I shouldn't care if everybody was. Don't keep me in suspense any longer. I have been very patient—I think you will allow that—and surely I am entitled to an answer now."

"If you are quite convinced that it is my duty to Adrian and Clare," began Georgina.

"It is your duty to yourself to answer Yes, if you can," said De Wynt, earnestly. "And your duty to me too," he added.

"Ah, yes: I foresee that I shall hear a good deal about my duty to you. Well—I surrender, then. It's an unconditional surrender. I haven't the slightest belief in your give-and-take system, you know. Of two people, one must rule and the other must be ruled; and I suppose perhaps you had better be the ruler. Give me your orders, and I will humbly endeavour to execute them."

But De Wynt had no specific commands to give; and although the newly engaged pair did not separate for another hour, it must be confessed that at the end of that time they had agreed upon nothing more precise then that it behoved Georgina to "speak to" her brother.

The great holiday began on Monday, extending in the manufacturing districts over the greater part of the week.

The annual Whitsuntide procession of children attending the Church of England Sunday-schools in Manchester took place, as usual, on Monday, under very favourable conditions as to weather and organisation. Children to the number of nearly 30,000 marched from all parts of the city in the morning to Albert-square, fronting the Townhall, until, at half-past nine o'clock, the whole quadrangular space was occupied by them, with from thirty to fifty bands of music, each band followed by a magnificent banner, and throughout the ranks of the processionists hundreds of bannerets and mottoes were carried, which gave a very picturesque appearance to the spectacle. After perambulating the main thoroughfares of the city, the children attended religious service in the Cathedral, and others in the churches connected with the schools they attend. In the afternoon they enjoyed the annual visit to the fields in the locality.

At Preston the festival opened with a great school procession. Then followed the procession of the Catholic Guilds, which took over an hour to pass a given point. The town was crowded with visitors, chiefly from North and East Lancashire, and the streets were lined with spectators as the processions passed. Most of the thoroughfares were decorated with flags and streamers. The Orange bodies also walked in procession, and the demonstrations in connection with the Church of England schools took place in the afternoon.

A gathering of nearly 40,000 people assembled in the Piece-Hall of Halifax on Tuesday to commemorate the centenary of Sunday-schools. These large assemblies are held at intervals of five years. The scholars and teachers, numbering about 29,000, were entering the hall from ten o'clock to twelve, and formed, with the 600 vocal performers and 500 instrumentalists, a very powerful band and chorus—Mr. Abel Dean conducting for the eighth time. There were also more than 8000 spectators. The programme of music included six hymns, also three choruses, these being Beethoven's "Hallelujah," Haydn's "The Heavens are telling," and Handel's "Hallelujah," all of which were given with impressive effect by so vast a body, who for a long time have been carefully trained.

John Dailey was on Monday brought up at Bow-street Police Court, charged with wounding Elizabeth Whiting, a domestic servant, in Torrington-square. He called at the house, suddenly took a knife from his pocket, and stabbed her three times. Jealousy appears to have been the cause of the act. He was committed for trial.

Miss Bertha Dennis, a young woman belonging to Reigate, who mysteriously disappeared on March 4, has returned home, giving a remarkable story to the effect that she was drugged in a railway carriage, kidnapped, and forcibly detained in some house, the whereabouts of which she can give no account. The police are inquiring into the matter.

A daring diamond-robbery has been committed in Hatton-garden. While Mr. J. F. Alexander, one of the partners of Alexander Brothers, was seated in his office, a man entered, seized a pocket-book containing upwards of £2000 worth of stones, and, disabling Mr. Alexander by throwing snuff in his face, succeeded in escaping. In the course of a struggle, a pistol which the thief carried was discharged, injuring Mr. Alexander in the right hand.

BATOUM TO MERV.

The march of the Russian Empire from west to east so far across Central Asia has been made a theme of indignant political comment. It should, however, be observed that, until of late years, when the transit of the Caspian became an important factor of the military problem, it was from the North—from the old dominion of the Czars in Siberia—that compulsory civilisation made its descent first on the Mongolian, then upon the barbarian Turkish nations around the Aral Sea, whence it passed up the Syr Daria, the ancient Jaxartes, to occupy the fertile regions about Khokand. The annexation of Merv is an event of yesterday, having taken place only in January, 1884; while the subjugation of the Turkomans along the direct line eastward from the south-eastern ports of the Caspian, which Mr. Simpson, our Special Artist, has recently described, is a novel feature in this grand transformation of Central Asia. Bokhara and Khiva have not yet been annexed, but have been reduced to political vassalage under the domestic misrule of their Turkish Khans. The reader who wants fresh and full information concerning the present state of all these countries is recommended to get the two volumes published by Messrs. Sampson Low and Son last week, entitled "Russian Central Asia," by the Rev. Dr. Henry Lansdell, to which we have referred in another article. But in the actual situation of affairs, more especially in view of any military action which the Russian Empire might have to direct towards the frontier of Afghanistan (which we trust will now be averted by wise counsels of equity and peace) the line of advance might possibly be from the shores of the Black Sea, or from the Caucesian provinces, over to the Caspian; then by the short steam-boat passage from Baku to Krasnovodsk, of which port Mr. Simpson gave us a capital View last week; and on by the railway already constructed from Michaelovsk, which line will soon be extended the whole length of the Trans-Caspian provinces, by Askabad to Sarakhs and to Merv. All this has been explained in detail by Mr. Simpson; and it justifies our presenting now the Views of Batoum and Merv together, as the western and the eastern terminus, respectively, of a most important line of communication, running tolerably straight, from the Black Sea to the heart of Central Asia. The entire distance would be about 1300 miles, including the passage of the Caspian, and may possibly hereafter be accomplished by passengers in a week.

The port of Batoum, which was ceded by Turkey to Russia under the stipulations of the Berlin Treaty of 1878, was to be a "free commercial port"; but there was no express prohibition to fortify it, or to erect a naval arsenal there, which Russia is reported now to do, violating perhaps the spirit and understood intention, though not the letter, of the European compact. It belongs to what is now the Russian part of Armenia, which includes also the famous fortress of Kars; and it is situated on the Black Sea, about thirty miles south-west of Poti, the original starting-point of the Tiflis railway, which is continued to Baku, on the Caspian Sea. Batoum will henceforth be the western terminus of the railway, the distance to Tiflis being about 220 miles, while from Tiflis to Baku is 340 miles. Batoum affords the only natural harbour in that part of the Black Sea; a spit of land projects into the bay here, and gives a shelter, but the harbour still lies rather open to gales from the north-east, and it is intended to run out a mole from the land on the east side, which will make it a large and safe port, having a depth in most parts of 60 ft. The railway starts from the harbour shore, close to the landing, and sweeps round the town, whence it follows the line of the bay to the east. The Russians have quite lately been busy at work reconstructing the old Turkish fortifications which face the sea; and our Special Artist's Sketch shows, to the right hand, another old earthen fort, still called by the Turkish name of Kara Listif, commanding the inside of the bay.

We are enabled also, through Mr. Simpson, to copy a view of Merv from a picture which was painted by Colonel Zumkoffski for the Emperor of Russia. Merv, which was locally known as "Kala Kaushid Khan" while held as a Tekke Turkoman stronghold, is little better than a collection of mud huts, with a large unfinished fort which those people began to erect after the capture of Geok Tepe, but which they surrendered to the Russians without fighting. It occupies the site of a former important trading town, some traces of which are visible; but its situation, in a fertile oasis watered by the artificial canals made long ago from the Murghab river, which spends itself in this place, having no further outlet through the desert, can support a large population. The oasis around is covered with large mounds, which are the remains of the ancient city. The late Mr. Edmond O'Donovan, Special Correspondent of the Daily News, who resided five months at Merv, has described it in a most interesting narrative of personal adventure. He mentions a wooden bridge over the Murghab, which is probably the same that is shown in this picture; and it may be conjectured that the long mound here visible is part of the fortifications erected by the Tekke Turkomans at the time when he sojourned among them.

A lacrosse-match between teams representing England and Ireland was played at Belfast last Saturday, and resulted in a victory for the home team by six goals to nil.

The great summer exhibition of flowers at the Crystal Palace was held on Friday and Saturday last week. It is described as the finest show of the kind ever held there.

Last Saturday the old burial-ground of St. John the Evangelist, Horseferry-road, Westminster, now converted into a public garden, was formally opened by the Duke of Westminster, who has contributed most of the necessary cost.

The late Lord O'Hagan has, by his will, left to his daughter Frances, the wife of Mr. Justice O'Hagan, £10,000 for her separate use. Besides some smaller legacies to his relatives and friends, he bequeaths all the rest of his property, real and personal to his wife, who is to be the guardian of his children.

The coal-fields of New South Wales are of enormous extent. The mineral has been traced for hundreds of miles along the coast, and has been worked at various levels, from 450 feet below to 1500 feet above the sea. The lower beds are geologically older than any that have been yet worked in Europe, and the quality of the coal which is taken from these inferior strata is therefore unsurpassed. Not only so, but in certain districts immense seams of this mineral are found in immediate juxtaposition with an abundance of iron ores, limestone, and fire-clay. Hence Nature seems to have indicated New South Wales as the great manufacturing colony of the Australasian group. Up to the present time, coal has been ascertained to exist over an area of something like 25,000 square miles of country; and it is almost everywhere within easy reach of water or railway communication. Now, when it is remembered that the coal-fields of Britain only cover one twentieth part of the area of the country, or about 4000 miles, and that nevertheless the output of this mineral in the mother country is upwards of 120,000,000 tons per annum, it would be difficult to over-estimate the magnitude of the proportions to which the coal trade of New South Wales may be expected to grow hereafter

MUSIC.

The eight-weeks' season of performances of operas in English will terminate this (Saturday) evening with Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro" strongly cast. Since our last notice there has been nothing calling for comment, Mr. Goring Thomas's "Nadeshda" and "Esmeralda," M. Massenet's "Manon," and other operas recently noticed, having been repeated to good audiences. Our comments on the closing performance of Mozart's immortal work—given for the first and only time this season—must, of course, be made next week.

The Philharmonic Society's concert of last week closed the seventy-third season with the sixth performance of the series. The occasion brought forward, for the first time here, an orchestral "Symphonic Poem," entitled "Johanna D'Arc," which was conducted by the composer, Herr Moszkowski—a native of Berlin—who has produced some charming pianoforte music. The piece now referred to is probably written in emulation of the "Poèmes Symphoniques" of Liszt, Herr Moszkowski having sought in like manner to illustrate a given subject—in this instance, the career of the Maid of Orleans, according to the dramatic version of Schiller. The music is divided into four portions, respectively dealing with Joan's pastoral life and her vision of the mission assigned her; her inward struggles and memories of the past; the procession of the conquerors to the coronation at Rheims; and the captivity of Joan, her release, triumph, death, and apotheosis. Each division contains some very effective writing, with an occasional tendency to diffuseness, especially in the first and last movements. The second number (an "Andante") is by far the best in its continuous interest, the beauty of the melodic themes, and the variety of the orchestral effects. Herr Franz Rummel played Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat ("The Emperor"), Mr. Santley contributed vocal pieces, and the orchestra gave effective performances of Wagner's overture to "Der Fliegende Holländer" and that by Gounod to "Mireille." With the exception above specified, Sir Arthur Sullivan conducted with the same ability as throughout the series of concerts just terminated. The season is understood to have been a successful one.

The fifth Richter Concert of the season—last week—comprised fine orchestral performances of Brahms's Academic Festival Overture, the Funeral March from Wagner's "Götterdammerung," Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" Overture, and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony (in B flat), which last was preceded by an extract from the final scene of Wagner's opera-drama, "Das Rheingold," in which the vocal music of the Rhine-daughters was well sung by Misses A. Sherwin, Friedlander, and Goldstein; as was that of Loge and Froh by Mr. B. Lane, and that of Wotan and Donner by Mr. W. Mills. There was no absolute novelty, but the programme was of strong and varied interest. The sixth concert of the series takes place next Monday evening.

The Royal Academy of Music gave a students' concert of chamber music at St. James's Hall yesterday (Friday) week, when the performance was preceded by the Dead March in "Saul"—played on the organ by Mr. Tonking, with accompaniment of drums by Mr. A. Godfrey—in tribute to the memory of the recently deceased Earl of Dudley, president of the institution, and of Mr. W. H. Holmes and Mr. Brinley Richards, distinguished professors of the pianoforte at the Academy. Several students displayed great talent.

Miss Rosa Leo gave a matinée musicale at Steinway Hall yesterday (Friday), when she contributed several pleasing vocal performances. The young lady possesses a voice of considerable compass and sympathetic quality, and her acquaintance with various styles of music was manifested in pieces of very opposite characters. Mr. C. Chilley and Mr. H. Thorndike contributed to the vocal programme, and Miss Leo was also assisted by Miss B. Waugh (pianoforte), Mr. F. Meen (piano and organ), and Mr. W. C. Hann (violoncello).

Mrs. Dutton Cook (Mrs. Charles Yates) gave an interesting concert during the week, of which we must speak in our next number. The lady has for several years been known as a sterling pianist.

"Elijah" was announced to be given by Mr. Michael Watson's choir at St. James's Hall on Thursday evening.

The thirteenth annual festival of the London Gregorian Choral Association was celebrated last week in St. Paul's Cathedral by the usual service of evensong, as it is called. The choir numbered 1066 voices, and was larger by about 200 than at recent festivals. This fact is regarded as affording a complete answer to the allegation that a reaction has set in against the Gregorian form of Church music. A striking feature of this festival is the procession of choristers round the cathedral, singing the simple melody of a processional hymn. The hymns used last week included the "Pange, lingua, gloriosi corporis" (Sarum Hymn Melodies) and the "Hymn of Incarnation" (York Hymnal, 1541). The anthem was Dr. Gauntlett's "I will go unto the altar of God."

Herr Peiniger gave another of his interesting violin recitals at Prince's Hall on Tuesday afternoon, when, as on the previous occasion, he introduced violin pieces by forgotten English composers. It is to be hoped that this skilful violinist will pursue his researches in this direction when giving his projected series of evening concerts in October and November next.

Mr. Oberthur's concert was one of the specialties of this week. The programme included his own skilful performances on the harp. Madame Frickenhaus and Mr. Ludwig gave the second of their interesting chamber concerts at Prince's Hall on Thursday evening. Among other concerts of the week were those of Professor Bergson (pianist) and Miss E. Lewis (vocalist).

Mr. Otto Goldschmidt has resigned the office of conductor of the Bach Choir, which has been accepted by Mr. C. V. Stanford, of Cambridge.

An evening concert will be given by Mr. Ernest Hensley at the Townhall, Kensington, next Saturday evening, June 6, in aid of the funds of the People's Entertainment Society. The following ladies and gentlemen have kindly promised their valuable assistance:—Viscountess Folkestone, Mrs. Tuer, Miss Evelyn Capel, the Misses Sinclair Thomson, Mr. Dundas Gardiner, Mr. H. J. Graham, Mr. Frank Pownall. Pianoforte, Miss Stone; violoncello, Mr. Otto Leu. Conductors—Mr. J. Maude Crament, Mus. Bac., Oxon., Mr. Jefferys, and Mr. H. R. Bird. The concert is under the patronage of H.R.H. Princess Christian of Schleswig-Holstein.

Mr. R. De Cordova's recital of Mr. W. S. Gilbert's Fairy play, "Broken Hearts," was given on Tuesday evening at Steinway Hall.

A performance of "The Busy Bees," in aid of the Central Throat and Ear Hospital, Gray's-inn-road, will be given this (Saturday) afternoon at the Gaiety Theatre.

Lord Rosebery has been appointed interim Keeper of the Great Seal of Scotland, in the room of the late Earl of Selkirk, the hereditary keeper.

THE ARTISTS' COSTUME BALL AT PRINCE'S HALL, PICCADILLY: THE FRANCIS I. AND

BENVENUTO CELLINI GROUP PASSING THE PRINCE AND PRINCESS OF WALES.

THE PAINTERS' MASQUE AND COSTUME BALL.

Givers of Fancy-Dress Balls during the London season wishful to secure the utmost variety and brilliancy at their fêtes could not do better than take a leaf out of the programme of the energetic and progressive Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours. Worthy general acceptance was the golden rule of the Royal Institute that, "All guests must be in Costume of an Historic Period prior to 1837, and no modern dress or uniform can be admitted."

The talented Painters in Water Colours themselves offered the brightest example of the richest diversity of costume at their memorable Masque and Fancy Ball in the Prince's Hall, under the same roof as their popular picture galleries in Piccadilly, on Tuesday, the Nineteenth of May. From the courtly President, handsomely and tastefully apparelled as Paul Veronese, to what Mr. Whistler might designate that "elegant harmony in grey and blue," Mr. Keeley Halswelle, one and all were dressed in the best of taste. Moreover, each figure was an accurate realisation of the artistic period represented. This was pointed out last week, when we particularised the seven glowing and beautiful tableaux vivants illustrating Art History from the time of Apelles to the period of Gainsborough. When these seven living pictures, sonorously described by the Virgil of the occasion, Mr. J. Forbes Robertson, who recited the erudite explanatory verse of Mr. Edmund Gosse, had been duly admired by the six hundred spectators, the characters formed a resplendent procession, and charmed everybody afresh as they wended their way in twos down the flight of steps in the centre of the stage, and past the Royal personages present, in the manner delineated for us by Mr. R. Caton Woodville, one of the principal originators of this gay artistic fête.

This unique procession as well as the Masque afterwards elicited warm praise from the Prince of Wales, who was in evening dress, but wore the broad ribbon of the Order of the Garter, and who was accompanied by the Princess of Wales in a charming silk dress of light hues, and by Princess Louise of Wales in white. The Royal party also included the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, plainly in the best of spirits, Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne, Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, Count and Countess Gleichen and Countess Feodora Gleichen, Lord Londesborough and Mr. Francis Knollys. Lieutenant W. Horsley, the urbane and zealous commandant of the crimson-coated company of halberdiers, had dispatched his stalwart "beefeaters" in front, but retained the brace of sword-bearers as a guard of honour. It is safe to say the Princes and Princesses had never before witnessed so comprehensive and so elaborate a procession representing the most famous of the Old Masters and their illustrious patrons and contemporarics.

Now first behold, soon as the haut' oys cease
Come shadowy flames from fair historic Greece:—

Pericles (Mr. John Fulleylove), Phidias, Apelles, Zeuxis, and Ictinus, the famous Greeks in Mr. A. Sacheverell-Coke's admirable opening tableau of Athens, led the van. Quickly followed the more brightly costumed personages who figured in Mr. Walter Crane's fine triptych illustrating the arts of Florence, Rome, and Venice: Dante (Mr. A. Sacheverell-Coke) and Beatrice (Miss Lehmann), Petrarch and Laura (Mrs. Walter Crane), Cimabue (Mr. Walter Crane), and Giotto, Fiametta, Michael Angelo (Mr. John O'Connor), Pope Julius II., Raphael, Venetian ladies and senators, Paul Veronese (Mr. James D. Linton, President), and Titian (Mr. J. H. Mole, Vice-President of the Royal Institute). Soon succeeded the picturesque figures who had stepped from Mr. J. D. Linton's own effective tableau, so eminently characteristic of this clever historical painter, and comprising Albrecht Dürer (Mr. E. J. Gregory, A.R.A.), the Emperor Maximilian (Mr. R. J. Stock), the lifelike Lucas Cranach (Mr. E. M. Wimperis), Holbein, and Peter Visscher (Mr. James Orrock). The exceedingly graceful and good-looking Queen of France in Mr. Caton Woodville's Benvenuto Cellini group (portrayed in the Illustration with Major Wallace Carpenter as King Francis I.) was Miss L. V. Willett, and the pretty Duchesse in the ruby velvet dress and hat was Mrs. Caton Woodville; whilst Captain A. Hutton made a commanding Benvenuto Cellini, Mr. F. Verrall was handsomely garbed as Paolo Romano, the Hon. Duff Tollemache was Ascanio, and Mr. Geflowski followed in the suite as Cellini's "ghost." Velasquez, fresh as paint from Mr. Seymour Lucas's faithful tableau, succeeded in the train of King Philip IV. (Mr. Haynes Williams), and Queen Mariana (Miss Day), with Mr. Fred. Barnard as an impressive Cardinal Gaspar De Borja, in company with Doña Marcela De Ulloa (Mrs. Haynes Williams). Quaintest of all, in their Dutch costumes, were the actors in the signally successful group designed by Mr. T. Walter Wilson and Mr. Edwin A. Abbey, including Rembrandt and Cuyp, Ostade and Teniers, Mr. C. B. Birch, A.R.A., being jovially conspicuous among them. As for the English Masters and their patrons (posed with wonderful ingenuity by Mr. Seymour Lucas and Mr. Charles Green), there were recognised as they filed past—Charles I. (Mr. Arthur Lucas) and Queen Henrietta (Miss Florence Cotton), Vandyke, Hogarth (vividly realised by Mr. C. M. Barker), Sir Joshua Reynolds (Mr. R. R. Collins), Angelica Kauffman (Miss Alma Tadema), and Gainsborough.

The pageant in the Prince's Hall became most dazzling when, the remarkably good collection of Water Colours duly inspected, and supper taken by the Princes and Princesses with the President and Vice-President, the Royal Party reassembled on the dais, and smilingly witnessed the opening of the lively ball. To the music of Mr. Dan Godfrey's Grenadier Guards' band, there revolved in a prismatic waltz a Regency beauty in white muslin and powdered hair (Miss Mortlock, the graphic painter of Colonel Burnaby's portrait) with Dr. Lennox Browne in black as partner, and a heterogeneous and spinning throng of Greeks in classic robes, demoiselles in the high-waisted gowns of the Empire, scarlet-coated hunting men, and couples in all the flashing hues of the rainbow. The spectacle was charming. Mention has been made of the picturesqueness of the costumes which became Mr. J. D. Linton and Mr. Keeley Halswelle so well. Not less noticeable were Mr. Charles Green in a very handsome, close-fitting Spanish dress, Mr. Caton Woodville in the resplendent gold-embroidered tunic and voluminous white skirts of an Albanian chief, Mr. T. Walter Wilson (the ubiquitous and genial M.C.) as an armoured knight, and Mr. A. Everill, the omni-present secretary, as a Court gallant of the Elizabethan period. Under the hood of an Arab could be identified the good-humoured features of Mr. Phil Morris, A.R.A. Exquisite in its girlish charm and simplicity was the early Italian costume worn by Miss Mason Jackson, as may be judged from the drawing of this bewitching little lady, who stands to the extreme right of the Illustration. Here was Mr. Alma Tadema, R.A., in the Roman robe he revels in painting. There Mr. Henry Blackburn suitably habited as "that heathen Chinee"; and close by, Mr. H. W. Sweny, most flowery of Art critics, in the black velvet of Thomas Strafford. Prominent, also, in a handsome suit of black velvet, was Mr. Augustus Harris as Ruy Blas, Mrs. Harris being in white silk as the Queen. Mr. Arthur à Becket shone as a Crusader, and Mr. W. S. Gilbert as King Hildebrand. Lady Brassey was in a dress actually worn by Marie Antoinette. Mr. A. M. Broadley made a colossal Henry VIII. Mr. and Mrs. Bancroft appeared respectively as Fouché and a Dominican nun. Mr. Hare was Touchstone. But many notabilities could not be recognised in their multifarious disguises. Well did Mr. Godfrey Turner (a Rubens of the pen) grace the becoming garb of a Merchant of Venice, A.D. 1490, however; and particularly graceful was Miss Godfrey Turner, in a pink satin and Honiton lace ball-dress that belonged to a relative of renown, Mary Wollstonecraft.

The ball was an unmistakable success; and the Masque was applauded so warmly that the committee will be justified in repeating the tableaux vivants for the benefit of the Society's Schools of Art. Possibly, the first public performance will take place next Tuesday evening, at the Duke of Wellington's Riding-School. Of the eminent costumiers engaged, it should be mentioned that the sumptuously magnificent costumes designed by Mr. Caton Woodville for the Benvenuto Cellini tableau were most faithfully executed by Alias, who artistically fashioned them to look like historic instead of stage dresses. The martial uniform of King Hildebrand and several other attractive costumes were to be placed to the credit of Auguste and Co.; whilst MM. Nathan (who made Mr. Woodville's halberdier dresses), May, Harrison, and Simmons were also well represented, the last named furnishing the costumes of the Earl of Mayo and Lord and Lady Walter Campbell. Naturally, Mr. W. Clarkson was in great request as perruquier for both masque and ball. Finally, as a souvenir of the Artists' fête, the committee of the Royal Institute are to offer to the Princess of Wales an album containing the photographs of the painters and visitors, taken in costume on the night of the ball by limelight by Mr. Barraud, of 263, Oxford-street. Similarly good photographic portraits of many guests were taken gratuitously by Disderi.

CITY ECHOES.

Wednesday, May 27.

The Whitsuntide holidays have greatly interrupted business during the past week, and the influences recently at work have lost some of their force by reason, not only of the extent of the recovery which had already taken place, but of a renewal of misgiving as to the course of foreign political affairs, to which may be added indications of a conflict of opinion upon certain home matters amongst Ministers. It has followed that the recent movements in securities have been due more to local considerations than has of late been experienced, though the funds and some other typical stocks lost ground upon purely general influences. The settlement commenced this morning, and as money is very abundant and cheap, and many stocks are still scarce, the tendency of prices is better. Consols have returned to 99⅛, which is the highest point reached during the recent rebound.

A circular from the chairman of the voting trustees of the New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio Railroad Company appeals to the holders of first mortgage bonds to suspend their right to have unpaid interest converted into the same denomination of bonds, and to simply let unpaid interest rank as overdue, and without title to interest for such overdueness. In 1883 and 1884 something substantial was paid in cash in respect of the coupons, but in January last nothing was paid, and it is contended that the large additions made to the amount of first mortgage bonds for unpaid interest make it increasingly difficult to cope with the claims. When this arrangement began, the total was 34,500,000 dols., and it is now 44,447,000 dols., with the prospect of being further increased in July next by 1,500,000 dols., which is about the amount of the interest then due. It is, therefore, quite time that the bondholders made a further sacrifice.

The directors of the Royal Bank of Scotland, whose dividends have for two previous years been at the rate of 10 per cent per annum, announce a reduction to 9 this year, as the result of the depression of business on the one hand and the high rate of interest paid for deposits on the other. The latter of these drawbacks has since been removed, the Bank of England rate, which governs the allowance for deposits, having been recently reduced by successive steps from 5 to 2½.

The dividend of 7 francs per share declared by the South Austrian Railway Company is the best return to the proprietors since 1874, when the rate was 7½. For the years 1875-80 there was no payment, but 4 francs were paid for 1881, 5 for 1882, and 6 for 1883. In 1875 the shares were quoted 13⅜, and during the non-dividend period they fell to 5⅛, while they are now about 11.

The dividend of the Caledonian Insurance Company for the past year is 18s. 6d. per share, as compared with 17s. 6d. for each of the two preceding years. The Northern Assurance again pay £2 per share, and the Positive Government Security again pay 2½ per cent.

For 1884 the Buenos Ayres (New) Gas Company maintain their dividend at 10 per cent, and the directors of Young's Paraffin Light and Mineral Oil Company are to pay 8 per cent, as compared with 6 for 1883-4 and 4 for 1882-3. T. S.

Mr. H. H. Cozens Hardy, Q.C., has been elected a Bencher of Lincoln's Inn.

The Rev. J. P. Way, M.A., Assistant Master at Marlborough College, has been elected Head Master of the King's School, Warwick.

The public baths and wash-houses erected by the Dublin Corporation on the same plan as is adopted in the principal towns in England were on Monday opened by the Lord Mayor and Corporation in state.

The annual Whitsuntide meetings of Oddfellows, Shepherds, and other benefit societies have been held this week at Aberystwith, Aylesbury, Bristol, Birkenhead, Reading, and other towns.

At the last meeting of the Académie de Médicine de Paris, a special prize was awarded to Dr. William Murrell, of the Westminster Hospital, for his discovery of nitro-glycerine as a remedy for angina-pectoris.

A general meeting of Old Harrovians and Harrow Masters, convened by Sir Matthew Ridley, Bart., M.P., will be held at the Westminster Palace Hotel, on Tuesday afternoon, June 9, for the purpose of taking the necessary steps to raise a fund to commemorate, at Harrow, the head-mastership of Dr. Butler.

Lieutenant-Colonel T. Ridgeway, Assistant Commissioner of the Afghan Boundary, whose Portrait was given last week, was accidentally confounded with a namesake of his, Captain R. K. Ridgeway, of the Bengal Staff Corps, who won the Victoria Cross in a campaign on the North-east Frontier. The Major Talbot, R.E., who has been at Herat assisting to inspect the Afghan fortifications, is the Hon. Milo George Talbot, a son of Lord Talbot de Malahide. Captain Adalbert Cecil Talbot, a relative of the Earl of Shrewsbury, is on the Staff of the Viceroy of India, and was interpreter in the late interview of Lord Dufferin with the Ameer of Afghanistan.

THE PLAYHOUSES.

There is a slight lull before a storm of dramatic excitement. Before the next article on "The Playhouses" is published, we shall have been down to Coombe House to see the "pastoral players" and to study "As You Like It," under the direction of Mr. Godwin, in snow maybe, or happily in sunshine. A charming notion this, of playing Shakspeare under the trees of an English park, but a risky experiment surely, and full early in a year that finds us shivering over fires at the dawn of June! The amateurs are to be the kings and queens of the coming days. For does not a popular amateur series commence at the Olympic next Friday, when devoted enthusiasts propose to benefit one of the innumerable Gordon funds by dressing up and acting in a regular theatre? Mr. Samuel Brandram, the well-known Shakspearean reader is to join their ranks anon, but "we shall see what we shall see" next Friday. Saturday sees Shakspeare at the Haymarket. Mrs. Bernard Beere and Mr. Forbes Robertson are to enact Katharine and Petruchio in David Garrick's stage version of "The Taming of the Shrew," and it is to be hoped that Mr. Bancroft will get rid of several of the detestable and indefensible stage traditions connected with this time-honoured piece of buffoonery. The blackened leg of mutton is an insult to common-sense, and most of the accepted "business" of the scene is as bad as bad can be. As a deliberate contrast to this noisy farce will come "Sweethearts" and "Good for Nothing," in which Mr. and Mrs. Bancroft will appear, warning us that the season is drawing to a close and the unwelcome "farewell" is approaching. For an oncoming matinée Mrs. Langtry is preparing the "Young Tramp" of Mr. Wills; and, unfortunately, too late for notice this week will be the revived "Olivia" at the Lyceum, of which great things are expected. Whitsuntide has been comparatively dull. The place of honour was claimed by Mr. George R. Sims at the Princess's, where Mr. Wilson Barrett revived that capital and interesting play "The Lights o' London" with very marked success. Everyone was there to welcome an old friend. The play went better than it had ever gone before. The robbing of that hard-hearted old gentleman, Mr. Armytage, of Armytage Hall; the rescue of the convict by the humble showfolk who traverse the country roads in a caravan; the substitution of honest showman Jarvis for his new-found friend when the detectives are on his track; the night scene at the slips in the Regent's Park, when hungry and half-starved Mr. Barrett leaps into the canal to save a stalwart gamekeeper; and the ever memorable street costermonger scene and "free fight" in the Borough, caused unusual excitement, compelling a double call for the author and a speech from Mr. Wilson Barrett, who, when he had got his breath, announced the next new drama for August next, written by himself and Mr. Henry Arthur Jones, of "Silver King" renown; a mysterious poetical play to follow, and another Shakspearean production later on. But it is unwise to discount the future. Mr. Wilson Barrett is doing capitally with his melodramas of modern life; and so long as he keeps such a good team in hand as that composed of Miss Eastlake, Miss Emmeline Ormsby, Mrs. Huntly, Mr. Willard, Mr. Speakman, and notably Mr. George Barrett, one of the best comic actors in London, there can be little question that good fortune will follow his theatre.

The famous "Excelsior" ballet has at last come to London from the Eden Theatre, in Paris. One would have thought that such a wonderful show as this would have found, at the Empire Theatre, in Leicester-square, one of the finest theatres in Europe and specially adapted for an entertainment of this kind; but Fate willed it otherwise, and condemned "Excelsior" to Her Majesty's, which at present suffers from the chill of neglect and the ill star of bad fortune. Rehearsal after rehearsal, more or less inefficient, resulted in a first performance that was almost "fatal," on account of want of finish. If the ballet had not been superlatively good it would have been condemned out of hand, but so spirited was the dancing of male and female performers, so novel the effects, and so instructive the story, that Hope gave "Excelsior" a new lease of life. It was believed that it would turn out trumps in the end, and so it has, thanks to Signora Rossi and Signor Cecchetti, who are as indefatigable as they are unquestionably clever. In this wonderful ballet may be found an instructive lesson for Mr. Augustus Harris and all spirited providers of the moribund art known as pantomime. Why drag on through the well-worn list of nursery tales and baby legends, when we can get good and evil fighting over science, art, and literature? The pictures of the Brooklyn Bridge, the Suez Canal, the Washington Post Office, and the St. Gothard Tunnel are surely more interesting than aimless and meaningless processions.

I prophesied luckily last week; for "The Shuttlecock," despised one Saturday morning at Mr. Toole's Theatre, turned out trumps the Wednesday following, and Mr. J. Ashby Sterry lost no time in adding to the good work he has done on Mr. Byron's play. It is a genuine success. Mr. Charles Wyndham flatters himself that he has got the last of the H. J. Byron series in "The Wicked Major," which will be produced at the Criterion some future day. May it be a success whenever it comes! But the trustees of the Byron estate announce that they have another "comedy-drama," written by the author for himself, but never acted. It is highly spoken of. C. S.

A statue of the poet Gray was unveiled on Tuesday afternoon in the hall of Pembroke College, Cambridge. The Master of the college presided. Speeches were delivered by Lord Houghton, Sir F. Leighton, and Mr. Russell Lowell. The latter spoke in the highest terms of Gray. He added that as this was the last occasion upon which he might have the opportunity of addressing an English audience, he desired to express his sincere gratitude for the kindness that had been shown him in this country. He came as a far-off cousin, but he felt on leaving that he was something like a brother.

In order to assist in the collection of funds for the Gordon Memorial Hospital, to be erected at Port Said, a series of amateur theatrical performances has been arranged, which will be supported by members of the Cambridge Amateur Dramatic Club, and other well-known amateurs, and will be given at the Olympic Theatre on May 29 and 30, June 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5. The list of patrons and patronesses comprises a large number of Royal and distinguished personages, at home and abroad, including H.R.H. Prince Albert Victor of Wales, himself a member of the C.A.D.C. The principal characters will be taken by Mr. Samuel Brandram, Mr. A. Capper, Mr. Fourdrinier, Mr. Dundas Gardiner, Sir William Magnay, Bart., Mr. H. Percival, Mr. Scott Sanders, Mr. W. R. Sluter, Mr. C. W. Trollope, Mr. Quintin Twiss, and Mr. W. R. Walks; Lady Greville, Mrs. Beerbohm-Tree, Mrs. F. Copleston, Mrs. Charles Fane, Mrs. Clark Kennedy, Miss Grace Murray, and Miss Beatrice Ward—subject to alteration. The orchestra will be composed of the bands of Grenadier and Scots Guards, Royal Artillery, Royal Marines, and St. George's Rifles, under the direction of Mr. Dan Godfrey, Mr. J. P. Clark, Chevalier Zavertal, and Mr. Fleet.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

Paris, Tuesday, May 26.

Victor Hugo died last Friday afternoon, after an illness of eight days, in the eighty-fourth year of his age. The immensity of Victor Hugo's glory, and the incomparable greatness of his genius, render all commentary on his life and works superfluous. He was the greatest and the most famous citizen France has had since Voltaire, and a poet greater than any who had preceded him.

His funeral is the great preoccupation of Paris at the present moment, the more so as the anniversary of the Commune, which was celebrated on Sunday last, gave rise to regrettable incidents which some think to be indicative of approaching troubles. During thirteen years the return of May 24 has been celebrated by the advanced revolutionaries without any disturbances and without any bloodshed. Last Sunday blood flowed in the cemetery of Père Lachaise; there was a riot and a fight; both police and military drew arms against the unarmed people. Nineteen policemen and soldiers were wounded; a large number of civilians were cut with sabres and bayonets; and a still larger number arrested. What was the cause of the riot? The Anarchists and the various revolutionary societies went, as usual, to make speeches and manifestations over the graves of the Communists who are buried in Père Lachaise, in the so-called Champ des Fédérés; the different groups had their red flags or black flags, which they unfurled as soon as they entered the cemetery; and the police, in accordance with superior orders, proceeded to snatch and tear down these flags, and so the fight began. Yesterday (Monday) a Communist named Cournet was buried. The funeral procession, accompanied by the red flag, marched through the streets to the cemetery of Père Lachaise, the police having received orders to allow the exhibition in the cemetery on Monday of the emblem which they had been ordered to tear down on Sunday. So in the cemetery yesterday there were no policemen and no soldiers; the citizens delivered their speeches and cried "Vive la Commune!" unmolested; and after Cournet was buried, the manifestants went to the Champ des Fédérés, waved their red flags, cried "Vive la Commune!" and made more speeches. On coming out of the cemetery, some of the Anarchists hoisted their flags, and were immediately charged by the police; and then the fighting of Sunday was renewed; and until between nine and ten o'clock last night the neighbourhood of Père Lachaise, the boulevards Menilmontant and Charonne, were occupied by police and cavalry; stones and lumps of lead were flung by the mob; several policemen were wounded, and a number of workmen and loafers arrested. The excitement in all this populous quarter of Paris was great; and the furious crowd, restrained only by a formidable array of police and military, vented its rage in cries of "Vengeance!" "A bas la police!" "A bas les assassins!" "Vive la Commune!" "Vive la Révolution Sociale!" The Radical papers yesterday and this morning are full of incendiary articles; and while some recommend calm and moderation, others demand vengeance, and intimate that the day of the Hugo funeral is an opportunity not to be lost.

To-day was the third day of the Communist manifestation, the occasion being the burial of Amouroux, the ex-member of the Commune, member of the Municipal Council, and recently elected deputy for St. Etienne. A great crowd assembled to see the funeral, but happily no incident happened. The Anarchist manifestants were warned by the police that they would not be allowed to carry their red flags through the streets, but that inside the cemetery they would be free to display whatever emblem they pleased. Thus, the third day of the celebration of the Commune passed in perfect calm, except so far as regards the violent and exaggerated eloquence of some of the orators over Amouroux's grave.

These grave events have naturally caused no little alarm, and coming, as they do, on the eve of the elections, the reactionary party does its best to exaggerate them, to magnify the culpability of the Government, and to discredit the Republic as being unable to maintain order in the streets of the capital and to assure the security of the citizens. These disturbances formed the subject of a discussion in the Chamber to-day, and a motion was made by M. Lacroix on the subject, on which, however, the Government was victorious by 423 votes to 44. A subsequent vote of confidence was carried by 388 votes to 10. Victor Hugo's corpse is gradually being converted into a subject of strife. The funeral is to be purely civil in accordance with the great poet's last instructions, which run as follows:—

> I give 50,000f. to the poor.
> I wish to be carried to the cemetery in their hearse.
> I refuse the oraisons of all Churches.
> I ask a prayer of every soul.
> I believe in God. VICTOR HUGO.

Furthermore, the proposition of restoring the Pantheon to its destination of a mausoleum for great men, and of burying Victor Hugo there, has been discussed by the press, and came before the Chamber this afternoon. The Pantheon is to be restored to its original use, and Victor Hugo is to be buried there. It is understood that the funeral will be on Monday next. These two facts have sufficed to put all kinds of political and religious passions into a state of ebullition, and at the present moment the reactionaries have already, by anticipation, characterised the Hugo funeral as an apotheosis of Atheism, Communism, Free Thought, Anti-Clericalism, and all that is abominable. As for the disturbances and fighting of the past two days, Radicals and reactionaries alike exaggerate their importance from different motives. The first impression, it is true, is bad; it is true also that there is a revolutionary force in Paris, and that the Government has shown a moment of weakness and indecision in dealing with it. Public opinion, we can readily understand, is disconcerted; but it needs very little reflection to see that the Anarchists and revolutionaries are not strong enough or sufficiently organised to take advantage of circumstances momentarily favourable to their cause, whatever that cause may be, and that in sober reality public security is by no means compromised by a scuffle in a populous quarter of the capital. In spite, therefore, of the predictions of alarmists and the lamentations of the reactionaries, we may hope that the funeral of Victor Hugo will be simply the imposing and solemn manifestation which the departed genius deserves.

The French Oaks, run for at Chantilly on Sunday, attracted nine runners; and of these M. Ephrussi's Barberine came in first, M. Donon's Diaprée being second, and Baron De Schickler's Escarboucle third. T. C.

The veteran patriot, poet, and philosopher, Count Terenzio Mamiani Della Rovere, died at Rome, on the 21st inst., at the ripe age of eighty-five.

The venerable Emperor of Germany continues to make satisfactory progress, and was able to transact business with several of his Ministers on Saturday. On the 22nd inst. the garrison of Berlin, numbering about 12,000 men, was reviewed by the Crown Prince, acting for the Emperor. The numerous suite of the Crown Prince included all the Military Attachés, and the Crown Princess and the other ladies of the Imperial family also attended.—Queen Victoria's birthday on Sunday was celebrated at Berlin at the Crown Prince's Palace, Potsdam, by a State banquet, to which numerous guests were invited, including Lord Rosebery, Sir E. Malet, and all the members of the British Embassy. Both Prince Bismarck and Count Hatzfeldt called on Sir E. Malet at the Embassy, over which the union jack was displayed.—The Emperor William has confirmed by charter his sovereignty over the New Guinea Company's territories.—Lord Rosebery's visit to Berlin has been the event of the day. He remained at the Crown Prince's Palace at Potsdam on Sunday night and returned to Berlin on Monday. Lord Rosebery passed the greater part of his time with Count Herbert Bismarck and at the Chancellor's Palace, where he also had repeated conferences with the Prince. Lord Rosebery and Count Herbert Bismarck left Berlin on Tuesday evening for the Hague, the former on his way back to England, the latter to present his letters of recall.

The Austrian Derby was run on Monday, at Freudenau, near Vienna, and won by Count Sztary's Buzzo.

The Dobrudscha, we learn from various reports, has been devastated by swarms of locusts.

The Greek Parliament was opened on the 21st inst. The King in his speech stated that the foreign relations of the country were friendly. Greece must endeavour to utilise the present time of peace in Europe by steady progress and internal development, observing great economy in all departments, so as to effect a balance between revenue and expenditure. There would be a reorganisation of the army and navy.

Sir William White, on Saturday last, presented his credentials to the Sultan of Turkey as representative of this country until the arrival in Constantinople of Sir E. Thornton. The usual complimentary speeches were exchanged.

At the annual meeting of the Royal Society of Canada on Tuesday the Governor-General delivered an address, in which he spoke of the necessity of bestowing greater attention on the subject of forestry. Lord Lansdowne also dwelt on the advantage to politicians of cultivating science and letters.—The revenue of Canada was 25,717,293 dols., and the expenditure 24,687,018 dols., for the ten months ending April 30 last.

The South Australian Register publishes a letter addressed to the Government by all the leading merchants of Adelaide, urging the necessity of establishing an outer harbour.

THE CHURCH.

The Archbishop of York on Tuesday reopened All Saints' parish church, Northallerton, which has been restored at a cost of over £6000. The original church, on which the present structure now stands, was founded by the Northumbrian Apostle Paulinus.

It is authoritatively announced that Dr. Moberly, Bishop of Salisbury, who is now in his eighty-second year, will resign the Bishopric in the course of the ensuing summer.

The annual meeting of the Spanish and Portuguese Church Aid Society was held on Tuesday afternoon in the lower room of Exeter Hall—the Archbishop of Dublin, Lord Plunket, in the chair. The report was satisfactory, and a resolution affirming the need of increased help was adopted.

Her Majesty, it is stated, has allowed the Vicar and churchwardens of Kew to hold a fête and bazaar in the Queen's Cottage and grounds, which have been closed for more than twenty years, for the purpose of extinguishing the debt on the Royal church at Kew, which has recently been enlarged.

At St. Paul's Cathedral on the 20th inst., a full choral service was given in celebration of the 231st festival of the Sons of the Clergy; and in the evening several prelates and about 200 clergy dined together at Merchant Taylors' Hall, the Lord Mayor presiding. The collections at the service and the dinner amounted to £431.

On Ascension Day a painted three-light window, representing Faith, Hope, and Charity, was unveiled in the St. Luke's Chapel of the Royal National Hospital for Consumption, Ventnor, being the gift of Mr. Stafford Henry Northcote and family, in memory of the late Mrs. Northcote, who was a warm friend and benefactress of the hospital. The work was executed by Messrs. Heaton, Butler, and Baynes, of Garrick-street.—A three-light stained-glass window, by Mayer and Co., of Munich, has been placed in Prestbury parish church, Macclesfield. It represents the Good Samaritan, and is the third already executed by the same firm for this church.

A bazaar will be held on July 1, 2, 3, and 4, in Mrs. Merryweather's Grounds, 277, Clapham-road, in aid of the funds for erecting a new institute and parochial hall in the parish of All Saints', South Lambeth. The new institute will hold a thousand people—is the freehold property of the Church of England, and will cost, with the site, nearly £4500. It is earnestly hoped that everyone who is interested in Church work in South Lambeth will vigorously help this effort. Princess Louise has consented to crown the bazaar with her presence, and to inaugurate its proceedings on the opening day. The Vicar, or any member of the Committee, will thankfully receive contributions in money, paintings, cutlery, artificial flowers, plants, glass, stationery, books, pictures, toys, hosiery, needlework, and goods of every description for sale at the bazaar.

The Royal Humane Society's Medal has rarely been awarded for a more gallant act than that which won for Lieutenant Walter Ingram this coveted guerdon. Whilst proceeding up the Nile in his steam-launch to join Lord Wolseley's Expedition, this courageous young officer of the Middlesex Yeomanry met with a disaster at the Dal Cataract. The hawser at which the natives were hauling snapped. The launch was capsized, and dashed against a rock; Lieutenant Ingram and Mr. Mitchell, the engineer, clinging for safety to the keel. His hold relaxed, Mitchell got entangled in the gear, was swept down the rapids, and was in imminent risk of being drowned, when Lieutenant Ingram perceived the peril he was in, quick as thought swam ashore, ran along the bank till he got opposite the sinking engineer, plunged into the swift rapids, swam out to his man, and towed him safely ashore. Pluckily done! It may be remembered that Lieutenant Walter Ingram also gained honourable mention in a recent issue of the London Gazette. The services he had the good fortune to render when he took part in Lord Charles Beresford's smart expedition up the Nile towards Khartoum to rescue Sir Charles Wilson and his belated party were with sailor-like readiness generously borne witness to by his Lordship in the following passage of his despatch:—"I consider that we owe our safety in the steamer, as well as the safety of Sir Charles Wilson and, his party, who undoubtedly would have been killed if the steamer had been destroyed, to the untiring energy of Sub-Lieutenant Keppel, and Mr. Webber, boatswain (who worked the howitzer), to Lieutenant Bower, commanding the picked shots of the Mounted Infantry, and to Mr. Ingram, of the Yeomanry, who is attached by order to the Naval Brigade, and who attended to the working of the Gardner, after Lieutenant Van Koughnet was wounded, at the moment the fort bore on the beam."

THE EARL OF HUNTINGDON.

The Right Hon. Francis Power Plantagenet Hastings, thirteenth Earl of Huntingdon, in the Peerage of England, died at his residence, Sharavogue, near Parsonstown, King's County, after a brief illness, on Wednesday, the 20th inst. He was born Dec. 4, 1841; the only son of Francis Theophilus Henry, twelfth Earl, and received his education at Christ Church, Oxford. He was a Justice of the Peace for the county of Waterford and King's County, a Deputy Lieutenant of the former county, and served as High Sheriff for that county in 1873. Lord Huntingdon married Mary Anne Wilmot, only child and heiress of Colonel the Hon. John Craven Westenra, M.P. for King's County, third son of the second Lord Rossmore, and by her leaves three sons and five daughters. The eldest son, Warner Francis John Plantagenet, Lord Hastings, born July 8, 1868, is now fourteenth Earl. The earldom of Huntingdon is one of the oldest English Peerages extant, being third on the list of existing Earls; it was granted by Henry VIII. in 1529, but the family of Hastings was ennobled by the early Plantagenet Kings, and enjoyed baronies, which were inherited by the heiress of the tenth Earl, and are now vested in the Earl of Loudoun.

MR. ADAIR, OF RATHDAIRE.

Mr. John George Adair, of Rathdaire, Queen's County, and Glenveagh Castle, county Donegal, J.P., died on the 14th inst. He was born in 1823, and served the office of High Sheriff of Queen's County in 1867. In the same year he married Cornelia, daughter of General Wadsworth, of Genesse, in the State of New York, and widow of Colonel Ritchie, of the American Army, but leaves no issue.

THE ARCHDEACON OF ARMAGH.

The Ven. Robert Vickers Dixon, D.D., Archdeacon of Armagh, Rector of Clogherny, county Tyrone, and Chaplain to the Archbishop of Armagh, died on the 14th inst., at his Rectory. Doctor Dixon graduated at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1833, and obtained a Fellowship there in 1839. In 1853 he resigned his Fellowship, on being presented Rector of Clogherny, and was appointed Archdeacon of Armagh in 1883.

We have also to record the deaths of—

Grizilda Anne, Lady Harding, widow of Lieutenant-General Sir George J. Harding, K.C.B., on the 20th inst., aged eighty.

The Rev. Robert Gray, Hon. Canon of Chester, Chaplain to the late Bishop of Sodor and Man, on the 19th inst.

The Rev. Pennyman Warton Worsley, Canon of Ripon and Rector of Little Ponton, county Lincoln, on the 19th inst., in his eighty-ninth year.

Colonel Albert Henry Ozzard, Royal Marines, at Portsmouth, on the 16th inst. He had the command of the Marines at Souakim, and was lately invalided home.

Mr. John Jones, the chairman of the City Bank (Limited), and a director of the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China, and some minor companies, at the age of eighty-four.

Lieutenant-Colonel Archibald Buchan Hepburn, Bengal Staff Corps, on board the Merton Hall, in the Red Sea, on the 10th inst., in his forty-fourth year. He was formerly an officer in the 26th Regiment Bengal Native Infantry.

Mr. Evelyn Jerrold, son of the late Blanchard Jerrold, and grandson of Douglas Jerrold, suddenly, of heart disease, on the 23rd inst. Mr. Evelyn Jerrold up to a few months since resided much in Paris, where he filled the post of special correspondent to a London newspaper. He was a widower, and leaves behind him two young children.

General Thomas Polwhele, of the Bengal Army, on the 23rd inst., at Tivoli Lodge, Cheltenham, aged eighty-seven years. He entered the Army in 1815, served in the Nepaul campaign in the following year, and accompanied the expedition to Ceylon in 1818. He took part in the Burmese war in 1824-5, the campaigns in Candahar and Afghanistan from 1839 to 1842, and the Sutlej campaign of 1845-6.

The Princess Caraffa of Naples, at the Convent of the Sisters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul, Clerkenwell-road, on the 21st inst., about thirty years of age. The deceased lady was known in religion as Sister Mary, and had been a member of the sisterhood from an early age. She was well known amongst the poor Italians in the neighbourhood of Hatton-garden, and was greatly beloved by them for her many acts of kindness.

The Countess Dowager of Galloway, on the 25th inst., at her residence in Eaton-square, after an illness of only two hours' duration. She had been in failing health for some time past, but during the last few weeks had been somewhat stronger. The deceased Countess was the daughter of Henry Charles, sixth Duke of Beaufort, K.G., by his marriage with Lady Charlotte Sophia Leveson Gower, daughter of the first Marquis of Stafford, and was born in 1811. She married, in 1833, the ninth Earl of Galloway, who died in 1873, and leaves surviving issue the present Earl and a large family.

Mr. Allan Maclean Skinner, Q.C., for more than thirty years Recorder of the Royal borough, on the 23rd inst. The barristers who are old enough to remember Mr. Skinner's brilliant speeches, as one of the leaders of the Oxford Circuit, will have no difficulty in calling to mind his vigorous and persuasive eloquence. Many were surprised when he accepted a County Court Judgeship in South Staffordshire, and retired from the Bar at the comparatively early age of fifty. As County Court Judge, he won the confidence of those who appeared before him by the suavity and firmness with which he presided on the Bench. Mr. Skinner was the fourth son of the late Lieutenant-General John Skinner, the conqueror of Guadaloupe. He was educated at Eton and at Balliol College, Oxford, and was called to the Bar by the Honourable Society of Lincoln's Inn in 1834. It was his good fortune, as Treasurer of Lincoln's Inn, forty-three years later (1877), to preside over the calling to the Bar of his Royal Highness the late Duke of Albany; and it may be added that the Recordership of Windsor brought frequent and interesting official connection with the ceremonial events in her Majesty's family. As Recorder, he presided in the Townhall of Windsor only a few weeks before the commencement of the illness that terminated his career. It will be long before his amusing conversation, redundant of wit and kindliness, will be forgotten by those who knew him. The poor of London also benefited by his genial sympathetic disposition, as he threw open the gardens of Lincoln's Inn in the summer to their enjoyment.

SKETCHES IN THE SOUDAN.

The end of the twofold campaign, on the Upper Nile and in the plains and hills around Souakim, produces no more scenes of sanguinary conflict with the hostile Arabs under the standard of the Mahdi, but such amusing incidents as those presented on the opposite page. Our Special Artist, Mr. Walter Paget, contributes one or two of these Sketches; and the others are furnished by a military correspondent, Count A. E. Gleichen, Lieutenant of the Grenadier Guards, who has been serving in Lord Wolseley's Camel Corps, and writes to us from Dongola on April 21. He sketches a "nuggur" or heavy barge on the Nile, towed by a party of naked natives wading in the shallower water near the river's bank; a "muezzin," or Moslem summoner to prayers, standing at the appointed hour aloft upon the summit of the minaret, and calling with a loud voice to the disciples of Mohammed in the town below; a Dongolese servant-woman, employed as a nursery-maid, leading two nude little boys to school or to their home; and a native barber who acts as a surgeon, performing the salutary operation of letting blood, with his razor, from the back of a man's head, the patient being apprehensive, we suppose, of an attack of apoplexy in the heat of summer. Mr. Walter Paget, as we see in one of his own Sketches, has been doing a friendly turn for his fellow-Special, the Times' correspondent, in the absence of a professional hair-dresser in camp: but he has kept himself, in the pause of active warfare, shrewdly observant of the habits and manners of Tommy Atkins, the British private soldier, and of every class and rank of our countrymen assembled at Souakim for the different operations of the late campaign. In the present instance, it is of course not a soldier, but one of the railway "navvies" belonging to Messrs. Lucas and Aird, contractors for the projected Souakim and Berber line, who considers himself and his mates much aggrieved by their not having been allowed a certain allowance of beer at the regimental canteen of the gallant Berkshire Regiment, then guarding the line. Like a frank and straightforward Englishman, he has resolved to carry his complaint personally to the Commander-in-Chief, having failed in a previous application to the commanding officer of the regiment. Seeing his opportunity, when Lieutenant-General Sir Gerald Graham, K.C.B., is riding by, in company with Sir Allen Young and the Italian Military Attaché, this honest fellow comes up, pulls his forelock by way of salute, and begins at once. "I want to speak to you, Sir; how about this here beer?" General Graham listens very good-naturedly to a rather tedious statement, and promises to make inquiry; it proved, as we understand, that there was some objection, upon grounds of regimental discipline, to the ordinary labourers getting their beer at the same place and time with the soldiers; but nobody had intended that the "navvies" should be deprived of their proper share of that most refreshing English beverage while they had to work so hard as they did in the exhausting climate of Souakim. A convenient and simple arrangement was easily made for their separate supply, and the "navvies" have since enjoyed their daily beer in moderation, thanks to the worthy spokesman who called the General's attention to this matter. He is not disposed, we believe, "to rob a poor man of his beer." The troops are now fast coming away; the Guards have left Souakim; and Merawi, on the Nile, was abandoned this week.

THE AUTHOR OF "CALLED BACK."

The name of "Hugh Conway," which was assumed by this clever and original writer in publishing his very successful story, is familiar to a multitude of readers. Mr. Frederick Fargus, whose early death has occasioned much regret, was the real author of that remarkable tale and of some other writings, by which he had shown his capacity, if health had been granted to him, for a further continuance of literary work. He was, until about two years ago, engaged in business at Bristol. He died on the 15th ult., at Monte Carlo, on the Riviera, in which place he had sought refuge from our winter climate, under medical advice, when attacked with pulmonary disease.

THE REBELLION IN THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORY OF CANADA: INDIAN PRISONERS.
SKETCHED BY CAPTAIN H. DE H. HAIG, R.E., OF GENERAL MIDDLETON'S STAFF.

THE SILENT MEMBER.

When the House of Lords rose on May 21 and the Commons separated the next day for the Whitsuntide Recess, the stormy petrel of the evening press alarmed the public with tidings of a Ministerial Crisis. Probably, as the Government as a whole has lasted so long, the Cabinet will hold together till the General Election in November comes to settle the critical question whether Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues shall continue to be her Majesty's advisers, whether a more Radical Administration is desired by the new constituencies, or whether the combined wisdom of the Marquis of Salisbury and Lord Cranbrook, of Sir Stafford Northcote and Sir Richard Cross, tempered by the youthful vivacity of the irrepressible leader of the "Fourth Party," is to be preferred. One thing is certain. If a breeze was occasioned in Ministerial circles by the alleged differences of opinion between Mr. Joseph Chamberlain and Sir Charles Dilke on the one hand, and Mr. Gladstone and the majority of the Cabinet on the other, in consequence of the former Ministers' sturdy opposition to the reintroduction of what Mr. Parnell terms the Coercion Act for Ireland, the breeze has subsided into the merest zephyr. Mr. Gladstone has consoled himself in the congenial company of the Druids, or such-like Oddfellows, at Hawarden Castle this Whitsuntide; and Sir Charles Dilke has sought inspiration regarding the Irish Problem on the salubrious banks of the Liffey. Meantime, Mr. Childers will deserve well of the public if he gathers up courage during the holidays, and takes advantage of the pacific state of the horizon in the East to abandon the objectionable extra taxation on beer and spirits.

The Earl of Rosebery's Whitsuntide visit to Count Herbert Bismarck at Berlin, and consequent interviews with Prince Bismarck himself, have set many tongues wagging, and many pens writing. Berlin and Paris Correspondents have vied with each other in devising the most ingenious conversations between the illustrious Chancellor and Mr. Gladstone's youngest but most promising Cabinet colleague. The colloquies do justice to their authors' powers of imagination. Nothing could be more natural than that the Prime Minister's confidential friend, being on a visit to Berlin, should endeavour to bring about a cordial rapprochement between Prince Bismarck and Mr. Gladstone. A sincere Anglo-German alliance would undoubtedly be an all-important factor in preserving the peace of Europe. It is under these circumstances earnestly to be hoped that Lord Rosebery's timely Berlin holiday may contribute to bring about this desirable result.

There is one plain advantage in extending the Whitsuntide Recess of the Commons to Thursday next. The House will not be put to the trouble of adjourning over Wednesday for the Derby.

COLLISION WITH AN ICEBERG.

From the accounts of ship captains who have just crossed the Atlantic, it appears that the quantity of ice encountered in mid-ocean is of vast extent, and navigation was carried on with the utmost difficulty. Several vessels were damaged, and it is feared that some have foundered. The Inman Line steamer City of Berlin sustained serious injury by collision with an iceberg on the 19th inst., when on her voyage to New York. The vessel, however, reached her destination last Saturday. None of the passengers or crew were injured. A passenger on board the steamer gives the following account of the accident:—

I was awakened in my berth by a sudden shock to the vessel. This was quickly followed by two shocks, as if she were grating against something. As soon as I could, I went on deck. It took me some minutes to realise what had happened. There was a very dense fog. I could see only a rod ahead. There, towering much higher than the steamer, and three times as large, was a grey object, which I knew at once to be an iceberg. The bowsprit had been knocked into splinters, and the bow was smashed in. Many tons of ice fell on the forecastle deck, breaking it through, and going down the hold. Two men on the look-out had a very narrow escape, the fog being so thick at the time that they could not see the berg until it came tumbling on the forward deck where they were standing, forcing them to run for their lives. At the time of the shock the chief officer, Mr. Tarleton, and the second officer, Mr. Barker, were on duty on the bridge, and with great promptness Mr. Barker rushed to the bow to ascertain whether the ship was cut through below the water-line, at the same time giving orders to cut away lashings of life rafts and boats, and prepare for lowering in case the ship should sink. Two boats were swung outward, and others put in readiness. When it was discovered that the ship was not leaking, the orders were countermanded. The consternation among the passengers can be imagined. They ran helter-skelter to and fro, screaming and praying. The description of the scene is beyond my powers. The fright of the feminine portion was terrible. They rushed about the deck screaming, at their wits' end. The ship trembled like a reed. Many thought it was all over with them, and rushed on deck in the condition in which they had left their berths, so sudden was the shock and so great the haste. Some ran about uttering heartrending cries of distress and getting in the way of the sailors. In front there was a vast mountain of ice that rose in the air like a huge crystal wall. The cold was something terrible. I shall never forget the scene. The crew was excited at first, but the coolness of the captain equalled that of the iceberg, and he soon had things put right. He assured the passengers that there was no immediate danger, and the calm way in which he went about his work did more than any talking could have done to reassure the timid ones.

THE LATE ALPHONSE DE NEUVILLE.

This eminent French artist, whose pictures, especially those of battle-scenes in the war between France and Germany in 1870, attracted much attention in Paris and in London, died on the 19th ult., at the age of forty-nine. He was a native of St. Omer, and had married shortly before his death. He studied art as a pupil of Meissonier, and his works showed a remarkable mastery of finished execution, as well as great and varied powers of conception. He painted the battles of the French army in the Crimea, in Italy, and finally in France, serving personally in the defence of Paris.

THE MINT.

The fifteenth annual report of the Deputy Master of the Mint for 1884 states that the total number of "good pieces" struck, including colonial, was 56,363,301, as against 39,119,714 in 1883; and their value, real or nominal, £3,157,966 10s. 1d. The total number of "good pieces" of the Imperial coinage for Great Britain and Ireland struck was 41,903,301, and their value as follows:—Gold: Sovereigns, £1,769,635; half-sovereigns, £566,878. Silver: Half-crowns, £196,146; florins, £144,737; shillings, £196,199; sixpences, £85,564; fourpences (Maundy), £89; threepences, £41,586; twopences (Maundy), £50; pence (Maundy), £58. Bronze: Pence, £48,761; half-pence, £14,561; farthings, £6022. It is stated that the annual trial of the Pyx took place at Goldsmiths' Hall on July 9, when sample coins from gold and silver coinages of the value of £1,763,197 and £1,080,090, respectively, were examined. The results of the trial were perfectly satisfactory, as the average fineness of the gold coins examined was only one ten-thousandth below the exact legal standard, while the ingot into which the other coins taken were melted was found to contain the precise amount of pure metal required by law. The average fineness of the silver coins examined was slightly above standard.

By a majority of nearly two to one the members of the Reform Club have resolved not to abolish the political committee.

Mr. F. J. Williamson, of Esher, has been unanimously elected to execute the Sister Dora statue for Walsall. It will be of Sicilian marble, on a polished granite pedestal, with relievos in each panel, representing incidents in Sister Dora's quiet but eventful life.

INDIEN Prepared by E. GRILLON, Chemist of the Paris Faculty, 69, Queen-street, City, London.
GRILLON. Tamar, unlike Pills and the usual Purgatives, is agreeable to take, and never produces irritation, nor interferes with business or pleasure.
Sold by all Chemists and Druggists, 2s. 6d. a Box. Stamp included.

NUDA VERITAS.—GREY HAIR restored by this specific; after which it grows the natural colour, not grey. Unequalled as a restorative. It causes growth, arrests falling, and FIX use defies detection. The most harmless and effectual restorer extant. One trial will convince it has no equal. Price 10s. 6d., of all Chemists and Hairdressers. Testimonials free. Agents, R. HOVENDEN and SONS, London.

GOLDEN HAIR.—Robare's AUREOLINE produces the beautiful golden colour so much admired. Warranted perfectly harmless. Price 5s. 6d. and 10s. 6d., of all principal Perfumers and Chemists throughout the world. Agents, R. HOVENDEN and SONS, 31 and 32, Berners-st., London, W.

BLAIR'S GOUT PILLS. GOUT, RHEUMATISM, SCIATICA, LUMBAGO, AND RHEUMATIC GOUT. These invaluable Pills rapidly cure the most inveterate cases of the above diseases, even where the joints are crippled, enabling people to resume their business and walk as well as ever. Sure, safe, and effectual.
Sold by all Chemists, at 1s. 1½d. and 2s. 9d. per Box.

THE SKIN.—The Glory of Woman, the Pride of Man. It contains the delicate lines of beauty, and constitutes all that we term "loveliness"; yet how many have their skins blemished by irritant soaps, carbolic, coal tar, glycerine—made of putrid fat. THE ALBION MILK AND SULPHUR SOAP is the purest of all toilet soaps. It cleanses and purifies the skin, guarding it against infection, and removing all skin irritation. It is a boon to sensitive skins, and as a shaving soap is unequalled. Beautifully white, delicately perfumed. Sold in Tablets, by all Chemists.

GOUT and RHEUMATISM
Cured by the use of
DR. LAVILLE'S LIQUOR and PILLS.

MON AMOUR WALTZ. By P. BUCALOSSI.
The "Queen" says:—"'Mon Amour Waltz' and 'P. and O. Polka,' by P. Bucalossi. These pieces, both waltz and polka, will be very acceptable in the ball-room. The waltz is singularly tuneful and the polka quite brilliant; both happily illustrated."

PHYLLIS WALTZ. By P. BUCALOSSI.

MERRY FOOTSTEPS POLKA. By P. BUCALOSSI.

BLACK AND TAN POLKA. By CAROLINE LOWTHIAN.

FAHRWOHL WALTZ. By CAROLINE LOWTHIAN.
"Truth" says:—"The Black and Tan,' by Caroline Lowthian, is perfectly enchanting. I did not think a polka could be made so absolutely tempting to the feet; but this one is so full of spirit and 'go' that I don't think I could resist it. . . . The 'Fahrwohl Valse' is another excellent composition by Caroline Lowthian."
The "Daily Telegraph" says:—"Miss Caroline Lowthian's 'Fahrwohl' will supply chains free and flowing. . . . Yet the firm beat in the music of 'Black and Tan' (C. Lowthian) may lead others to prefer it."

THE CLAIRE WALTZ. By LEONARD GAUTIER.
"Truth" says:—"You will also like the 'Claire Waltzes,' so full of melody are they and so good to dance to. The composer is Leonard Gautier."

LE ZEPHYR POLKA. By G. DELBRÜCK.
The "Daily Telegraph" says:—"For several reasons Delbrück's polka, 'Le Zephyr,' will be selected by those engaging in that characteristic dance. . . .

LES GRENOUILLES (FROGS) POLKA. ALFRED DELBRUCK.

TOI SEULE VALSE. LUKE WHEELER.

SEA BREEZE POLKA.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY.

CONCLUDING NOTICE.

The general effect of Gallery No. VIII., which contains some interesting works, is dreadfully marred by careless hanging. For example, Mr. Alfred W. Hunt's "Bright October" (756), a very subtle analysis of light, is absolutely destroyed by being placed to the left instead of on the right of the room, though the injury done to the artist is perhaps even more flagrant in the case of Mr. G. B. O'Neill's "Father's Breastplate" (205), in the large gallery, where it is so hopelessly skied that it is impossible to judge of the work of an artist whose strength lies in his refined work. Mr. O'Neill, however, had not to wait long before he could appeal from the Academicians to the picture-loving public, for in the week the Exhibition opened, at a sale at Messrs. Christie's, two of his works were sold at prices far above those of the Academicians in whose favour his this year's work had been hoisted out of sight. Mr. Laslett Pott's "Priscilla" (746), from Longfellow's "Miles Standish," scarcely brings out the artist's best quality, his anecdotic power; but Miss Alice Havers has struck a true art-note in the "Belles of the Village" (748)—a bevy of girls, returning from washing, and crossing the river bridge, near which a group of men are lounging under the trees. Mr. P. R. Morris's "First Prince of Wales" (757), lying in the hollow of his father's shield, is being presented to the Welsh assembled at Carnarvon. The figure of Edward I. is not without merit both of drawing and colour; but as the whole of the scene has to be imagined by the spectator, its effect is spoilt for want of the context. Two portraits—one, by Mr. Herkomer, of "Mr. J. D. Allcroft" (772), and the other of "Mr. T. F. Twemlow" (768), by Mr. Ouless—show these two artists in rivalry, the former strong and almost violent in his effects, the latter soft and smooth to the verge of weakness. Mr. John Collier's "Circe" (810) is one of the good pictures of the year, and the best exhibited by this artist. It represents the goddess lying on the ground, her arm thrown over a beautiful tiger, whilst in the darkened groves leopards and other wild beasts are quietly roaming. As a composition, as well as in its rendering of the nude, the picture is worthy of great praise, and Mr. Collier has discreetly avoided the stumbling-block which lay in his path by turning away Circe's face. Mr. Frank Dicey also scores a success with "His First Pink" (799): a hunting breakfast, at which the bashful young sportsman is making a somewhat tardy appearance. The ladies and older men are well grouped: and Mr. Dicey has successfully dealt with a difficult problem raised by placing the window whence falls the light behind the well-furnished white tablecloth. Of all the pictures in the room, however, Mr. Pettie's "Charles Surface Selling his Ancestors" (812) is the best; as Mr. Armitage's "After the Arena" (792) is—putting aside Mr. Eyre Crowe's "Honeymoon" (780)—almost, if not quite, the worst. In the former the attitudes are easy, the composition compact, and the colour good—qualities for which it might be thought that Mr. Pettie would be glad to be handed down to posterity, instead of through the medium of the sorry work purchased last year out of the Chantrey Fund. Mr. Armitage's huge picture suggests some mysterious rite of which the weighing of the postulant formed part of the initiation, rather than the solemn reception in the catacombs of the young Christian martyr. Mr. S. E. Waller has found an excellent subject in his "Outward Bound, 1805" (823), a scene at a posting-house on the road to Portsmouth. Old soldiers, happy sailors, and others are crowding about the inn; and in the centre of the picture is the young mother with her midshipman-boy, just appointed to serve under Lord Nelson. It is a pity that Mr. Waller's fondness for horses and his skill in painting them should have made the "change team" the centre of interest in his picture. In the same room may be mentioned Mr. Joseph Henderson's "Jura, from Kintyre" (770), Miss Mary Hayllar's "Helping Gardener" (787), Mr. David Murray's "Rother-at-Rye" (783), Mr. Percy Thomas' "Old Sketchbook" (790), and Mr. D. W. Wynfield's "Royal Fugitive" (813), an episode in the flight of Charles II. after the battle of Worcester.

In Gallery No. IX., Mr. Millais' "Orphans" (859), his best picture of the year, deserves the foremost place. He has seldom done anything better than the little puckered face, scarcely able to control the sob which lurks beneath those eyes. In her apron the little damsel dressed in white carries a motherless leveret, whose soft head is peeping out most plaintively. Mr. Stacy Marks' "At the Printseller's" (853) is one of those carefully finished old men possessed by a ruling passion which the artist renders so well; and it matters little to him whether the collector makes birds, books or butterflies, plants or pictures, the object of his enthusiasm, for the accessories, after all, are but materials upon which the artist can expend his love of Dutch minuteness. Mr. L. Fildes "Roset a" (861) is a bright Venetian study, chiefly interesting for its firm treatment and rich colour; and although Mr. Pettie's interview between "Sir Peter and Lady Teazle" (868) abounds in humour and the lady in pertness, there is in the figure of Sir Peter, who turns his back on the spectator, more of petulant irritation than of real anger. Sir John Gilbert's "Gipsy Encampment" (869) recalls too obviously his picture at the Water-Colour Society; but it is rich in colour, and makes one regret that he had not long ago trod the road to which Salvator Rosa pointed. The greater portion of the space in this room is devoted to a distracting collection of "cabinet" pictures, so small that in many cases the frames overpower the paintings. To these it is not possible to give the attention they doubtless merit; one feels that they are out of place here, whilst recognising that some provision for their proper display should be made. Amongst such works, attention is especially attracted by Mr. A. J. Hook's "Cornish Port" (905), Mr. Reginald Bottomley's "Death's Betrothed" (906), Mr. T. G. Cooper's "Trust" (920), Mr. Herbert Schmalz' "Elaine" (939), and Mr. P. H. Calderon's "Woodland Spring" (940), a very charming ideal of the homely presiding genius which "On summer's eve might haunt the stream." Mr. Atkinson Grimshaw's "Dulce Domum" (947) is a somewhat vacuous lady in a pale-blue dress, reposing in an overcrowded drawing-room. There is undeniable cleverness in this, as in the other work by the same artist; but he obscures his story by drawing away attention from the principal character. The tones of the peacock feathers in the background are painfully sharp, suggestive only of two huge hyena eyes glaring upon space. Mr. Blair Leighton's "Involuntary Variations" (948), and Miss Marianne Stokes' "Capri Witch" (954) are attractive and promising works; whilst in such landscapes as Mr. Oake's "Passing Squall" (956) and his "Fishing-Boats" (981), and Mr. H. W. B. Davis's "Done Work" (891), we find the usual excellencies and drawbacks of these well-known artists.

In Gallery No. X., military episodes predominate, but allusion must be first made to Mr. J. D. Linton's marriage picture of the Duke of Albany (1028), in which military uniforms, at least, hold a conspicuous place. The result of Mr. Linton's efforts to make a picture out of the materials offered should be to discourage all artists who care for their art more than for Royal commands. With the best intentions possible, with a consummate knowledge of the uses of brilliant colour, Mr. Linton has failed to produce a natural or a happy work. It is no fault of his, for he gives proof of the best intentions and of the most laborious effort. He has gone so far as to tone down some of the scarlet tunics, and to throw over the scene a harmonising atmosphere—but with little result. The battle-pieces are numerous, and reveal quite a bevy of artists ambitious to occupy the places left vacant by MM. Philippoteaux, and more recently by the untimely death of M. De Neuville. Mrs. Butler contributes the "Arrival of Lord Wolseley at the Bridge of Tel-el-Kebir" (1081), at the close of the action, riding between files of Gordon and Cameron Highlanders. Mr. Charles Fripp sends another version of the "Last Stand at Isandlhula" (1065), full of fire and fury and of soldiers two feet high. Mr. Douglas Giles, once an officer, but now one of the most promising battle-painters, furnishes us with a brilliant rendering of the "Battle of Tamai" (1068), when the Arabs broke through the English square and for a moment captured its guns; whilst Mr. Ernest Crofts sympathises more closely with the phlegmatic Dutch William, whose conduct, however, at the "Battle of Landen" (1051) raised the loyalty of "My Uncle Toby" to a high pitch of enthusiasm. Among the more quiet subjects, the eye rests with pleasure upon Mr. F. S. Walker's "Butterfly Age" (1017), Mr. F. Calderon's "Showing his Paces" (1018), Mr. Arthur Hacker's "Fisherman's Wife" (1026), and Mr. A. H. Burr's "Grandad's Delight" (1023). In spite of its dramatic title, "Found" (1021), depicting a "tender of the goats" in olden days, who has come upon the hiding-place of a wounded chieftain, the chief interest of Mr. Herkomer's picture is centred in the landscape, and the careful study of rocks; and it is interesting to contrast this work with Mr. B. W. Leader's "Old Holyhead Road" (1033), hanging near. The excellent portrait of "Mr. Simon Fraser" (1082), by Mr. Millais, almost extinguishes Mr. Pettie's "Bret Harte" (1077), of whose face the painter has missed the finesse. Among the other pictures to be noticed are Mr. MacWhirter's "Iona" (1043) and Mr. Tom Lloyd's "Toilers of the Sea" (1040), in both of which the colour is somewhat crude; Mr. R. W. Macbeth's "Miller and the Maid" (1044), a sad falling off from his East Anglian farm scenes; and M. Eugène de Blaas' "Vexation" (1050), a little domestic episode, full of story and humour, told with careful minuteness, sustains his well-earned reputation.

In Gallery XI. Mr. Stanhope Forbes' "Fish Sale on a Cornish Beach" (1093), is in some respects one of the most interesting pictures in the exhibition, and well deserves the attention of the trustees of the Chantrey Bequest. The gleam of the sun on the wet sand, the natural rendering of the fish lying round, the graceful pose of the girl leaning against the boat, are true and forcible, and are incontestably the work of a man who means to excel. Of Mr. John Brett's "Norman Archipelago" (1106), with its blue sea glittering in the golden sunlight, we have already spoken. It is not only his best work of the year, but it will bear comparison with his "Cornish Lions." Close at hand, however, is Mr. J. G. Naish's "Sea Gate, Sark" (1108), which boldly challenges Mr. Brett's exclusive pretension to the Channel Islands. Mr. Briton Rivière's "Stolen Kisses" (1100), a child in blue with a fox-terrier in her lap, is cleverly drawn and painted; but as a picture of real dog and child life it must in conception yield the palm to Mr. C. Burton Barber's "Once Bit, Twice Shy" (1120), a small child, with determination in every limb and feature, insisting upon bringing a puppy's nose into contact with the mustard spoon. Another bit of child life in this room, but hopelessly skied, is Mr. Savage Cooper's "Princess Eliza" (1116) and her picture-book, which had cost half a kingdom, well known to the readers of Hans Andersen's tales. From a distant view, it seems to be carefully drawn and skilfully coloured, but its other merits must be ascertained by means of a telescope. Mr. Colin Hunter has a pretty sea-beach study, "The Girl who Baits the Line" (1148) a quieter and more concentrated work than his "Salmon-Fishers" (1064), in the adjoining room, of which the chief merit is its breeziness. Mr. Herkomer's "Hard Times" (1442) is a powerfully-painted scene of wayside life—a navvy, or perhaps a tramp, with his wife and child, cold and hungry, resting at a gate-way, within which, perhaps, the employer lives who has turned them adrift. Mr. Storey's "Chocorua Zenaxia" (1149), may have certain merits of colour, but anything more like the occupants of an English boarding school and less like those of a Greek temple it is impossible to conceive. Mr. Story's forte is not classicism, and it is a pity he should attempt it. Mr. Seymour Lucas finds some of his old power of raising an imaginary scene to the level of an historical scene: "From the Field of Sedgemoor" (1128) represents what might have happened in any cottage within twenty miles of that sad field whilst "Kirke's lambs" were scouring the country. The other pictures of this last room which deserve notice are Mr. Frank Holl's portraits of the Bishop of Peterborough (1141) and Mr. Evan Sutherland (1145); Mr. R. Macbeth's "Ripe October" (1128), a broadly-painted girl in an apple-tree; and Mr. J. Aumonier's "Village Green" (1096). We cannot close this notice of the oil paintings without referring to a picture which has, in the eyes of the council, been thought worthy of admission, and by the hanging committee to a place on the line—Mr. Franz Rubens' "When the Painter is Out" (1140). As far as our eyes can see, it does not contain a single element of art or beauty; yet we are told that a picture by Mr. C. Van Haanen, another foreigner, was summarily rejected. However indifferent Mr. Van Haanen's picture may have been, it must have borne some mark of his genius and patient work, and could not have failed to teach us something; whereas Mr. Rubens' work can only help the artist to a belief that a blind chance presides over him.

Of the water colours, of which there are three hundred, we will not speak in detail. They display, for the most part, a very high standard, and this is almost to be regretted, seeing that most visitors are as careless of this branch of painting as is the Royal Academy itself. Messrs. Arthur Crofts, E. Hughes, Bright Morris, Jules Lessore, Andrew Donaldson, and Wormleighton are a few among the men, as Miss Jane Dealey, Miss Corkran, Miss Naftel, are among the ladies who acquit themselves with more than ordinary success.

The sculpture of the year is not of the very highest order. The most striking work is Mr. Onslow Ford's relief, "In Memoriam" (2084), a young woman half turning towards the spectator a face relaxed in death but still beautiful; her arms hang nerveless, the hands just locked: at either end of the couch stand two cherubs, with torches reversed, and in the background the symbolic butterfly is escaping. Mr. Barnes' bronze panels, illustrative of the "Life of Æneas" (2086-8), are original and vigorous in treatment; and Mr. Hamo Thorneycroft's equestrian statuette of "Edward I." (2133), in wax, designed for one of the buttresses of Blackfriars Bridge, makes us hope that the decision of the "Commissioners of Sewers" to reject it, is not irrevocable. Mr. Onslow Ford has also a life-size seated figure of "Mr. H. Irving as Hamlet" (2131), but somewhat too realistic; whilst, on the other hand, we should think that Mr. Thornycroft's bust of Gray errs on the other side, by giving too much of the poet and too little of the man.

Here we bring our notes on the Royal Academy Exhibition to a close; having endeavoured to show that, although containing few, if any, works of extraordinary originality or power, it bears witness to the continued vitality of the English school.

THE BECHUANALAND EXPEDITION.

Major-General Sir Charles Warren, R.E., the Special Commissioner of her Majesty's Government appointed to examine and settle the claims of the Bechuana tribes outside the west-western frontier of the Transvaal, has gone far to the north, visiting the countries ruled by the chiefs Sechele and Khama, towards the land of the Matabele. A British protectorate over all the tribes of the Bechuana nation seems likely to be accepted; but the territories lately included in the irregular Boer Republics of Stellaland and Goshen will probably be incorporated with the Cape Colony, and will be connected with West Griqualand by a railway about to be constructed. No opposition has been made by the Government of the Transvaal or "South African Republic" to Sir Charles Warren's proceedings, which have only to be completed by the judicial investigation of some private titles of land-ownership, and of a few criminal charges against persons accused of violent acts during the brief existence of the Goshen and Stellaland communities, now brought under British jurisdiction. The Special Commissioner, as our readers are aware, is accompanied by a respectable military force, composed partly of the Queen's troops and partly of volunteer regiments in the service of the Cape Colony, one of which is the corps of Mounted Infantry commanded by Colonel the Hon. Paul Methuen, raised in England, and commonly known as "Methuen's Horse." Our Special Artist, Mr. Julius M. Price, is serving in this corps, and has been able to send us many interesting Sketches of camp life and marching in that country, which we have engraved and published from time to time. Those which appear this week represent mostly the features and costumes of the Batlapin tribe, with their chief Mankoroane, and the village of Taungs, where he dwells, situated on the Kolong or Harts river, near the northern extremity of West Griqualand, with the neighbouring Boer town or village of Vryburg, the late capital of Stellaland, where the deposed President, Mr. Van Niekirk, was arrested and committed for trial by Sir Charles Warren's orders.

The Batlapins are a mongrel tribe, or fraction of a tribe, whose chieftainship was disputed, or rather, the paramount supremacy of their chief over the Korannas and other kindred tribes, by the Koranna chief Massiouw, an ally of the Transvaal Boers. Mankoroane is a reputed younger son, though his legitimacy is doubted, of the former Batlapin chief Molchabane, whose elder son, Gasibone, was killed in 1856, and Botlasitse, the son of Gasibone, was deposed in 1878 by the British Government of West Griqualand. As Mankoroane had assisted the British Government upon that occasion, he was recognised as paramount chief of the Batlapins; but the Transvaal Republic, previously to its temporary annexation, had denied the authority of the British Government over the border territory; and when the Transvaal again became independent, four years ago, the strife once more broke out between Mankoroane and Massiouw. It was a very similar case with the Barolong tribe, whose hereditary chieftainship was disputed between two brothers, Montsioa and Moshette; some of the Boers, for the sake of getting paid by Moshette in grants of land, assisted him personally in his war with Montsioa, while Montsioa gained British favour by helping the refugees from the Transvaal who were driven out by the revolt of the Boers in 1881. Those of the Boers who took part in these Bechuana conflicts, and who were obviously prompted to do so by sordid motives of private gain, were rewarded by the conquerors with considerable gifts of land, which they are now compelled to surrender, as Mankoroane and Montsioa are restored to the tribal sovereignty by British intervention on their behalf. One or two Englishmen, Mr. Christopher Bethell, formerly an officer of the Frontier Armed Police, and a man named Honey, were killed in the course of these miserable conflicts; there is evidence to prove that they were deliberately murdered by vindictive Boers of the opposite party; and therefore, although they were certainly not acting under orders in the British service, it devolves upon the new British Protectorate to see that the murderers are brought to justice. There was no regular administration of law in Goshen or Stellaland under the Boer rule, and the Transvaal Government has always declined to be responsible for acts done beyond its frontier.

Some little approach to civilising the Batlapins and other tribes has been made through the influence of a well-known resident missionary, the Rev. John Mackenzie, who assisted the Colonial Office last year in the negotiations that took place in London with the President of the Transvaal Republic, together with Sir Hercules Robinson, Governor of the Cape Colony. Mankoroane and many of his people wear clothes of European make; some of them have learnt to read and write, and profess to be Christians, being in a similar condition to that of domesticated Kaffirs in the Cape Colony; but their civilisation is of a very superficial character. Our Artist's Sketches, however, give a sufficient idea of the appearance of these people; and their manners and customs are not materially different from those of other natives of South Africa dwelling within the range of European influence. The meeting of the tribe on Feb. 9, to consider the proposals of the British Commissioner, was a rather curious scene; an assembly of black men, dressed much like common rustic labourers in England, but with slouch hats and big umbrellas to shield them from the sun, and with their horses picketed around. They are generally well off, possessing land and cattle, and benefiting by the opportunity of trade; while their disposition is peaceable enough, when not disturbed by foreign intriguers.

The Marquis of Lothian presided at the annual dinner of the Royal Caledonian Asylum, which took place at the Freemasons' Tavern on the 21st inst. The subscriptions to the funds of the institution amounted to about £1200.

The Duke of Westminster presided on the 21st inst. at a meeting of the Council which has been formed in the interests of young men without homes in London. The scheme submitted included the establishment of institutions for young men and a central place of reference. The Bishop of London and Archdeacon Farrar were among the speakers who testified to the importance of the work undertaken, and it was resolved to invite public subscriptions towards the object.

The Assemblies of the Established and Free Churches of Scotland were opened on the 21st inst. in Edinburgh. That of the Established Church was opened with the usual State ceremonial by the Earl of Aberdeen, her Majesty's Lord High Commissioner, who held a Levée in Holyrood Palace, which was attended by several Scotch dignitaries. About mid-day Lord Aberdeen drove by Calton-hill to St. Giles's Cathedral, where service was conducted by Dr. Mackenzie, the retiring Moderator, and thence to the Assembly Hall, where the court was duly constituted—Professor Mitchell, of St. Andrew's, being elected Moderator. The day was observed as a holiday in celebration of the Queen's birthday, and consequently the procession, which was on a more elaborate scale than usual, was witnessed by large crowds. The streets were lined with military. Principal Burns, Aberdeen, was elected Moderator of the Free Church Assembly. The income of the Church for the past year amounted to £626,028.

NOVELS.

Readers in whom is the artistic spirit, combined with a love of painters and all their works, are best adapted for the full appreciation of Louisa: by Mrs. Macquoid (Richard Bentley and Son), although the novel has charms and graces which cannot fail to make a favourable impression upon the most ordinary, the least artistic and æsthetic of mortals. Whether Louisa, the aunt, or Francesca, the niece, be the more skilful portrait, the more interesting study, is a question which few men would undertake to answer; women alone can be expected to speak with authority upon a point which seems to lie within their province more particularly. That the story is coloured Italian is a fact to note and to be thankful for; inasmuch as the writer appears to be peculiarly qualified to deal with what is in itself a thing of beauty, and that is Italian colouring. An Italian count, a worthy though somewhat childish gentleman, without much regard for the art-treasures with which his historic country abounds, has married a lovely Englishwoman, who is, or affects to be, overflowing with the regard in which he is deficient. He is an ardent husband, she is a somewhat frigid wife, who has married rather for position and for the comforts and ornaments of life than for love. Yet has she a good store of passion lurking beneath her cold and statuesque exterior. With this couple lives a niece, a full-born Italian, daughter of the Count's sister; and between this niece and her uncle exist profound attachment and mutual understanding; between this niece and her aunt neither love nor sympathy. There enters upon the scene a handsome Englishman, a friend of the Count's and an amateur artist of great authority and considerable executive ability, who paints the portrait of the niece and falls in love with her, instructs the aunt and is fallen in love with by her, awakens all the dormant passion in her, and quite unintentionally, even unconsciously, drives the poor Count to the verge of madness with jealousy of him, and the poor Countess to the verge of madness with jealousy of the niece. Moreover, the niece loves the handsome Englishman, but fears that her love is not returned, and at the same time she knows or guesses what are her aunt's feelings towards this fascinating gentleman, and in the course of a quarrel betrays her knowledge or lets out her guesses to her aunt, who, of course, is anything but pleased thereby. Out of this pretty entanglement a way has to be found by the ingenious novelist, and it is scarcely necessary to say that somebody's life has to be sacrified in the process. Whether it be the life of the Count, or of the Countess, or of the niece, or of the handsome and unwitting cause of the whole trouble may be most agreeably if not most easily ascertained by a perusal of the three volumes.

Eccentricity is the main characteristic of Wilbourne Hall: by Mrs. Cumont (T. Fisher Unwin); and that, it is to be feared, is scarcely sufficient of itself to carry a read comfortably through two volumes. It is not enough to introduce a number of curious personages and put them through a series of extraordinary incidents; to hold a reader's attention, the personages must have an intrinsic interest of their own, or the story must be constructed with consummate art, or the narrative must be remarkable for attractiveness of style, or there must be something so new and striking about the events and dialogue as to make up for other deficiencies. It were well if something of the kind were more discernible in the novel under consideration. It is a tale of changelings; and there is certainly nothing novel about that theme, nor is there anything especially noteworthy about the girl and boy who are the changelings upon the present occasion. There is not even, in this case, so strong a reason as novelists usually invent to account for a wicked substitution of one child for another; at any rate the equally strong reason, if it exists, is not put prominently forward at the beginning, and kept steadily in view from start to finish. On the other hand, a more than usually happy and satisfactory settlement of all difficulties is, no doubt, accomplished. How, by the agency of a wicked nurse and of one Sally, a dreadful old hag and a "wrecker" by trade, a "workhouse-boy," known as Dan Carter, is proved to be the son and heir of Squire Wilbourne, whilst the Squire's reputed daughter is proved to be Maude Carter, the wicked nurse's grand-daughter—this is the gist of the story. It will be seen that there is no great originality about the conception, and the development is not distinguished for any particularly ingenious or skilful treatment.

A romance of an uncommon and uncommonly good order, with a brilliancy, glow, luxuriance, and picturesqueness appropriate to the South American localities in which the scenes are laid for the most part, is Lil Lorimer: by Theo Gift (Ward and Downey), though it is quite impossible to sympathise with the heroine or to acknowledge that her character and actions are drawn on the lines of verisimilitude. She is so pretty and fascinating that, of course, it would have appeared to anyone (but her husband) who came within the range of her personal charms that whatever she did was right, that she was a suffering angel, and that she deserved commiseration rather than blame; but a reviewer, being at a safe distance from her eyes, may venture to say that, good as she was at heart and sensible as she was in many respects, she behaved very often, if not generally, like a downright idiot, and that her own feminine instincts should have been enough to keep her out of nearly all the scrapes and more serious troubles in which she became involved. She really must be considered by all readers whose common-sense is not dazzled into temporary insanity to have deserved little or no pity for the very worst that befell her. However, she was undoubtedly a very charming little beauty; and seldom has a novelist presented any prettier picture than that of the three motherless and, so far as supervision goes, fatherless girls, Lil and her two sisters, who are joint heroines, in diverse degrees, of this certainly entertaining and interesting, but unequal, and in some points unsatisfactory, novel. The flirtations of the sisters, the freedom of their intercourse with the other sex, their mingled "fastness" and genuine innocence, their independence, and, at the same time, their unblushing husband-hunting and cool acceptance of attentions without any intention of committing themselves, are capitally and most amusingly described. But Lil has more heart than her two sisters; and that heart would assuredly have taught her a better, a more honest course than that which she adopts. She is a coward, the novelist tells us; but a truly good heart will prevail against moral cowardice, though it may be powerless against physical. Still, it is easy to forgive her that cowardice when her exhibition of it enables us to appreciate more fully the noble, heroic character of Alice Duncan. It must be confessed that Lil is placed in a very awkward position; her thoughtless flirtations have caused a gallant gentleman to be murdered before her eyes by a jealous South American, and by the law of her destiny she marries the man whose half-sister was engaged to the murdered man. Of course, none of the interested persons are aware of this at the time of the marriage; and, when Lil discovers it, she is so horrified that, having no strength of mind, she keeps up the prevarication which had led her at first to pretend that she knew but slightly the gentleman who was murdered in the very act of throwing her (though as a friend and admirer only, and not as a lover) a complimentary bouquet. It was, perhaps, a perfectly natural and harmless prevarication at first, just to save her from the disagreeable necessity of satisfying vulgar curiosity or impertinent inquisitiveness; but it certainly looked very bad when she seemed to have tried to conceal the facts from her husband and his half-sister. It then looked as if there was some truth in the very worst that was said of her and her sisters by Captain Carnegie. At the same time, a protest must be entered against the view which the novelist appears to take of what an officer and a gentleman (and Captain Carnegie is described as being a gentleman as well as an officer in the Navy) would permit himself to say to a lady under the grossest provocation: it is impossible that he could ever have spoken and behaved to Lil as he is represented to have done—not though he believed her to have ruined the happiness of the girl he loved, and to have caused the death of his best friend by her heartless, selfish flirtation. It were well to read the novel, and form a personal opinion about this and other questions.

Some stories, without taking hold of you at the outset, have a way of growing upon you until you are quite sorry when you have come to the end; and that is the case with Miss Bretherton: by Mrs. Humphry Ward (Macmillan and Co.), against which, perhaps, a reader may be set at first by finding the odious word "chaperone" (sic) as early as the seventh page; but which gradually increases in interest and ultimately leaves you in what authors do not consider the objectionable position of "asking for more." No doubt it will be correctly inferred from the title that the story resolves itself for the most part into a study of a single character, which is that of the heroine, Miss Bretherton. What enhances the attractiveness of the study is that the portrait of the heroine seems to have been painted from observation of two living actresses, of whom each has suggested certain portions, and that, as a foil, a third living actress, of great celebrity, has been enlisted in the service. By this remark it is not intended that any unwarrantable liberty has been taken; but just so much of an idea, or of several ideas, seems to have been borrowed, as any person who courts publicity may fairly be called upon to lend. Miss Bretherton, then, is a "royal" beauty; she "hails," as the Americans say, from "a sugar plantation not far from Kingston," of which plantation her father was overseer; she is half Scotch, half Italian, which accounts for the peculiar brilliancy of her personal charms; she, as quite a little girl, showed a turn for acting, and had performed in private theatricals, so she "goes on the stage" in Kingston first, and then, thanks to her good looks rather than to her talents, in London; she is received with acclamation and becomes the rage, but for her personal attractions, not for her acting; in point of fact she cannot act a bit. It dawns upon her at last that she is accepted for her physical and not for her intellectual or artistic charms; she indulges in a tremendous outburst of indignation, showing thereby that "the root of the matter" is in her; she studies, she takes lessons, she trains herself and is trained by others; and at last she attains an excellence which would have raised her to the summit of her profession, had she been as little lovely to the outward vision as Madame Rachel was in her day. This gradual development is very well described; and with the description is intermingled the inevitable quantum of love, the intermixture being treated with skill, grace, force, and pathos.

"I speak of Africa and golden joys" is the motto chosen from Shakspeare by the Hon. Emily Lawless for her new novel, A Millionaire's Cousin (Macmillan and Co.). The scene of the tale is chiefly laid in Algiers, where John Hargrave, a thoroughly good fellow, has a charming villa worthy of a millionaire. John's one fault, in the eyes of Hildegarde Bonson, is that he is too rich. She is as proud as she is beautiful; and being at the same time poor, shrinks back the more John Hargrave advances. Mrs. Bonson, an affected woman who talks much nonsense about art, and is not as amusing as she is probably intended to be by the novelist, strongly promotes the match while unwittingly doing her utmost to prevent it. Hargrave has an artist cousin who visits him in Algiers, and relates the story of the wooing. When Miss Bonson refuses Hargrave, she comes to London to try her fortune as a painter. The girl's success seems very doubtful, in spite of the assistance of the cousin, who falls in love with her himself, and one is glad that all goes happy as a marriage bell at last. The volume is very readable, although not exciting, and a distinctive character is given to the story by the description of Algerian life and scenery.

Sir Charles Strickland has permanently reduced the rents of his Yorkshire tenantry by 15 per cent.

In congregation at Cambridge, it was agreed to raise on loan the sum of £70,000 for building the proposed new chemical laboratory and the Sedgwick Geological Museum.

The Show of the Bath and West of England and Southern Counties Association will be held, at the commencement of next month, in Preston Park, Brighton.

The new railway connecting Swanage and Corfe Castle with the main South-Western line from Waterloo to Weymouth was opened on the 20th inst.

The present Sir Watkins Williams-Wynn has succeeded to the Mastership of the Wynnstay Hunt, which was held for more than forty years by the late Baronet.

The School Board for London, at its meeting on the 21st inst., again discussed at considerable length the question of their legal expenses. The Board adjourned till June 18.

The Mayor of Lincoln (Mr. F. J. Clarke) has announced his intention of building a new Catholic church and presbytery in Silver-street, Lincoln. It is understood that the cost will be about £14,000.

The state of Sir Algernon Borthwick's health compelling him to relinquish for a time all public engagements, Lord Brabourne will occupy the chair at the complimentary dinner to Mr. Edmund Yates on the 30th inst.

The judges of the Stanhope historical essay at Oxford have adjudged the prize to Herbert John Maynard, scholar, St. John's, and they think the composition of Edward Douglas Maclagan, commoner of New College, worthy of honourable mention.

Yacht-racing has begun, and the regatta fixtures of the leading clubs run on until Sept. 10. Interest in the sport will, however, be drawn out to a later period, owing to the international races for the "America Cup" having been arranged to come off during the fall of the year.

At the triennial festival of the Charing-cross Hospital, held at Willis's Rooms, on the 20th inst., the Duke of Edinburgh presiding, subscriptions to the amount of £6500 were announced; and the chairman thanked Miss Matilda Levy for the munificent gift of £3000 for establishing a ward, in which Mrs. Brydges Willyams had also provided a fourth bed.

An attractive variety of entertainment took place each evening in Whitsun week at the Royal Victoria Hall and Coffee Tavern, Waterloo-bridge-road. The annual flower festival for children will be held to-day (Saturday) from two to four o'clock. Poole's splendid Diorama of Egypt will be on view at the hall all through June and July.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated June 19, 1884), with two codicils (dated Oct. 6 and March 4 following), of Sir William Wellesley Knighton, Bart., late of Blendworth Lodge, Horndean, Hants, who died on March 13 last, was proved on the 9th inst. by Lieutenant-Colonel Henry Clarke Jervoise and Arthur Pollock, the acting executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £159,000. The testator leaves his property, Myrtle Farm, in the parish of Blendworth, to Edward Hobart Seymour, charged with the payment of the yearly sum of £360 to William Arthur Seymour for life; and he bequeaths £10,000 to Catherine Jane Jameson; £5000 each to Susan Frances Grace Seymour, Thomas Colthurst Jameson, Thompson Sampson Jameson, George Vaughan Jameson, and Sydney Beckwith Jameson; and other legacies. The residue of his real and personal estate is to be held, upon trust, to pay the income to his brother-in-law, Admiral Sir Michael Seymour, G.C.B., for life; at his death, one third is to go to Edward Hobart Seymour and the children of Michael Francis Knighton Seymour by his first wife, except the said William Arthur Seymour; £5000 to Mrs. Mackenzie; and the ultimate residue is to be held, upon further trust, for Mrs. Blanche Dawson, for life, and at her death for her issue as she shall appoint, except Helen Dawson and any female who shall enter any sisterhood, convent, or nunnery, or any similar institution, of the Greek, Roman Catholic, or Protestant Churches.

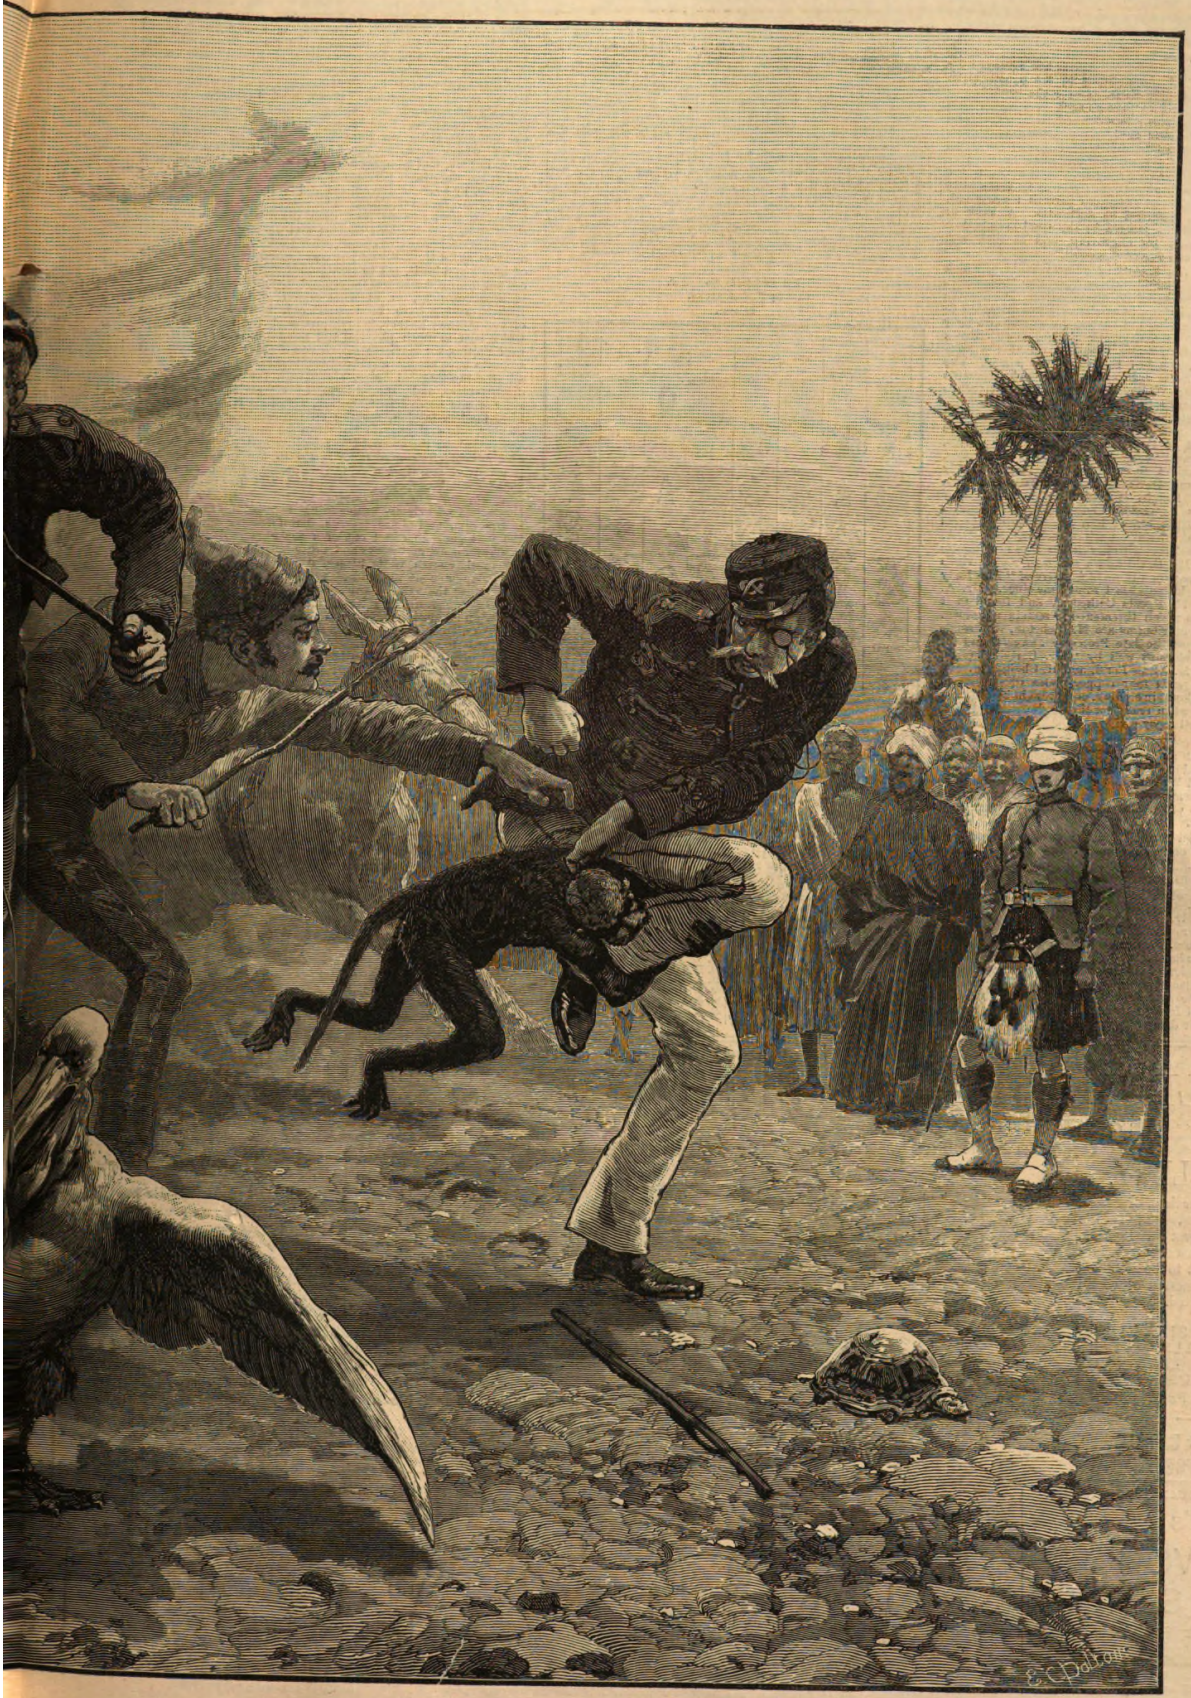
The will (dated July 1, 1881) of the Right Hon. Emily Theophila, Dowager Viscountess Ashbrook, late of No. 26, Queen's-gate-terrace, Kensington, who died on April 9 last, was proved on the 9th inst. by Lord Monson and Colonel William Lewis Grant, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £73,000. The testatrix bequeaths £500 to Theophilus John Metcalf; £200 to each of her executors; £50 each to the National Orphan Home, Hunncommon; the Princess Helena's College, late the Adult Orphan Institution, Regent's Park; the National Home for Crippled Boys, Kensington; and the Royal Normal School and Academy of Music for the Blind, Westow-street, Upper Norwood; and legacies to servants. The residue of her personal estate she leaves, upon trust, for her great-grand-daughter, Lady Clementine Frances Anne Pratt.

The will (dated Sept. 7, 1883) of the Right Hon. Anne Elizabeth Emily, Lady Cremorne, late of No. 34, Prince's-gate, who died on April 11 last, was proved on the 9th inst. by the Earl of Dartrey, the son, and the Hon. Richard Maitland Western Dawson, the grandson, two of the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £11,000. The testatrix bequeaths £3000 to her said grandson the Hon. Richard M. W. Dawson; and there are specific gifts to her son, grandchildren, niece, and others. The residue of her estate and effects she leaves to her grandsons, Vesey John Dawson and Douglas F. R. Dawson.

The will (dated Jan. 24, 1882), with a codicil (dated Jan. 12, 1883), of Mr. Robert Parnall, late of No. 187, Bishopsgate-street Without, wholesale clothier, of The Cottage, Llanstephan, Carmarthenshire, of Ruislip Park, Middlesex, and of No. 69, Addison-road, Kensington, who died on Jan. 31 last, was proved on the 6th inst. by William Henry Woods and David James, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £216,000. The testator leaves all his freehold, copyhold, and leasehold estates and hereditaments in the counties of Carmarthen, Suffolk, and Middlesex, and elsewhere, upon trust, for his wife, Mrs. Elizabeth Parnall, if she so long continues his widow, until his son, Robert Henry, attains twenty-five—he receiving an allowance therefrom in the meantime—and then for his said son; he bequeaths £1000, and all his furniture, plate, pictures, books, effects, horses and carriages, to his wife; £70,000 upon trust, for her, for life, then as to £30,000 thereof as she shall by will appoint, and as to the other £25,000 to the person who would take his personal estate under the Statute of Distributions if he had died immediately after his wife intestate; £25,000, upon trust, for his wife, if she shall so long continue his widow, until his daughter, Rose Elizabeth, attains twenty-one, and then for her; and liberal legacies to his sisters, executors, wife's relatives, persons in his employ, servants, and others. The residue of the personalty he gives to his wife absolutely, and he confirms the settlement made on her. Full discretionary powers are given to his trustees to continue and carry on his business.

The will (dated Jan. 28, 1885) of Mr. Thomas Kelsey, late of Highfield, Winchmore-hill, who died on Feb. 15 last, was proved on the 15th ult. by Mrs. Elizabeth Mary Kelsey, the widow, Henry Richard Kelsey, the brother, and Thomas Boyle Woolley, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £31,000. The testator bequeaths to his wife an immediate legacy of £300, and the horses, carriages, wines, furniture, plate, jewellery, and effects at the dwelling-house in which he shall reside at his death; a further sum of £1000, to be applied by her for such charitable purposes as she shall think fit; and £100 to each of his executors, Mr. Kelsey and Mr. Woolley. The residue of his real and personal estate is to be held, upon trust, to pay the income to his wife, for life or widowhood, she maintaining, supporting, and educating the children of his second marriage, and then for all the children of his first and second marriages, to be equally divided amongst them.

The will (dated March 15, 1884), with a codicil (dated Nov. 10 following), of Mrs. Susannah Arethusa Milner-Gibson (widow of the late Right Hon. Thomas Milner-Gibson, P.C., M.P.), late of No. 5, Hyde Park-place, who died, on Feb. 23 last, at No. 11, Avenue du Bois de Boulogne, Paris, was proved on the 1st inst. by Jasper Joseph Alexander Milner-Gibson and George Gery Milner-Gibson Cullum, the sons, and George John Braikenridge, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £24,000. The testatrix directs £5000 to be raised out of certain trust funds, and, subject to the payment of two annuities of £50 and £100 thereout, gives the same to her son George Gery; the residue of the said trust funds she leaves, upon trust, for the daughters of her late daughter, Alice Mary Robertson; and there are some other bequests. All the freehold, copyhold, and customary hereditaments, under another settlement, she appoints to her said son George Gery, to whom she also leaves the residue of her real and personal estate.



The will (dated April 23, 1873) of Major George Henry Cobbold, formerly of the 84th Regiment, but late of the 45th Regiment, who died, at sea, on Nov. 11 last, was proved on the 13th ult. by Horace Cobbold, the uncle, and Spencer Dixon, the half-brother, the executors, the value of the personal estate exceeding £20,000. The testator leaves one moiety of his real and personal estate, upon trust, for his mother, for life, and then for the said Horace Cobbold; and the other moiety to the said Spencer Dixon and his brother, Alfred Dixon, in equal shares.

ART NOTES.

Mr. F. Sargent's picture of "Her Majesty's Drawingroom," now on view at Messrs. Tuck's Gallery, 175, New Bond-street, will not fail to attract a continuous stream of visitors. Those who have passed the ordeal will go to criticise, and those who have not will be glad to see what a Drawingroom really is. From an artistic point of view the scene presents so many difficulties that one cannot but admire Mr. Sargent's courage in attempting to reproduce it. The colours are arranged by the orders of the Lord Chamberlain, or by the equally stern laws of precedence, and over them, as over the grouping of the personages, the artist, who must on such an occasion be a realist, is helpless. The scene is supposed to be taken from the outside of the diplomatic circle, looking towards the dais on which the Queen, surrounded by the members of the Royal family, is standing. The picture contains some hundred or more portraits of well-known personages of the Court, the Ministry, and the Corps Diplomatique; and as in most cases Mr. Sargent has had sittings from the persons represented, the likenesses may be regarded as authentic. A work of this nature can scarcely be judged by the usual standard of criticism; it is intended for engraving, and as such will probably have a great and deserved success.

The exhibition of the Society of Painter-Etchers, which this year is held at the Dudley Gallery, Egyptian Hall, shows a very marked advance upon its predecessors. During the four years the society has been in existence it has attracted to its exhibitions many recruits, and has put the veterans on their metal. The president (Mr. Seymour Haden) contributes a single work, a mezzotint, "The Breaking up of the Agamemnon," (142), the moon just rising over the clouds. The lighter side of the plate is excellent, but the darker shadows are almost spongy. Mr. William Strong contributes a series of illustrations to Burns' songs and to Nicholson's "Brownie of Blednoch," of which the three relating to the latter (96-9) are excessively weird and clever. Of Mr. C. O. Murray's Oxford sketches, that of the "Virgin Porch, St. Mary's, Oxford" (175), is the most highly finished and delicate. Mr. M. L. Menpes has half a dozen excellent sketches, chiefly Spanish, and Mr. Frank Davenech is as prolific of Venetian studies. Mr. Joseph Knight is beginning to display very considerable power as a mezzotint engraver, and his talents and taste as an artist urge him to choose subjects eminently well adapted for this branch of the art. Miss E. A. Armstrong is always welcome with her little scraps of domestic or peasant life, and Mr. David Law's series of Scotch views show a marked advance upon those illustrative of "The Lady of the Lake," which he published some time since. Mr. A. Haig has "discovered" Upsala Cathedral, and found in it architectural beauties which threatened to remain unknown. Among the foreign contributors are M. Richeton, who sends an excellent portrait of the late Professor Fawcett, and M. Léon Richeton, who does as well by "Mr. Carlyle" (316), M. Brunet Debaines, M. Alexis Forel, and M. Chaigneau. Mr. P. G. Hamerton also sends four copper-plates illustrative of various processes employed in etching, and brought by different methods to the state when ready for the needle. Altogether, the exhibition will well repay a visit.

It is proposed that an Art Treasures Exhibition similar to that which was held at Manchester in 1857, and since then at Leeds, Dublin, and Wrexham, shall be held at Folkestone next year. The scheme is being warmly taken up in the district, and the list of patrons includes a large number of distinguished persons.

A society has been formed for the encouragement and cultivation of the art of making medals, under the title of the Society of Medallists. The committee consists of the Deputy Master of the Mint as president, the Slade Professors of London and Cambridge, the President and other members of the Royal Academy, the engraver of the Mint, Professor Chandler Roberts, Mr. W. Richmond, and others. The honorary secretaries are Mr. R. S. Poole and Mr. H. A. Grueber, of the British Museum. A small space in the International Inventions Exhibition having been placed at the disposal of the society for the exhibition of modern machinery and appliances used in the production and duplication of medals, it is proposed to illustrate their use by a limited series of selected medals by living British and foreign artists. The exhibition will be prepared with as little delay as possible.

A MENAGERIE RACE IN CAMP.

Our British soldiers, in the tedious garrison service and long periods of inactivity in camp, which most of the troops in Egypt and in the Soudan have endured from time to time, needed occasional amusement. Lord Wolseley, in his excellent manual, "The Soldier's Pocket-book," recommends every officer to take a lively interest in the sports which afford wholesome diversion to the men under his command. His Lordship does not particularise any of these; but it is known that he, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army in Egypt, has permitted a variety of entertainments to be got up, to relieve the monotony of camp life. Races, cricket, football, athletic contests of strength and agility, and many other healthy open-air pastimes, have generally been encouraged; but the queerest thing we have heard of is the "Menagerie Race," which our Artist, Mr. R. C. Woodville, when he was at Cairo in 1883, had an opportunity of seeing and sketching, and which has since been performed at Souakim, though not very recently, by some of the officers and soldiers belonging to the force of Sir Gerald Graham. The rule of this peculiar race is that the men run on foot, each driving loose before him some animal of his own choice; and there is an elaborate system of handicaps, of course, with a scale of precise distance allowances for the different powers of speed in such a diversity of beasts and birds, not to mention reptiles and insects. We are not informed who was the original inventor of this ingenious piece of drollery, or in what region of the globe where British troops have been quartered, and at what period of our military history, it first provoked the hearty laughter which is of so much physical and mental benefit to men long kept waiting for orders to march and chances of fighting. It seems to have become an established institution connected with all race-meetings at Cairo, along with the camel-races, the donkey-races, and a special form of horse-racing, in which the rider of one horse drives another, with long reins, in front of him, tandem-fashion, making on the course a very effective display. The Menagerie Race can be varied at pleasure, to any extent, by the competitors selecting and procuring whatever animals they may fancy; and in the unexpected appearance of novelties, with the absurdity of such an incongruous assemblage, is great part of the fun. Upon one occasion, we are told, Major Chermside, R.E., the distinguished officer lately commanding at Souakim, drove a mouse before him, and Lord Marcus Beresford, for his part got the best pace he could out of a snake; but dogs and cats, monkeys, geese and ducks and other domestic fowl, are more frequently chosen, while horses, donkeys, mules, camels, and oxen may be made available. The handicapping is arranged by starting the various animals and drivers, with consideration of the respective kinds, at different distances from the winning-post, calculated according to the speed of the creatures, so that the mouse, for example, would have but five yards to run, while the dog or the donkey might have a course of two hundred yards. The allowance for a snake or a tortoise has not been recorded in Mr. Woodville's report of this diverting affair, which causes great merriment among the civilian spectators and the native people, as well as in the breasts of Tommy Atkins and his comrades of the Queen's Army.

The gold medal awarded at the London University presentation was gained by Edmund Wilkinson Wroughton, M.D., of St. Bartholomew's Hospital.

At the last monthly court of the Fishmongers' Company, it was unanimously resolved that a grant of £2000 be made to the Marine Biological Association of the United Kingdom—£1000 to be paid this year, and the remainder in annual sums of £200 during the next five years.

The executive council of the American Exhibition of 1886, after examining the merits of various sites, have given the preference to that at Earl's-court, Kensington, in close proximity to the site of the South Kensington annual exhibition, and of equal area—about twenty-two acres.

In the absence of Lord Shaftesbury, Sir John Kennaway on the 21st inst. opened a branch of the Prison-gate Missions in Grosvenor-road, when Mrs. Meredith, the head of the home, gave some particulars as to the manner in which the female criminals of the neighbouring Millbank Prison were received as they quitted the gates, and detailed the means adopted to bring them back to an honest and useful life.

OUR NOTE-BOOK

This week the Derby has been the favourite topic, and any kind of Derby talk has been taken kindly.

Some benighted heathen, apparently, does not even now know that Diomed, the first winner of the Derby, was imported into America (Virginia) by Colonel Hoomes, and died there at the great age of thirty-one years, having previously become the sire of the great American horse, Sir Archy, who was the sire of Timoleon, who was the sire of Boston, who was the sire of Lexington, who was about the best horse ever bred in the United States, and was himself the sire of the famous Harry Bassett and of Preakness, Duke of Magenta, Bay Final, Brown Prince, and other horses, besides Optimist, well known in this country.

Nor, it would seem, does everybody know that the same Colonel Hoomes was almost certainly the first "Yankee" who ever competed for our Derby, for which he ran a colt (called Horns in England, where he was bred, and Escape in the United States) as long ago as 1801. This was half a century or more before the era inaugurated by Mr. Ten Broeck.

Some people, too, are evidently "surprised to learn" that there is a case of a colt which ran but once in his life (in a public race) and then won the Derby. This was (Chestnut) Middleton, who won the Derby in 1825, though he had a "bucket of water inside him," which his stable-lad had (for a consideration) allowed him to drink. However, his trainer declared that he could have won "with five gallons inside him," and could have won in "a trot." Yet such a horse never did anything before or after, and made no mark here as a sire. What he did in Russia, whither he was sent in 1833, may no doubt be ascertained from the Russian records.

Though the horse that is favourite at starting does very often win the Derby, he is more frequently "bowled over," in the proportion hitherto of about 2 to 1. In fact, out of 105 Derbys the favourite, up to this year, had been "bowled over" sixty-nine times.

Ever since the Dewhurst Plate was won by Paradox last year, he had been first favourite for this year's Derby, or had disputed the favouritism with Melton, until the Two Thousand was lost and won in so exciting but unsatisfactory a fashion. Paradox then wavered a while, disputed pre-eminence with Melton, dropped down a point or so, and ultimately on the 28th ult., amidst a shower of sinister reports, sank, though only for a day, and without the slightest reason, below Melton, Xaintrailles, the Chopette colt, and Royal Hampton. As for Xaintrailles, the "Frenchman," when it was known that he was not to run for the French Derby, which valuable stake seemed to be at his mercy, prophets of evil shook their heads over "poor old Entrails" and predicted that it would be with him as it was in 1876 with his compatriot Braconnier, who, after four "successive wins," came over here (instead of remaining in his own country to dispute the French Derby with Kilt) to run for our Derby and got well "bet" for his pains. We now know all about it until next year brings round the same state of uncertainty again; for last Wednesday the relative positions of Melton, the favourite, Paradox, Royal Hampton, Xaintrailles, the Chopette colt (Crafton), Red Ruin, and the rest of them, were settled, when the most puzzling Derby of some years past was decided, and "public form" was completely vindicated by the positions of first and second obtained by Melton and Paradox, respectively. It would have been almost too much if Mr. Brodrick-Cloete, in his very second season of racing (at any rate, in his own name), had won both Derby and Two Thousand, and so beaten the records of the "fortunate youth," Mr. Bowes, of Streatlam, and of the "lucky Baronet," Sir J. Hawley. And so Melton, as was suggested in these Notes last week, has broken the spell that seemed to have hitherto prevented a winner of the Middle Park Plate from winning the Derby.

The phonograph, an instrument for bottling up sound, to be poured out at will, not once only, but many times, is an amusing toy, which has found favour with many musicians, amongst them being Madame Adelina Patti, whose favourite method of surprising her guests at her Welsh home is to sing her sweet notes into it, and, by turning a handle, make them repeat themselves through the metal tube. Beyond entertainment, it is difficult to see what use the phonograph can effect; but someone has recently patented an invention, which, properly applied, will be a great boon to the public. It is called an antiphone, and for it is claimed that it can reduce sound to a minimum. If it only can be procured at a reasonable price, how eagerly it will be sought after by those who are bothered by street-organs or brass bands! How delightful it will be to be able at will to deaden the shrill cry of the fishwoman at the seaside, and to stop the noisy wailing of a baby! Should the invention really be genuine and practicable, there is a grand future for it.

There was an item missing from the recent ill-fated Japanese Exhibition which certainly might have attracted considerable interest—a direct descendant of the first professor of dancing. In Japan vocations are hereditary—a man succeeding to the occupation of his father as a matter of course. At Tamba next month Umewaka Makoto will celebrate the one-thousandth anniversary of the death of Hiyogo-no-Kami Tomotoki, his first ancestor in the terpsichorean line of business; and it does seem disappointing that the interesting commemoration could not have been held at Knightsbridge.

The recent revision of the Bible has called attention to Bibles generally, and especially to those famous for their curious misprints. Several of these have been issued since 1611, when the old authorised version was published and dedicated to the "high and mighty" King James I. The earliest is the "Placemaker's Bible," printed at Geneva in 1561, in which the letter l was substituted for an e in the seventh beatitude. The "Vinegar Bible" was published at Oxford in 1717, the word vineyard being misprinted vinegar. In the "Wicked Bible," only four copies of which are now in existence, the negative was left out of the seventh commandment, and the printer was fined £3000 by Archbishop Laud, though it is said to have been finally commuted to £300. The "Persecuting Printers' Bible," in which the Psalmist is made to say "Printers have persecuted me without a cause," dates from 1702. The "Ears-to-ear Bible" was printed at Oxford early in the present century, the mistake occurring in Matthew xii. 43; and no less than three editions, the latest being 1823, transform the word fishers, in Ezekiel xvii. 10, into fishes, so that the phrase reads "fishes shall stand upon it." "Breeches" Bibles are comparatively common, and are so called because the garments made by Adam and Eve of fig-leaves are styled "breeches" instead of "aprons."

Some fine old Beauvais tapestry, which had found its way to New York, was cut up in a most heart-breaking and sacrilegious manner a week or two ago. The treasure belonged to a firm of dealers in curiosities, who had occasion to remove into larger premises, and while that operation was going on, it was stolen by a man who sold it as old rags for a few pence. The purchaser cut it into six pieces for bags, but most willingly gave them up when he heard what the value was, and how the tapestry was obtained. It will probably be joined together again; and, as public attention has now been called to its antiquity, will be readily sold.

Every now and then some novel production proves the wonderfully artistic eye possessed by some of the lower industrious Irish. A few rich and beautiful rugs and portières have been seen of late in wealthy New York mansions, which present an Oriental appearance of all that is subduedly gorgeous, with occasional glints of gold and silver. Everyone wonders what they are made of, and in spite of their costliness there is a large demand for them. The truth is that they are neither more nor less than silk rag carpets made in a heavy old fashioned-loom by an Irishman who solaces himself with a black pipe, and works by the light of a couple of tallow candles. Old silk skirts, ribbons, &c., from the rag-shops are cut into small strips and woven in promiscuously with morsels of gold and silver thread sparingly intermixed. The borders are woven separately in rich patterns, all of which come as if by instinct from the Milesian's brain through the medium of his apparently clumsy fingers.

Anecdotes of Victor Hugo are legion, and some of them are interesting because they turn on the conduct of other prominent people. During the worst days of the siege of Paris, the poet gave away a great deal of money, making use of Madame Paul Meurice—who did not long survive that terrible time—as his almoner. She told him one day of a poor woman, without clothes, food, or fuel, whom she thought very deserving; and Victor Hugo gave her a hundred francs, which were gratefully accepted. Two days afterwards, Madame Meurice found the woman in the same state of destitution, and asked where the hundred francs had gone. She said she had distributed them among famishing mothers and children of her acquaintance; and, as inquiry proved that this was perfectly true, Victor Hugo sent her another hundred francs, on condition that she spent it on her own necessities. This she absolutely refused to do, saying that she would rather not have it at all: so Madame Meurice gave her carte blanche to do as she would with it. This obstinate woman was no other than Louise Michel.

Miss Robinson's Institution for Soldiers and Sailors at Alexandria is doing a good work. Every troop-ship is met, and hot coffee served out to the men; and the commander of the six hundred Marines who have just returned home in the Australia says that it was a godsend to his men.

A praiseworthy example of the thrift and industry of American women a generation or two ago is afforded by a Mrs. Button, who kept her hundredth birthday on May 20, near Newhaven, Connecticut. When young she earned her living, and saved money, as a dressmaker, making as many as 160 dresses in a year; and, on the principle that change of work is as good as play, she used to rake rye in the fields at harvest-time, buying her own clothes with the payment she received for doing so. She was, moreover, a good spinner, and could spin a hundred knots of yarn in a day, walking ten miles out and home to the work, and also did a good deal of hand-loom weaving at a shilling a yard. During her married life she kept all her husband's business accounts in her head; but her widowhood has been long, as Mr. Button died in 1834. She lives in great comfort on a valuable little estate, which is the fruit of her earnings, and is said to be in good health.

What is the meaning of the sugar-loaf hat which it has pleased ladies to adopt in these latter days? Do they wish to be regarded as witches, to all of whom—and not to the Lancashire variety only—that sort of hat was wont to be attributed? If so, they might proceed a little farther and assume the broomstick also; a score or two of witches riding broomsticks instead of "screws" in the Row would be a decided novelty, and would assuredly attract that attention which the sex that wears the sugar-loaf hat is said to value above rubies.

A new kind of buoy and other life-saving appliances has recently been tested in the sea off the Atlantic Yacht Club, near New York, and found perfectly successful. Everything was stuffed with Alaska down, and the hair of deer and antelopes, and all the articles proved extremely buoyant; so that even the smallest of them would be amply sufficient to support two grown persons in the water.

FUNERAL OF VICTOR HUGO.

The preparations for the apotheosis of Victor Hugo have absorbed the attention of all France during the past week. The funeral decoration of the Arc de Triomphe, the transformation of the Panthéon, the prospect of a collision between the police and the revolutionaries, the possibility of getting a good place to see the show—such have been the great topics of the day. From the beginning, the funeral of the great poet assumed the character of a "show." The construction of the colossal catafalque in the Arc de Triomphe was watched day and night by thousands of sightseers, and finally a regular fair was improvised on the Place de l'Etoile. Last Saturday many people passed the night in the open air in order to witness the translation of the coffin from the poet's house to the cenotaph. On Sunday, from ten a.m. to six p.m., hundreds of thousands defiled past the cenotaph, which was covered with an immense black velvet pall, spangled with silver tears, piled up with wreaths and flowers, and guarded by successive detachments of the scholar battalions. At night, green fire was burnt in huge candelabra arranged round the Place; mounted cuirassiers holding torches were drawn up in line on either side; all the gas-lamps from the Place de la Concorde up to the Place de l'Etoile were covered with crape; the Arc itself was draped with crape and an immense veil of black crape slung over one side. The aspect of the monument at night was very curious; it loomed up darkly from amidst a surging crowd of men, women, and children, roaring, screaming, whistling, singing—an irreverent, disorderly, and dangerous multitude.

On Monday, the day of the funeral, this crowd was driven back by the police and military, who occupied all the avenues as early as six o'clock, when the deputations and groups began to arrive and take up their positions. I may say at once that the organisation of the whole ceremony was admirable. All the twelve hundred groups, societies, and delegations which took part in this colossal manifestation found their stations without confusion in the vast avenues which stretch west, north, and south from the Arc de Triomphe. In all the great arteries leading westward you saw nothing but troops, cavalry, gymnastic societies, bearers of crowns, flowers, banners, and emblems of all kinds, forming veritable torrents of humanity. By ten o'clock every coign of vantage along the route was occupied. Paris was ready to witness the spectacle.

No words can describe that spectacle. Prodigious, astounding, unparalleled, thrilling, colossal, are but feeble adjectives compared with the impression which it is desired to convey. The cortége itself was prodigious. In striking contrast with the splendour of the military, itself augmented by the presence of Arab chiefs in brilliant costume; with the magnificence of the ten chariots laden with flowers and wreaths, and escorted by 3000 children of the scholar battalions; and with the grandeur of the interminable cortége, was the simplicity of the poor man's hearse, the corbillard des pauvres, in which lay the coffin of the poet, adorned simply with two palm branches and two wreaths of white roses. And behind the hearse followed deputation after deputation, crowns of flowers, flags, banners, bands playing the "Marseillaise," regiments with muffled drums, gymnastic societies in gay uniforms, firemen with their helmets glistening in the sun, deputations of the towns of France and of the two hemispheres, bringing lyres constructed of flowers and wreaths, so immense that some of them had to be drawn by horses. Even more striking than the procession itself, which, according to official statistics, was composed of at least 800,000 persons, was the still more numerous crowd which thronged along the Champs Elysées, the Place de la Concorde, the Boulevards Saint-Germain and Saint-Michel, and around the Panthéon. Every tree swarmed with people, every window, every ledge, every balcony, even every chimney—for it is literally true that people were to be seen quietly seated on the vertiginous elevations of chimneys and eating a modest breakfast under the shelter of an umbrella. In the Boulevard Saint-Germain, especially, the façades of the houses swarmed with humanity, clinging to the stone like flies by prehensile means not displayed in the occupations of ordinary life. The statues of the Place de la Concorde, representing the great cities of France, were laden with humanity; in the basins of the fountains men and boys found sitting and standing room; under the very hoofs of the cavalry horses forming the barrier between the crowd and the cortége sightseers found a perilous place; along the quays and wharves of the Seine the crowd was so thick that the front rows stood up to their knees in water. Never has such a crowd been seen in Paris. No King, Emperor, or General ever received the homage of such a vast multitude.

The head of the procession, which started from the Arc de Triomphe at 11.30, arrived at the Panthéon at 1.45 without incident or accident. The bier was conveyed into the crypt; the orators took up their position at the head of the steps, where a catafalque had been erected; and the défilé began. Only the press and a privileged few were admitted inside the railings of the Panthéon; the rest of the procession passed to the right or the left of the monument, and dispersed. Each group as it passed dipped its flag or banner, and deposited its wreath of flowers on the steps of the Panthéon or against the railings. Candelabra and lampadaria, placed under the colonnade and at each corner of the palisades, shot green flames into the air, and mingled a smell of incense with the perfumes of the flowers. The air re-echoed with the "Marseillaise," alternating with the rolling and rattling of drums, the strident notes of bugles, and the clapping of hands and applause, as the deputations of Belfort, Metz, Strasbourg, Alsace-Lorraine, Alexandria, Rio Janeiro, the Ligue des Patriotes, &c., arrived with magnificent floral trophies. This unparalleled défilé, which began at 1.45, continued rapidly and with interruption until seven p.m., when the last squadron of cavalry and the last battalions of the army of Paris marched past the front of the Panthéon.

The Anarchists and revolutionaries, about whom we have heard so much lately, made a pitiful show in this colossal ceremony. Some eighteen groups presented themselves with red flags, which were seized by the police during the formation of the procession without difficulty or resistance. If the revolutionaries chose the Hugo funeral as an occasion for showing their numbers, they amply proved that they are not worth notice. The curious thing is that a handful of imbeciles should be able to make so much fuss in the newspapers. It is true that if the revolutionaries had been a thousand times more numerous yesterday, they would have been unable to do anything, so excellent were all the arrangements for preserving order. But the important point to be noticed is that the population of Paris takes no interest in these ranting disturbers of the peace, and that a Ministry so wanting in prestige as the present one has only to take the most ordinary precautions in order to frighten the whole band into respect. In short, Monday was a great day for the Republic, and a great day for literature. Certainly there was excess and exaggeration in the details of the spectacle of this funeral, the whole ceremony, grandiose as it was, lacked majesty and dignity. Nevertheless, in the whole history of humanity we find no record of homage paid to literary genius such as that which Paris and France and the whole civilised world paid on Monday to Victor Hugo.

THE PLAYHOUSES.

The revival of "Olivia" at the Lyceum redeems the passing season from the sin of common-place. Here, at any rate, is one entertainment wholly free from the silliness that disfigures the major part of modern dramatic art, and honestly delights the reflective playgoer. This charming fancy, half pastoral, half poetic, as human in its idea as it is dramatic in exposition, was the great and memorable success of the management of Mr. Hare at the Court Theatre in 1878. Mr. W. G. Wills, who had done so much good work for the stage, had never before pleased his audiences so well, and the loving care which was devoted to this old English classic by Mr. John Hare, in conjunction with his friend Mr. Marcus Stone, marked a new era in poetic revivalism in connection with histrionic art. When the rumour first spread that Mr. Henry Irving intended to revive "Olivia" when he returned from America, anxious fears were expressed as to the wisdom of the proceeding. First of all, it was argued that Miss Ellen Terry and her companions of the Court had acted "Olivia" so well that it was simply impossible that it could be done better. Then there were other considerations—Would not the Lyceum stage be too large for the elaboration of so simple a play; would not its bouquet be lost in so extended an atmosphere; and, lastly, how would Dr. Primrose, the dear old Vicar of Wakefield, suit the style of Henry Irving? All hesitation is now lost in a chorus of praise, as sincere as it is well deserved. The Lyceum stage is not at all too large for Olivia; its fragrance is as dominant and as delightful as ever; and Henry Irving's Vicar of Wakefield is as interesting, as picturesque, and as well considered a study as his Charles the First, or his Eugene Aram. Those who doubted the wisdom of the revival forgot what strong dramatic interest is contained in this simple story of the home affections; they failed to observe, in addition, its pretty detail, the representation of English country life in the middle of the last century, the delightful pictures of Vicarage garden and parlour, the trees in fruit, the beds in bloom, and all that pastoral peace which is occasionally presented to us across the footlights. Still, this was no light lyric lost in an elaborate and beautiful binding. The sudden reduction of the good Vicar's family from opulence to penury, the temptation of Thornhill, the flight of Olivia, the discovery of the young Squire's treachery, the identification of the sententious Burchell with Sir William Thornhill, the moralist, the wandering of the old Vicar in search of his child, and the return of the lost lamb, are in reality as strong elements of human and dramatic interest as are contained in the boldest of dramas. Elsewhere they are treated roughly; here they are delicately handled. At other places they may be utilised for modern melodrama; but in this case, Mr. Wills, with his graceful and refining touch, has retuned the poem without injuring the play. There is no disputing about matters of taste. Such a work as "Olivia" is gall and wormwood to the Philistines. They ridicule it, as they must ridicule all that is imaginative and fanciful; but, on the other hand, it is a distinct gain to secure in London, at the present moment, a play so interesting and so well acted as this. Miss Ellen Terry has improved upon her original conception of Olivia. Those who are familiar with the present version of the old story will remember that exquisitely touching moment where the Vicar's daughter, on the eve of her departure from home, distributes her love-gifts to the assembled family, and with difficulty breaks away from the associations that are dearest to her in the world. This scene, as interpreted by Miss Terry with heartfelt emotion, is one of the most pathetic moments in modern dramatic literature. It shares with the farewell scene in "Charles the First" the honour of drawing more tears than have fallen in a theatre since Robson gave his inimitable performance of Sampson Burr in the "Porter's Knot." That Olivia's farewell is as profoundly touching now as it was in 1878 need not be stated to those who understand the strange effect of Miss Terry's deep but tender tones. But it is in the third act that this graceful artist now shows how great an influence she has over the sympathies of her audience. The change from the gay, light-hearted, and childlike wife to the bruised, beaten, and despondent woman; the contrast between Olivia rejoicing at the prospect of a return to home and loved ones, and Olivia standing crushed and disgraced before the false man who has deceived her, are interpreted with consummate skill. No less admirable and pathetic are the scenes where the old Vicar forgives his erring child, and comforts her out of her almost hysterical grief. It is here, most of all, that the assistance of such an actor as Henry Irving in the character of Dr. Primrose is found. Every scene with the daughter is lifted, beautified, and idealised by the actor, who has made such a loving study of Goldsmith's venerable clergyman. The scene where the Vicar breaks away from Olivia, tries to lecture her on her transgression, and breaks down over the hopeless task, is as natural as it is finely executed. Mr. Irving makes of Dr. Primrose a refined gentleman, a chastened Christian, an idolizing father. By one of our most able literary critics, the position of Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield has been likened to the sorrows and resignation of Job. "He begins life with a good fortune, a handsome house, and wealthy friends, but is reduced to utter poverty without any fault of his own, and being reduced like Job, like Job he is restored." This comparison is certainly not rendered less apposite from a study of Mr. Irving's acting, so full of dignity and delicate pathos, so firm in outline and so subdued yet harmonious in colour. It is certainly one of the very finest and most consistent of Mr. Irving's many studies of the human mind under "the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune," and is as subtle in device as the conscience-haunted Matthias or the despairing Eugene Aram. Another most able performance is the Squire Thornhill of Mr. William Terriss, a picture of eighteenth-century manner of the most vivid and admirable kind. Mr. Terriss not only looks the rake and heartless lady-killer, but gives to the personation far more original thought than is usually expended on such characters by young and popular actors. The careless insincere love-making, the reckless contemptuous air of the pampered man, the frequent signs of awakened conscience, and the fierce rage with which Thornhill turns, when he is wounded with reproach, on the taunting Burchell, are admirable points in a performance of great power and excellence. This is certainly one of the best things Mr. Terriss has ever done. At the outset, it was thought to improve on the last act of the play by constantly changing the scene from the exterior to the interior of the Vicar's house. But, however good in idea, it was feeble in execution. The value of the play is its simplicity, and what could be more beautiful than the idea of the weary clergyman and his repentant child stealing into the Vicarage parlour in the chill grey hours of Christmas morning? How suggestive the fancy of the sleeping household to be rejoiced with the sight of their loved ones on this day of reconciliation and love! The cold room warmed by the fire of human affection! No snow-scenes or landscapes are required to suggest what has been so admirably suggested by the poet-dramatist. Mr. Irving has accordingly reverted to the original arrangement of the scene, and abandoned the "mechanical changes," which were always ingenious but never very popular.

The public who love clever acting will be delighted to find Mr. and Mrs. Bancroft once more in "Sweethearts," that pretty and clever contrast by Mr. W. S. Gilbert that created such a favourable impression when first produced at the old Prince of Wales's Theatre. A still more brilliant artistic "contrast" is that between Mrs. Bancroft's Jenny Northcott and her Nan in "Good for Nothing." When this gifted lady retires from the stage it will lose one of its greatest ornaments and the most consummate artist of her time. Not all the brilliant dash or impetuous style of Mrs. Bernard Beere, or the endeavour of Mr. Forbes Robertson will win favour for Garrick's iconoclastic version of Shakspeare's "Taming of the Shrew" called "Katharine and Petruchio." It is a bad, senseless play, created when the actor's vanity was in excess of his love for Shakspeare or veneration for his art; and no acting will rescue it from the contemptuous treatment it deserves.

THE PASTORAL PLAY AT COOMBE HOUSE.

Following the precedent created by herself last summer, Lady Archibald Campbell and her "Pastoral Players" gave on Saturday last the forest scenes of "As You Like It" in the historic grounds of Coombe House, where Lord Liverpool, seventy years ago, entertained the Allies on their way to the grand naval review at Portsmouth.

The audience, headed by the Prince and Princess of Wales and Prince George of Wales, with the three Princesses, his sisters, included Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, the Duke of Saxe-Meiningen, the patron of players par excellence, the Marquis of Lorne, the Persian Ambassador, Malcomb Kahn, and other foreign Ambassadors, as well as some five hundred men and women representative of leisure, rank, and culture. Plaudits, repeated and spontaneous, showed how thoroughly the audience approved of the manner in which the piece was produced and played.

The total absence of all theatrical conventionality gave to the whole performance a charm of exhilaration and novelty. Among the company were many amateurs, but the fact of their being so was undiscernible; also several professionals of note, such as Mr. Hermann Vezin, Mr. Charles Fulton, and Mr. Elliot, but they brought with them no suggestion of the foot-lights. When the curtain rose, or rather fell, it was a veritable forest glade that filled the eye; and the hunters, in buff and russet clad, as they grouped themselves on the uneven sward, seemed, thanks to the nice colour-sense possessed by Lady Archibald Campbell, and which her manager, Mr. E. Godwin, threw into correct archæologic form, as natural an element in the woods of Coombe as ever were Robin Hood and his merry men in the forest of Sherwood. The leaves overhead rustled in the breeze, and the birds sang in the sunshine, filling up the pauses in the chorus-singing, and aiding the nymph Echo to give natural continuity to "What shall he have who killed the deer?" We need not enlarge on the charms of Miss Calhoun's Rosalind, or the naiveté of Miss Annie Schletter's Celia—they played well together—or the fascinating picturesqueness of Mrs. Plowden's Phœbe, or the pastoral gaucherie of Miss Fulton's Audrey. We can say, without any reserve, that the players of both sexes did admirably, and that the stately, yet lithe and graceful, figure of Orlando (played by Lady Archibald herself), coupled with sonorous declamation and emphatic yet natural action, gave a crowning propriety and verisimilitude to the whole performance.

How far Lady Archibald Campbell, who has created this woodland delight for us, is filled with the true dramatic instinct, may be read in the current number of the Nineteenth Century, in which she has a remarkably appreciative and learned article on "The Faithfull Shepherdesse" of Fletcher. By a happy coincidence, Lord Archibald Campbell, who afterwards entertained the Royal party at dinner in his own house of Coombe Cottage, was able to present to the Princess of Wales the first copy of his sumptuous book (published by Blackwood and Sons) on "The Folk-Lore, Songs, and Legends of Argyll."

Another representation of "As You Like It," at Coombe House, will take place this (Saturday) afternoon. "The Faithfull Shepherdesse" will be produced on Tuesday, the 23rd inst., and will also be performed upon the 25th and 27th inst.

A more than usually excellent amateur performance was given at the Gaiety Theatre last Saturday morning by the "Busy Bees," in aid of the Central London Throat and Ear Hospital, the pieces chosen being "For Her Child's Sake," and "The Palace of Truth." Mr. Ayres and Mrs. Lennox Browne in the first part evinced real pathos. The same lady as the Queen, Miss Edith Gellibrand as the Princess, and Miss Brandon as Mirza, combined to ensure an exceptionally fine performance of Mr. W. S. Gilbert's comedy. A net profit of nearly £200 was announced.

At a special assembly of the Incorporated Society of British Artists, held on Tuesday evening, Mr. Mortimer L. Menpes was elected a member.

Miss Nellie Bass, daughter of Sir A. Bass, M.P., unveiled a bust of the late Mr. M. T. Bass, at St. Paul's Institute, Burton-on-Trent, on Tuesday afternoon, in the presence of a large company, including Mr. Wiggin, M.P., and Sir A. Bass, M.P.

It is stated that the secretaryship of the Beaconsfield Club, the vacancy in which was filled up a day or two ago, was contested by some 500 applicants, including Baronets, Generals, and other officers of the Army and Navy, members of Parliament, and members of the Civil Service.

Hawarden was visited last Saturday by many hundreds of excursionists, who enthusiastically cheered Mr. Gladstone. Their efforts to induce the right hon. gentleman to address them were, however, fruitless, as he was suffering from a cold. He was, however, able to read the lessons at church on Sunday.

The Free Church Assembly of Scotland, meeting in Edinburgh, discussed the subject of disestablishment at great length on Thursday week, and by a large majority adopted a motion proposed by Principal Rainy declaring that disestablishment is urgently called for in the interests of justice and of the peace and welfare of the country.

A new Congregational church in Castletown-road, near West Kensington railway station, was opened on Tuesday with a service, at which the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon preached the sermon. It is a handsome building, costing, with the site, £15,000. Of an early Gothic character, the general shape is cruciform, with a massive central tower and a clerestory supported by flying buttresses.

A sale of work from the Gentlewomen's Self-Help Institute (15, Baker-street, Portman-square) will be held at 23, Rutland-gate, by permission of Lord and Lady Egerton of Tatton, next Thursday and Friday, June 11 and 12. The work will consist of fancy and useful articles of every description; also clothing for the poor. All the work of necessitous ladies, and sold for their benefit. Entertainments at intervals during the day. The Lady Mayoress will open the sale on June 11 at 2.30.

MUSIC.

THE CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY, DRURY-LANE THEATRE.

The series of performances of operas in English closed, last Saturday evening, with Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," which was given for the only time during the season. The cast was generally excellent, Madame Marie Roze and Madame Georgina Burns having, respectively, as Susanna and the Countess, sung and acted with charming grace and refinement. Madame Julia Gaylord, as Cherubino, displayed high dramatic talent in representing the pert humour of the forward Page, and genuine sentiment in the delivery of his music. The cast was completed, with various degrees of efficiency, by Mr. B. Foote as Figaro, Mr. Ludwig as the Count, Mr. Burgon as Bartolo, Mr. C. Lyall as Basilio, Miss E. Collins as Marcellina, and others in subordinate parts. Mr. Carl Rosa conducted, and he and Mr. Augustus Harris and the principal performers were called forward and enthusiastically applauded.

The performances all through the series have been of high efficiency: and they have been ably conducted, alternately, by Mr. Randegger and Mr. Goossens; Mr. Rosa having presided on two or three occasions.

Last week's concerts included a performance at St. James's Hall of "Elijah" by Mr. Michael Watson's choir, conducted by him; the occasion having been for his benefit.

The second of the series of excellent chamber-music concerts, given last week by Madame Frickenhaus and Herr Ludwig at Prince's Hall, comprised performances of classical instrumental music, in which the skill of the concert-givers, respectively as pianist and violinist, was very successfully displayed. Mr. Lionel Hume made a highly favourable impression in his rendering of several vocal pieces. It was his first appearance, and his performances were such as to hold out a prospect of a successful career. His voice is a baritone of agreeable quality and good range.

Mrs. Dutton Cook (Mrs. Charles Yates) has returned to the exercise of a profession in which she attained a deservedly high position at an early age. As a pianiste, she was a distinguished student of the Royal Academy of Music, and her proficiency was successfully manifested at the concert given by her last week at the residence of Mr. R. D. Sassoon, Belgrave-square. The concert-giver's technical skill and refined style were specially displayed in Sterndale Bennett's beautiful sonata "The Maid of Orleans," and in shorter solos, besides her co-operation with Signor Albanesi in a duet for two pianofortes. Vocal pieces were contributed by Mesdames Valleria, Biro Marion, Fassett, Misses Phillips and Elliott; recitations were given by Mrs. Bernard Beere and Mr. Wilson Barrett, and a musical sketch by Mr. Grossmith.

Señor Sarasate—the eminent Spanish violinist—gave the fourth of his series of orchestral concerts at St. James's Hall last Saturday afternoon, when his rare executive skill was displayed in M. Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," and smaller pieces by other composers. Orchestral works were rendered by a full band conducted by Mr. W. G. Cusins.

Madame Jenny Viard-Louis gave the third of the present series of her interesting Beethoven concerts at Prince's Hall on Monday afternoon.

The sixth Richter Concert of the present series took place last Monday evening, when the programme opened with Beethoven's overture in C, op. 15, entitled "Namensfeier"—a composition produced, in 1814, in celebration of the name-day of the Emperor of Austria. Although not ranking among the best works of Beethoven, the overture deserves to be heard more frequently than it has been. It was followed, at Monday's concert, by two orchestral movements from Liszt's oratorio, "Christus"; one illustrating the "Singing of the Shepherds at the Manger," the other the "March of the Three Holy Kings." There is much effective writing in each piece, together with some of that eccentricity which characterises most of Liszt's music. A remarkably fine rendering, by Madame Valleria and Mr. E. Lloyd, of the great love-duet for Sieglinde and Siegmund, from the first act of Wagner's "Die Walküre," was a special feature of the concert, which closed with Beethoven's Pastoral symphony.

Mr. Henry Leslie's choir began a new season—at St. James's Hall—on Thursday evening under his conductorship. The programme comprised several works of interest.

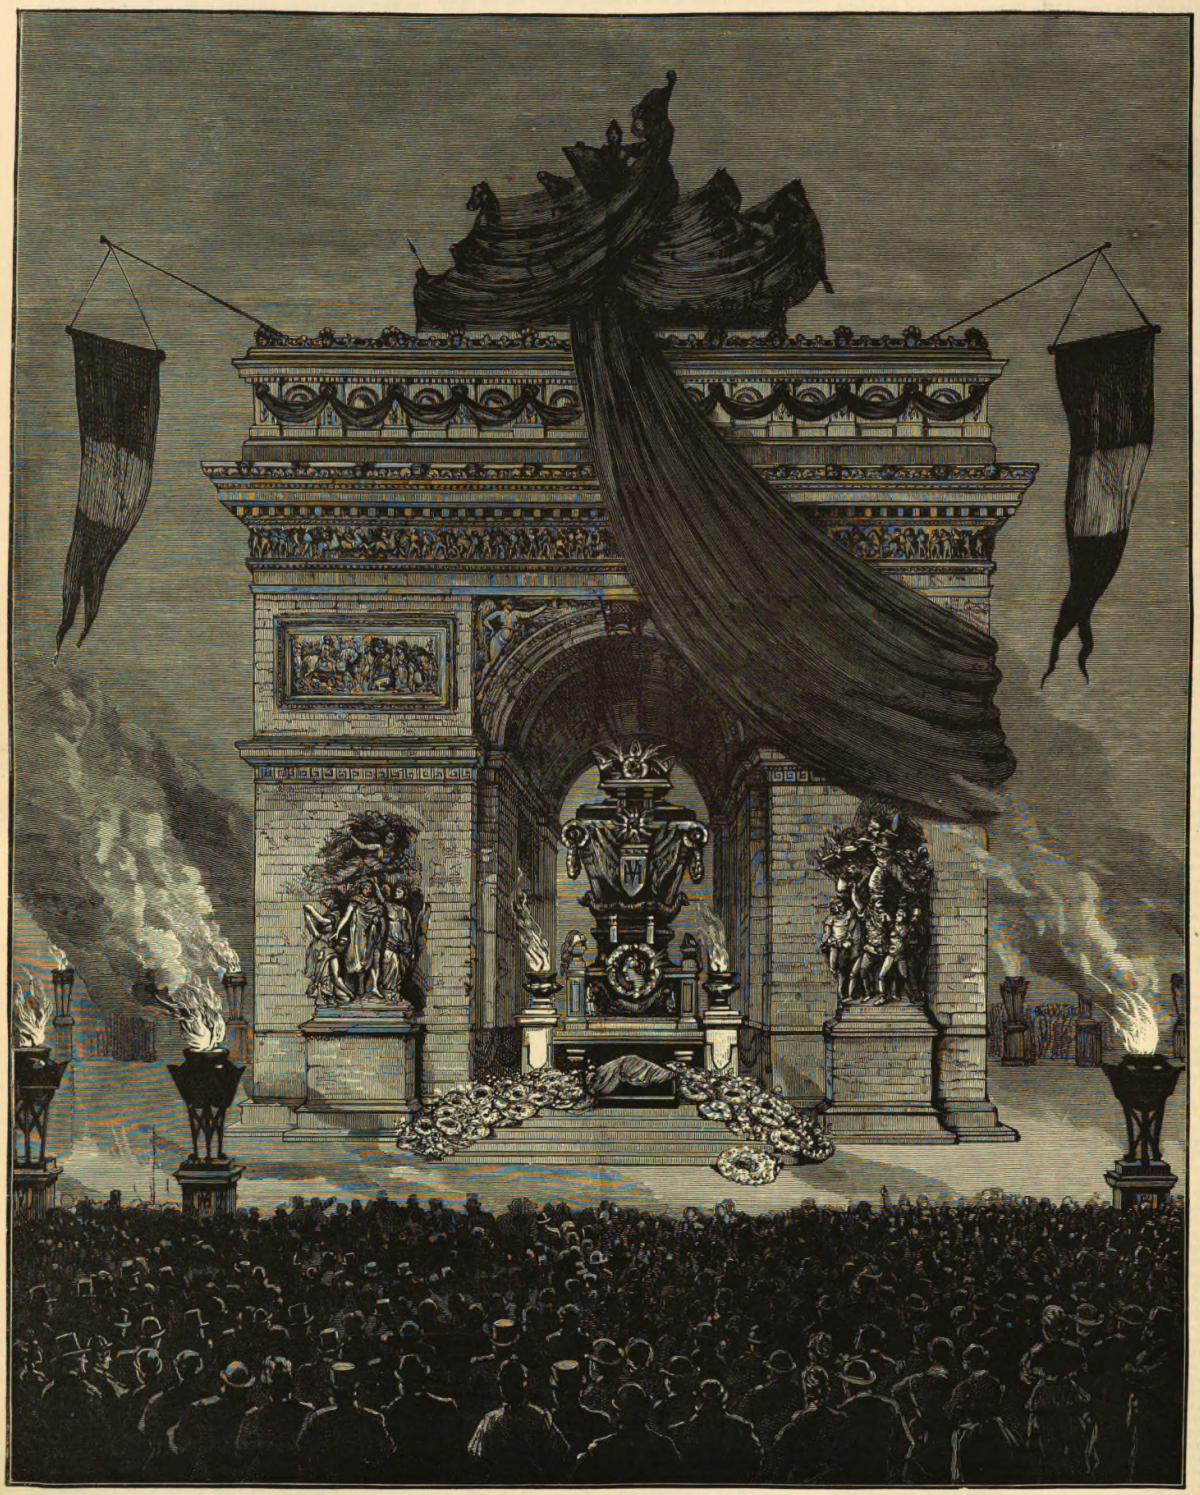
This (Saturday) evening will bring forward, at the Gaiety Theatre, for the first time in England, M. Delibes' opera, "Lakmé," by a French operatic company, including Mdlle. Van Zandt, who will represent the heroine of the work just named, as in its original performances in Paris.

The far-famed Strauss band, from Vienna, was announced to appear this week at the International Inventions Exhibition.

An American concert is to be given next Tuesday evening, at St. James's Hall, in aid of the relief fund for sick and wounded soldiers in the Soudan. The performers—amateur and professional—will be of American nationality.

A Balfe memorial concert will be given at the Royal Albert Hall, next Wednesday evening, when Madame Christine Nilsson will make her first appearance since her return to London. The programme also includes the names of Madame Trebelli, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Maas, Signor Foli, and other eminent artists, in association with a varied selection from the works of Balfe.

It is now stated that there will be an Italian Opera Season at Covent-Garden Theatre, under Mr. J. H. Mapleson's management, to consist of twelve performances—on Tuesdays and Saturdays—beginning on June 16—Madame Adelina Patti to be the leading attraction.



The London branch of the United Richard Wagner Society successfully inaugurated their season on Friday, May 29, by a conversazione at the Art Galleries of Messrs. Dowdeswell in Bond-street. Instrumental and vocal selections from Wagner's works formed a special feature of the evening's entertainment, Mr. Walter Bache presiding at the pianoforte.

Mdlle. Rosebery gives her second and last pianoforte recital of the season at St. James's Hall this (Saturday) afternoon; and the Musical Artists' Society give their thirty-seventh performance of new compositions this (Saturday) evening at Willis's Rooms.

Mr. Herbert Reeves will give his first concert at the Crystal Palace next Monday afternoon; and Madame Catherine Penna's annual matinée musicale is announced to be given, the same time, at Beethoven Rooms, Harley-street.

The loan collection of historical musical instruments, musical manuscripts, and other curiosities in connection with music at the Inventions Exhibition, was submitted to view last Saturday, previous to the formal opening thereof. The exhibition of pianos and their predecessors, violins, piano-organs, and other instruments of various kinds and periods, and of ancient and modern manuscripts, will prove of high interest and attraction to the musical public.

The Dublin Corporation have decided that instead of three black castles on a blue ground, the future city flag shall exhibit a harp on a green ground, with three white castles in one quarter on a blue ground.

DRAWN BY F. BARNARD.

Police-Constable Z 99 came round the corner, and interposed his bulky person between the combatants. "Now then!—now then!" said he; "just stop that, will yer! A couple o' gents like you!—you ought to know better."

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

THE WRATH OF MR. WILBRAHAM.

Doubtless there are circumstances under which it becomes a duty to inform some relative or friend that he is conducting himself like a perfect idiot; but under no circumstances can this duty be an agreeable one to those who are at all likely to discharge themselves of it with success. The people who find satisfaction in it are precisely those who might keep silence with advantage. Georgina's announcement of her engagement brought her such hearty congratulations from her brother that she felt it impossible to attack him then and there upon the subject of his misdemeanours; and when, a few days later—being urged thereto by De Wynt—she ventured upon a tentative remonstrance, he checked her at once.

"For Heaven's sake," he exclaimed, "don't begin to scold! I am not sure what are the crimes that you suppose me to have been guilty of; but to save time, let us say that I have broken the entire decalogue at a blow, like Moses. Well, I don't repent. I am not in a repentant humour, and you won't bring me into one by telling me what a poor opinion you have of me. Really and truly, you had better leave me alone."

Georgina was very much inclined to agree with him. She secretly sympathised far more with her brother than with her sister-in-law, and thought that the latter had brought the greater part of her troubles upon herself. As she did not deem it prudent to say this, she held her tongue.

In the meantime, De Wynt was not the only person who was keeping a watchful eye upon Adrian and his proceedings. From the outset Mr. Wilbraham had detested his successful rival. Indeed, he was a man to whom successful rivals were very apt to be detestable, and he would, no doubt, have discovered plenty of defects in Adrian's character, if the latter had not saved him the trouble of making any research in that direction. When, therefore, he saw Vidal dancing half the night through with that naughty little Mrs. Black, or sitting in dark corners with the more demure but not less dangerous Mrs. White, and when at balls, dinner-parties, and crushes, he looked in vain for Vidal's wife, his blood began to boil. Where was Mrs. Vidal? Did that fellow lock her up, so that he might be the more free to carry on his endless flirtations? Did he ill-treat her? Did he beat her? Wilbraham believed that the man was capable of it. His apprehensions became at length so harassing to him that he resolved to find out whether they were well founded or not by the simple expedient of calling in Alexandra-gardens. Some men might have felt this to be an act of doubtful wisdom; but it did not appear so to Wilbraham, who would no more have thought of making love to his neighbour's wife than of picking his neighbour's pocket, and who merely wished to be assured that the woman who might have ruled over his heart and household, was contented with the destiny which she had chosen in preference to that. What course he was prepared to adopt in the contrary event, he had not asked himself.

He found Clare at home and alone. She was sitting beside her work-table, and as she rose to receive him, laying down the doll which she had been dressing, a faint flush mounted into her cheeks. Evidently she was a little surprised at seeing Wilbraham, who had never until now chosen to darken her doors; but she did not express her surprise in words, and it was he who experienced a momentary embarrassment. He accounted for his presence, after a few minutes, by saying:—

"I called to see whether you were still alive, Mrs. Vidal. I meet your husband almost every evening; but you, never. Why do you hide yourself from your friends in this way?"

"The few friends that I have in London know where to find me," answered Clare. "I am not particularly fond of parties."

"Yet you used to be fond of them. I don't think anybody enjoyed balls more than you did in Rome."

"Ah, that was a very long time ago."

"Two years."

"Well, two and a half. But two years may be a long time. It all depends what has happened in the course of them. One can't manage to enjoy dancing after one is married quite as much as one did before."

"Your husband"—began Wilbraham, but stopped himself. It would be rather bad taste to tell her that her husband did not find matrimony incompatible with social diversions; and, besides, she could hardly require to be informed of that fact. "You were ill nearly the whole winter, were you not?" he asked, abruptly. "You don't look very well now."

"Don't I? I feel perfectly well," answered Clare; "and I was not really ill then. I am afraid I am always ready to make the most of any excuse for getting out of London."

"Of course you are!" cried Wilbraham, warmly; "and quite right too! A born and bred Londoner may go on filling his lungs with coal-smoke, and persuading himself that he likes it; but as for anybody who has been accustomed to breathe air keeping well here, I simply wouldn't believe him upon his oath if he asserted such a thing. And why on earth should you live in a place which you hate, and which doesn't agree with you? Vidal isn't a doctor or a lawyer or anything of that kind. You ought to insist upon his moving into the country."

Wilbraham fastened eagerly upon this grievance, in default of a better, and made himself quite hot over it. His vehemence rather amused Clare, who laid her work down upon her knees and looked up at him with a smile.

"Married people can't insist upon having everything that they wish for," she remarked. "Some day, perhaps, Mrs. Wilbraham will insist upon spending the greater part of the year in London; and then what will you say?"

"I shall give in—or rather I should give in. I don't say that I should like it; but I would let her have her own way if I thought it would make her happy, and I certainly shouldn't hesitate for a moment if I thought her health depended upon it. However, it does not much matter, as the case will not arise."

"Let us hope not. Still, it may."

"Excuse me; it cannot arise. I shall never have an opportunity of showing my devotion to Mrs. Wilbraham for the excellent reason that there never will be a Mrs. Wilbraham. I think you must know that."

Clare stitched on at her work without replying, and presently Wilbraham asked, "Do you mind my saying so?"

"I would rather you did not talk like that," answered Clare, glancing up at him for a moment. "It—it seems such a pity."

The pity of it all was very visible to her. She could not help being touched by the constancy of the man whom she had rejected, and contrasting it with the inconstancy of the man to whom she had given all the love that she had to bestow. She could not help seeing what a much happier thing it would have been if she had been able to love the first instead of the second—much happier, not only for Wilbraham and for her, but for Adrian himself, as well as for the clan of young Irvines, whose respective careers might have been made smooth for them by a rich and powerful brother-in-law. But she had not been able to love Wilbraham; she had not been able to help loving Adrian; and so everybody concerned had been disappointed. There was no use in thinking about it, still less in talking about it—but it was a pity.

Wilbraham unconsciously echoed the last of her thoughts, without having divined the preceding ones. "Yes; it's a pity," he agreed; "but, as you say, there's no use in talking about it."

Apparently, he did not find it easy to hit upon any other theme of conversation, for he sat for some time in silence, gazing at Clare, who had resumed her occupation of putting little naked dolls into decent clothing.

"What are you going to do with those things?" he asked, at length.

"With the dolls? I am going to take them to my children."

"Your children?"

"At the hospital, I mean. Did you know that there was such a place as a Children's Hospital in London? I did not, until a short time ago. Somehow, one doesn't associate the idea of suffering with children. Yet they do suffer—some of them dreadfully—and I think the saddest part of it all is their patience."

"Poor little things!" said Wilbraham. "Do they want money at this hospital?"

"All hospitals want money," answered Clare, smiling.

"I'll remember. And so you take them dolls and things. Do you go there often?"

"I manage to go there most days. They have got to know me now, and I flatter myself that some of them are disappointed when I don't appear. I enjoy sitting with my children much more than going to balls."

"Well, but that isn't quite natural," remonstrated Wilbraham. "It's very good of you, and just like you, to take pleasure in visiting the sick; but it ought not to be your only pleasure. At your age, you ought to like amusement."

"But I don't, you see."

"That is just it; that shows that there must be something wrong. No one who was happy at home would want to—to run off to a hospital every day."

This was assuming a little too much, and Clare perceived that she had been imprudent in allowing such an inference to be drawn. "I did not mean you to understand that I was unhappy at home," she said, with a slight accent of displeasure. "I don't know why you are so determined to take that for granted. I remember that you said the same thing to me a year ago."

"Yes; I know. I ought not to say it, I suppose; but I can't pretend that your happiness is a matter of indifference to me. It was not very likely that I should cease to care from the moment that you married whether you were happy or not. Can you tell me that you are?"

"You have no right to ask," returned Clare. "Supposing that I were as miserable as you wish me to make out, I certainly should not like to confess it; but you would put me into such a position that I should be almost obliged to confess it. The truth is that you can't believe in the possibility of my being happy with anyone except yourself. You made up your mind from the first that my husband and I were not suited to each other; and when you discover that he is fond of society, and that I am not, you begin to triumph."

This was rather hard upon poor Wilbraham; but Clare felt that she must be hard upon him, if she wished to preserve her self-respect. To complain to him of Adrian would be disgraceful, and to let him go away with the impression that cause for complaint existed would be scarcely less so.

Such, nevertheless, was the impression with which he did go away. He accepted his rebuke meekly enough. He apologised, and begged Clare to forgive him; but not the less was he convinced that she was a martyr. He left the house, full of pity and anger, and with a bitter sense of impotence. She had chosen her lot, and neither he nor anyone else could alter it. That fellow would go on as he had begun—if indeed he did not grow worse as he grew older—and the end of it would be that, some fine morning, he would elope with one of the married women to whom he was so fond of paying court. Just the sort of thing that a man of that description was bound to do sooner or later!

"I should dearly love to break his head for him!" muttered Mr. Wilbraham, as he strode down Cromwell-road, brandishing his stick, and scowling fiercely at the surprised pedestrians whom he met in that interminable thoroughfare.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

CHILL PENURY.

It is said by the experienced in such matters that there can be no greater mistake than altering the name of a newspaper or magazine which has been for a certain time before the public. According to this theory (which, if correct, exhibits the intelligence of the ordinary reader in a somewhat startling light), you may change your politics, your editor, your writers, and other trifling adjuncts without thereby lessening your average sale, since those who have been purchasers will continue to be purchasers from mere force of habit; but the moment that you adopt a new title your publication becomes a new one, and must fight its way into popular recognition in the face of the customary difficulties. Possibly, the proprietors of the Anglo-Saxon may have been advised to this effect when they took to themselves a fresh editor, revised their list of contributors, and decided to bring their periodical out once a week, instead of once a month. If so, they had perhaps omitted to take into account that there may be just as much risk in retaining a name associated with failure as in discarding one which has hitherto been connected with success. Be that as it may, the young Anglo-Saxon could not be got to rise resplendent from the ashes of the old. Country clubs and reading-rooms did not seem to care about it, the railway traveller fought shy of it, and its contemporaries did not welcome its appearance in that brotherly spirit which the enlightened mind is ever ready to display towards a rival.

Of course, there were various ways of accounting for so discouraging a state of affairs. The editor averred that the cold shade of Pilkington still brooded over his paper; Egerton complained that the tone of the principal articles was too flippant to please; while Adrian was inclined to attribute the small sales to the invincible stupidity of the public, against which, as we know, the gods themselves contend in vain. But there could be no difference of opinion as to the fact that the paper was not paying, had not paid in the past, and showed little sign of paying in the future. That being so, the time seemed to have nearly come for singing its requiem. And one disconsolate contributor only sighed and murmured, "I expected this," when he received a note from his chief briefly informing him that the forthcoming number of the Anglo-Saxon would be its last.

Obviously, the very first thing to be ascertained was what effect this collapse was likely to have upon the pecuniary interests of the humbler proprietors; and Adrian promptly set forth to seek out Mr. Larkins and question him upon the point. For three days he sought him in vain. Larkins was not at the office, he was not at his club, nor could he be heard of at his private residence at St. John's-wood, which ultima Thule Adrian reconnoitred without avail.

"It really almost looks as if the man wanted to keep out of my way!" he exclaimed, at last, to Percy Kean, whom he had chanced upon in the course of his peregrinations, and who laughed and said,

"I don't know why he should want to keep out of your way. You can't bully him, now that he isn't your editor any more."

"I never did bully him; it was he who used to bully me. I am anxious to see him now, because I happen to have invested £2000 in his confounded paper, and I should like to have them back, if quite convenient."

Kean whistled. "You don't say so! I had no idea you were such a—h'm—public-spirited fellow. But what are you going to do with poor Larkins when you catch him? I don't suppose you 'll find your two thousand inside him if you kill him and cut him open."

"No; but he always managed the money, I believe. At least, I used to be paid for my articles by cheques bearing his signature."

"Oh! Well, there may be a balance of £2000 at the bank for him to draw upon; but I shouldn't think it was over and above likely. If I were you I should look up old Egerton. That 's your best chance."

Adrian rather thought it was, though at the same time it did not strike him that his best chance was a particularly good one. However, he betook himself to the house of Mr. Egerton, whom he found not only at home, but quite ready to condole with him.

"Upon my word, Vidal," said he, "I feel quite ashamed when I think that it was I who originally led you into joining this fiasco of an Anglo-Saxon. All I can say is that I honestly believed I was doing you a good turn at the time."

"I am sure you did," answered Adrian. "You couldn't foresee that it would be a fiasco."

"No, by George! nor that it would be such an expensive one either. If I had—but there 's no use in grumbling about it. It 's the old story, you know—a fool and his money. Well, I shall know better another time."

"You consider your money lost, then?"

"It 's all spent, at any rate. In fact, I don't know that I shall not have to spend a little more, for we haven't finally squared up accounts yet. I suppose it 's all right; but it seems to me as if this paper must have been utterly mismanaged."

"I put two thousand into it," observed Adrian, mournfully.

"Sorry to hear it. Pilkington tells me that he did the same."

"I imagined from what he said that he had put in more. It was he who persuaded me to make the investment, though I was rather unwilling to do so. But I did think that I should at least be able to withdraw my money when I wished."

"So you could, I suppose, so long as it was there to be withdrawn. What was to prevent you?"

"Mr. Larkins prevented me. That is, he represented that I should give offence if I left you just at the time when the paper was taking a fresh start. And he gave me to understand that the chief proprietors would not allow me to incur any loss."

"If Larkins said that," cried Egerton, reddening, "he said a most improper thing! Larkins seems to think that he can take the coats off our backs, and that we shall immediately offer him our cloaks also. I am sincerely sorry that you should have dropped money; but if I make myself responsible for other people's losses in addition to my own, may I be part proprietor of an infernal silly newspaper for the rest of my days! You must see yourself that such demands are preposterous."

"I am quite aware that I have no legal claim"—began Adrian.

"Nor any moral claim either, that I can see."

"Well, I hardly know as to that. I must say that Mr. Larkins warned me that he was speaking without authority; but he certainly led me to believe that I might safely leave my money where it was, and upon the strength of that I did leave it where it was."

"Well," said Egerton, who was walking about the room, with his hands in his pockets, "I 'll be hanged if I see it! You have a case against Larkins, I allow; but why didn't you come to me and ask whether we were really such fools as he made us out? You see, if we indemnified you, we couldn't well refuse to indemnify Pilkington, and, for anything that I know, half a dozen others into the bargain. It 's rather too much to expect of us that we should do that."

Adrian could not but feel that it was. He went away with the melancholy conviction that he had not only failed in the object of his visit, but had left a disagreeable impression behind him. Though still a young man, he had lived long enough in the world to be aware that those who have been the victims of sharp practice should never proclaim themselves victims. Enmity may be obtained in that way and sometimes contempt; but restitution never. Moreover, he had caused Egerton to lose his temper and speak sharply; and that is an offence which no man can easily forgive.

These reflections kept our luckless hero company as he wended his way westwards, and very poor company he found them. It annoyed him to think that he had behaved in an undignified manner; but a momentary loss of dignity was not, after all, so bad as the permanent loss of £2000; and this again was but a trifle in comparison with the sacrifices which he knew that he must shortly make in order to meet his liabilities. When to these causes for unhappiness he added the failure of his last novel, the coldness of many of his friends, and, last, not least, Clare's stubborn resentment, he felt that he was indeed justified in calling himself a miserable man. He would have to go home and tell his wife that their style of living must be reduced. Probably they would be obliged to move into a smaller house; certainly they would have to give up such superfluous luxuries as entertaining their friends at dinner and keeping a man-servant. The whole prospect was gloomy enough. "I might as well die, and have done with it!" inwardly ejaculated Adrian in one of those outbursts of petulance which had lately become common with him.

It was getting late in the afternoon when he entered the Park, and, striking across it, saw in the distance that slowly-flowing stream of carriages which, at a certain season of the year, may be taken as fairly representative of the wealth and aristocracy of England. "Good-bye!" he murmured, regretfully, as he gazed at the colour and glitter of that significant procession. To him it was significant; to him it was the expression of a life which he loved, and which he was leaving. Fashionable society had treated him very kindly, and had endeared itself to him, not because he was infected either by the old form of snobbishness which worships a coronet or by the baser form of modern snobbishness which bows down before a full purse, but because well-bred people are more agreeable to associate with than those who are not well-bred, and because even rich people are able to surround themselves with refinements which are denied to the poor. Adrian thoroughly appreciated these refinements; he liked to have pretty things about him, to look at pretty faces and listen to soft voices and to sit down to dinner at tables made beautiful by cunning floral decoration. But now there must be an end of all that. What his future life would be like, he could only conjecture dimly; but that it would have to be ruled for some time to come by a rigid economy was certain, and every pleasure that entailed expenditure must be sternly rejected. The one solace to which he was able to look forward was hard work; and even hard work can give little comfort to a man who has begun to doubt his powers.

Now, it is perfectly possible to walk along the streets of London, lost in a sombre reverie and pensively swinging your umbrella between your finger and thumb, so long as you steer straight ahead and remember the rule of the road for foot-passengers; but any sudden change of course demands a more careful look-out; and of this Adrian was made aware when, on turning a sharp corner in the neighbourhood of Cromwell-road, he came violently into collision with a big man who was twirling a big stick.

The stick caught Adrian's umbrella and sent it flying into the middle of the road; the man nearly knocked Adrian himself off his legs and then, with great presence of mind, called out, "Why the devil don't you look where you are going, Sir!"

"My dear Wilbraham," remonstrated Adrian, mildly, "is that the tone of voice in which to address a man whose best umbrella you have just deposited in a sea of mud?"

"Oh, how do you do, Vidal? I didn't know it was you," said the other. "Beg your pardon, I 'm sure. It was your own fault, all the same."

"I suppose so," observed Adrian, meekly; "I notice that most things are my fault. I much resemble the lamb who couldn't help interfering with the wolf's water-supply even though he did drink lower down the stream."

Wilbraham snorted, without making any articulate response.

He was not by nature a quarrelsome man, but he was in a very quarrelsome mood; and at that moment nothing would have afforded him greater delight than to roll Adrian over in the mud beside his umbrella. As this was not practicable, he very foolishly determined to relieve his feelings by giving Vidal a piece of his mind.

"I have just been at your house," he began, in a decidedly aggressive tone.

"Yes?" said Adrian. "I am sorry I was not at home; but I hope you saw Mrs. Vidal."

"I did; and I was shocked to see her looking so pale and ill."

Adrian's brows drew together. "I don't think you had any occasion for being shocked," he remarked. "My wife is quite well."

"I thought her looking very pale and ill," repeated Wilbraham, doggedly. "I 'm not surprised at it either. Are you aware that she goes every day of her life to a hospital, where she may catch scarlet fever or mea-les or—or goodness knows what? How you can allow her to run such risks I can't understand!"

"Infectious cases are not taken at the hospital which you speak of," answered Adrian, very quietly; "and will you excuse my adding that I don't care about being told what my duty to my wife is?" He saw that the other meant to pick a quarrel with him, and he was not himself in the humour to put up with much impertinence.

"I dare say you don't," retorted Wilbraham, with a short laugh. "No; I should think your duty to your wife would be about the last thing you would like to be told of."

"May I ask what you mean by that?"

"Certainly you may; and I 'll answer you, too. I mean that it isn't doing your duty to your wife to keep her mewed up at home while you go larking about all over the place. I mean that it isn't doing your duty to your wife to make love to every silly woman you meet. That 's what I mean."

"As that description does not apply to me," observed Adrian, still preserving a calm exterior, "I don't know that I need notice it."

"You can notice it or not, as you please," returned Wilbraham, evidently disappointed. "If you think the cap don't fit you, you had better consult Mrs. Vidal. Perhaps she may take a different view."

"What!" exclaimed Adrian hotly. "Do you mean to say that she"——

"I don't mean to say another word about the matter, except that I consider that the cap fits. And if you ask me my personal opinion of a fellow who acts in that way, I haven't the least objection to telling you that I look upon him as a blackguard."

What in the world is to be done with a man who stops you in a public thoroughfare and calls you a blackguard? A Frenchman, of course, would have no difficulty in answering the question; but an Englishman, to whom custom has denied the use of pistol and small-sword, has little choice between passing on with the ignoble retort of "You 're another" and doing as Adrian did, and hitting out with his left.

The objections to this latter course are obvious, and they become greatly increased if you unfortunately fail to knock your antagonist down. Wilbraham, who was not unskilled in the art of self-defence, avoided the blow, dropped his stick, and threw himself into a fighting attitude; and a most merciful thing it was, both for the respectable member of Parliament and for the distinguished literary man concerned, that Police-Constable Z 99 came round the corner at this juncture with measured tread, and, taking in the situation at a glance, interposed his bulky person between the combatants.

"Now then!—now then!" said he; "just stop that, will yer! A couple o' gents like you!—you ought to know better. Now, are you agoin' to walk off quiet, or would you rayther come along o' me to the perlice-station?"

Everybody knows the effect of a pinch of snuff upon two dogs who have fastened on one another. However enraged they may be, however intrepid, they must needs leave go in order to sneeze; and it frequently happens that, having sneezed, they will trot away in opposite directions to think things over. Honour has been satisfied, and a fight which ends in a draw is very nearly as good as a victory. It was thus that Messrs. Wilbraham and Vidal went their several ways without exchanging another word or look, and thus that the readers of the daily papers were defrauded of a delightful bit of scandal.

Mr. H. M. Stanley was entertained at a public breakfast by the Baptist Missionary Society, in acknowledgment of the great work which he had been instrumental in carrying out in Africa, and especially of his services to missions. Mr. Stanley gave a sketch of the hardships endured by missionaries, and admitted that at one time he had ill-understood them.

There will be a grand concert on the Crystal Palace Handel Orchestra next Wednesday, by 5000 selected voices from the Sunday-schools of London and the country, accompanied by the Crystal Palace Band and the great organ. The programme will include the "Hallelujah Chorus," from "The Messiah"; an anthem composed for the occasion by David Davies, the organist of the choir; and other suitable anthems, choral pieces, psalm tunes, &c. Conductor, Mr. Luther Hinton; organist, Mr. David Davies.

The instruction which the St. John Ambulance Association has given as to the means to be taken to give first aid to the injured, is frequently unavailable for the want of simple bandages in the necessity for a tourniquet to stop the bleeding from a dangerous wound such as may arise, especially from accident, in the crowded streets of London. To meet this want Messrs. Russell and Everett, of Rochampton-street, Vauxhall-bridge-road, have, under the auspices of the association, brought within the compass of a pocket-book the appliances which an instructed person can use in an emergency for the saving of life from the result of an accident or crime.

At the Inventions Exhibition, in the South Central Gallery, the well-known firm of J. W. Benson, Ludgate-hill and Old Bond-street, shows some curious and uncommon miniature watches, costly complicated watches, the chronograph used for timing the Derby, the perpetual calendar and clock watches, &c. Two watchmakers are engaged in putting together the newly invented "Ludgate" watch, the various parts of which are made in grosses, and to illustrate the interchangeable system upon which the whole watch is made. The workmen take the pieces from the bulk as they come, and thus form the complete watch.

The annual court of governors of the Hospital for Consumption, Brompton, was held last week in the board-room of the hospital—Mr. T. P. Beckwith in the chair. From the report of the committee of management, read by the secretary (Mr. Dobbin), it appeared that the charity benefited a larger number of in-patients in 1884 than in any previous year. The financial position of the hospital was so frequently misunderstood and mis-stated that the committee felt compelled to reiterate the fact that the fixed income did not amount to £3000 a year, whilst the ordinary expenses of the two buildings, containing 321 beds, exceeded £24,000 per annum; hence the necessity of liberal and sustained support to carry on this great work. The report was unanimously adopted.

THE COURT.

The Queen is in the enjoyment of excellent health; and nearly every day walks or drives, being generally accompanied by Princess Beatrice. Her Majesty, Princess Louise, Marchioness of Lorne, Princess Beatrice, and the Princess of Leiningen were present at Divine service on Sunday at the parish church of Crathie. The Rev. Dr. Donald Macleod, one of the Queen's chaplains, and minister of Glasgow, officiated. Lord Carlingford and the Rev. Dr. D. Macleod had the honour of dining with the Queen and Royal family. For the first time this season the Queen visited Braemar on Monday. Her Majesty's birthday is to be kept to-day (Saturday).

By command of the Queen, a State concert was given on Tuesday night at Buckhingham Palace. The Prince and Princess of Wales, and other members of the Royal family, were present. Madame Christine Nilsson, Madame Albani, and Madame Marie Roze sang.

The Prince and Princess of Wales, accompanied by their daughters, arrived at Marlborough House yesterday week from Sandringham. The Prince was present in the evening at the last concert of the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society at the Prince's Hall. On Sunday the Prince and Princess, Prince George, and Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud, were present at Divine service. The Duke and Duchess of Teck visited the Prince and Princess of Wales, and remained to luncheon. The Prince received the United States Minister (Mr. Phelps) at Marlborough House, last Monday morning, on his being accredited to the Court of St. James's. His Royal Highness dined with the members of the 1st (or Grenadier) Guards' Club at the Freemasons' Tavern in the evening. On Tuesday the Prince and the Duke of Edinburgh privately visited the Historic Music Loan Collection in the galleries and rooms of the Royal Albert Hall. Subsequently the Princess, accompanied by Princess Louise of Wales, paid a visit to the exhibit of the Donegal Industrial Fund at the exhibition. The Prince went to Epsom Downs. Prince George, second son of the King of the Hellenes, arrived at Marlborough House on a visit. Prince Albert Victor, attended by the Rev. J. N. Dalton, and Prince George likewise arrived from Trinity College, Cambridge, and her Majesty's ship Excellent at Portsmouth, respectively. Prince Albert Victor distributed the prizes won at the annual competitions of the Town and County of Cambridge Rifle Association, of which his Royal Highness is president. Prince George of Wales attained his twentieth birthday on Wednesday, having been born on June 3, 1865.

The Duke of Edinburgh was on Monday re-elected Master of the Trinity House for the ensuing year.

On Monday the Duke and Duchess of Connaught arrived at Aden on board the Sutlej en route for England.

Princess Christian assisted on Thursday evening last week at a concert given by the Windsor and Eton Amateur Madrigal Society, at the Albert Institute, Windsor. Her Royal Highness played a pianoforte selection by Bach, an aria by Paradies, and, with Miss L. Blair Oliphant, in a duet for pianoforte and violin, "Romance," by Svendsen.

FASHIONABLE MARRIAGES.

The marriage of Mr. Seale, only son of Sir Henry Paul Seale, Bart., with Miss Jodrell (who was given away by her brother, Sir Alfred Jodrell, Bart.) was solemnised on Tuesday with full choral service at St. Andrew's, Wells-street. The bride wore a dress of rich duchesse satin of the deepest ivory tint, draped with some magnificent point-lace, the corsage and train being of a rich brocade, and small bunches of oranges and their flower at the throat. Her ornaments were a single-stone diamond necklace with crescent pendant, and the veil was fastened with one diamond star, while she had a diamond and sapphire bracelet on her right arm. She was attended by seven bridesmaids—Lady Jane Turnour, Lady Jane Grimston, the Hon. Andalusia Molesworth, the Hon. Clementina Maude, Miss Preston, Miss Margaret Seale, and Miss Elizabeth Seale.

At St. Paul's Church, Knightsbridge, on Tuesday, Mr. Alfred Gaussen was married to Lady Kathleen Bernard, youngest daughter of Francis, third Earl of Bandon, and sister of the present Peer. Mr. J. E. Gladstone was the bridegroom's best man. The nine bridesmaids were Lady Emily and Lady Emma Bernard, sisters of the bride; Miss Alice Gaussen, sister of the bridegroom; Miss Lucy Leslie Melville, the Hon. Marion Brodrick, and Miss Mildred Whitmore, cousins of the bride; Miss Blois, the Hon. Nora O'Brien, and Miss Smith Bosanquet. The bride was conducted to the chancel by the Earl of Bandon.

The marriage of Mr. Charles Carmichael Lacaita, only son of Sir James P. Lacaita, K.C.M.G., with Mary Annabel, only daughter of Sir Frances Hastings Doyle, Bart., took place in St. George's Church, Hanover-square, on Tuesday morning. Mr. Thomas Gibson Carmichael was best man to the bridegroom. The six bridesmaids were Miss Agnes and Miss Annora Williams Wynn, Miss May Kinlock, Miss May Popham, Miss Hermione Ramsden, and Miss Leveson-Gower.

A meeting will take place at the Mansion House on June 9, with the object of furthering the interests of the Volunteer Medical Staff Corps.

In London last week 2209 births and 1538 deaths were registered. The deaths included thirty-eight from smallpox, ninety from measles, ten from scarlet fever, seventeen from diphtheria, and fifty from whooping cough.

The Duke of Devonshire has issued a circular to his Irish tenantry, stating that he has decided on giving a reduction of 20 per cent off their half-year's rent. His Grace has intimated to his tenantry in Buxton and the neighbourhood that he has decided to make an allowance of one year's rent, to be expended on lime for the land.

CITY ECHOES.

Wednesday, June 3.

The Bank rate is now at its lowest (2 per cent), a further reduction of ½ having been made last Thursday. The rate of interest now allowed for deposits is 1 per cent, and the working rate of discount is ¾ or ⅞ per cent. Moreover, there is the prospect of a long continuance of this depression. Under such circumstances, it is not surprising that investors and the large money institutions should turn to securities. Under the influence of such considerations, Consols have risen to over par, so that Mr. Childers's conversion plans again excite interest. Most other classes of securities have also risen considerably since the fear of a war with Russia died out; but from the Stock Exchange come complaints of unimproved business, the rise being explained by the mere closing of accounts between members. American securities continue an exception to the prevailing tendency. They, indeed, got worse instead of better; bad as they were before.

Colonial Government bonds are just now exciting particular interest, their market value rising in the face of repeated new issues. Just recently, New South Wales and Queensland placed fresh amounts, and New Zealand and South Australia invite tenders for a million and a half each, while Canada is successfully funding five millions of 5 per cents into 4 per cents, and is preparing for a new issue, which is to cover every actual and prospective commitment of the Government.

Coal and iron companies have long been in depressed circumstances, and with a capital of about a quarter of a million the Pelsall Coal and Iron Company have in the past year made a debit of £2000. This is one of the companies formed during the inflated period of 1873. In the twelve years which have elapsed, the dividends have amounted to 18 per cent, or 1½ per cent per annum.

Owning land in a thriving British colony rarely fails to be remunerative. The directors of the Australian Company have announced a dividend of 10 per cent, and a bonus of 5 per cent, making 15 per cent for the past year. This company's dividends have steadily advanced from 8 to 9, 10, 12, and now 15. But the dividend of the Agricultural Company of Mauritius is not so good as usual, it being 15, as compared with 20 for several previous years.

Several of the Indian Tea companies are issuing their annual reports. Their experience has been very varied. The Tokai shareholders are to receive 10 per cent as compared with 4 for each of the two preceding years, and the recently formed Panitola Company is to pay 10 per cent. The Chargola Tea Company is to pay 7½; and the Dejoo Tea Company 2 per cent only, as compared with 7 last year. The Luckimpore Company announce a dividend of 3½ per cent, which is the first payment since the year 1879.

After an experience of three years, the New Zealand Grain Agency and Mercantile Company (Limited) have decided to withdraw from business. £500,000 of shares had been subscribed, and £175,000 had been paid. Debentures to the amount of £101,691 had also been issued. In respect of 1882 a first dividend of 6 per cent per annum was paid. For 1883 there was no dividend, but £5338 was carried forward. In 1884 this balance was absorbed, and £48,889 of the capital was lost. Hence the decision to wind up.

A very welcome rise in the price of both copper and tin has been followed by a sharp rebound in the share quotations of the principal companies concerned in those metals. Mason and Barry's shares, which were recently as low as 7½, are now 10; and Rio Tinto shares have risen from 7½ to 11. T. S.

Dr. Charles A. Cameron has been appointed President, and Dr. W. Stokes Vice-President, of the Royal College of Surgeons of Ireland.

The Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress attended the opening of the Essex Agricultural Society's Show, at Waltham Abbey, on Thursday.

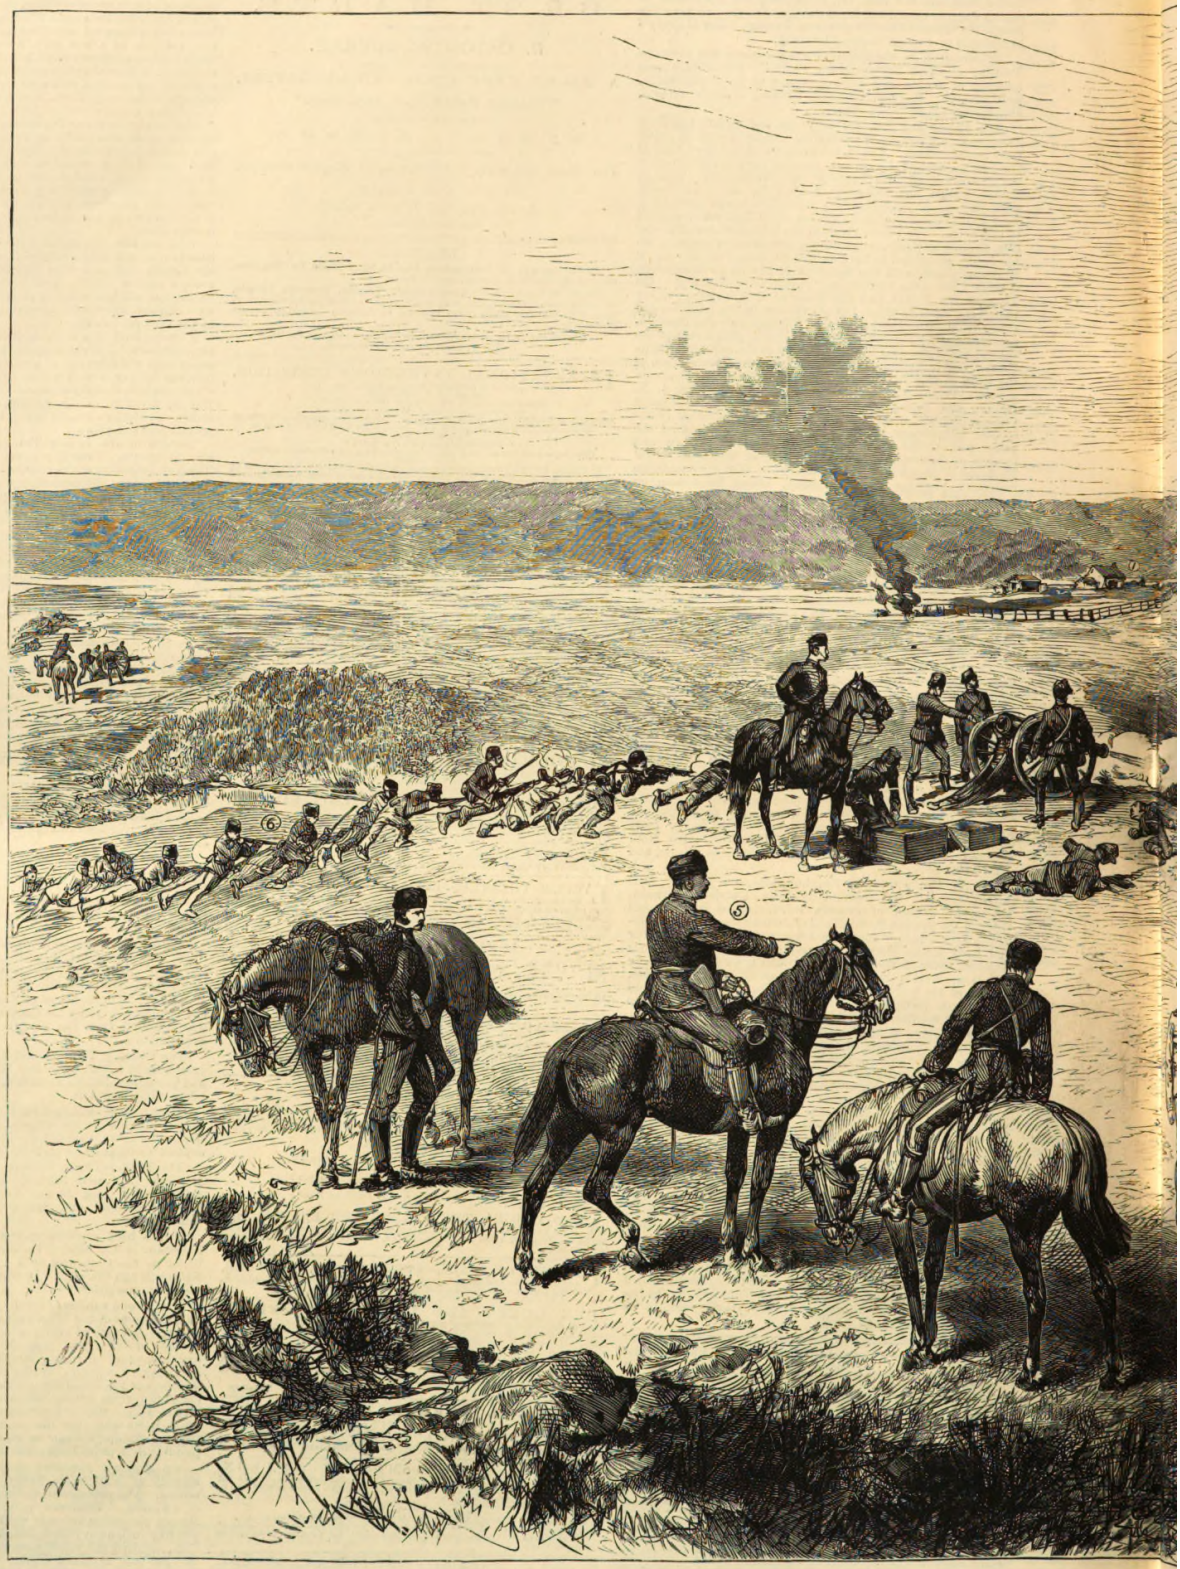
The Duke of Westminster has accepted the position of President of the East London Union for Advanced Education (Evening Classes).

Sir Lyon Playfair announces that it is not his intention to seek re-election for the Universities of Edinburgh and St. Andrews.

The Inner Temple Gardens are open to the public from six until nine o'clock nightly. The privilege thus granted is especially intended for the benefit of the poorer class of children inhabiting the surrounding neighbourhoods.

The photographs taken at the Artists' Ball, mentioned in our last issue, were by the electric light, the current for which was supplied from the Electric Power Storage Company's accumulators.

The Country Brewers and Licensed Victuallers' Organisations held a meeting in Her Majesty's Theatre on Tuesday, and passed resolutions condemning the additions made to the beer and spirit duties.

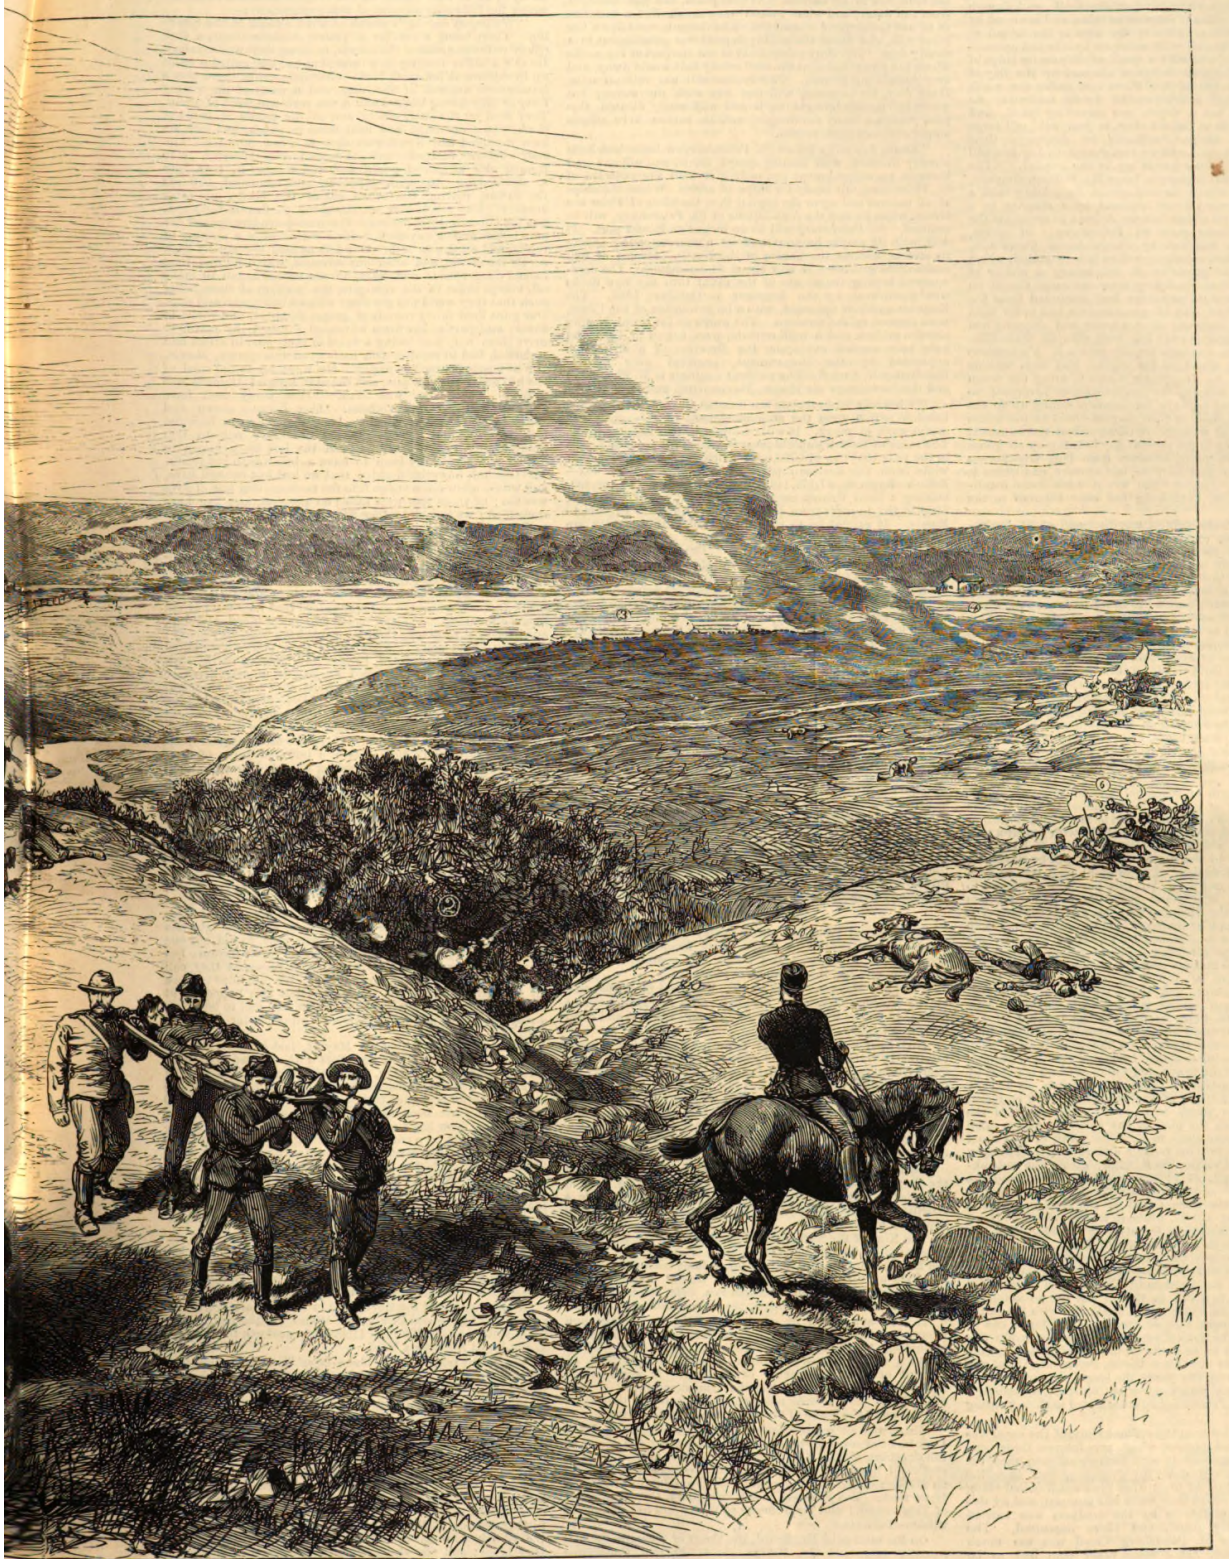


After having been in a small boat for six days and nights, the crew of the barque Themis, abandoned among the ice in the Atlantic, were picked up by the steamer Missouri. The captain's wife and two children were also saved.

The Dublin Trinity Sittings at the Law Courts began on Monday. The new Lord Chancellor sat in the Court of Appeal, with Lord Justice Fitzgibbon, and, addressing the Attorney-General and the Solicitor-General, called them within the bar.

It has been resolved to raise a fund for a scholarship of literature at the Bristol University, and to place a bust or tablet in the Cathedral as a memorial to the late Mr. F. Fargus (Hugh Conway). It was stated that the scholarship would require £1500.

The second volume of the Report of the Royal Commission on the Houses of the Working Classes has been published. It contains minutes of evidence as to England and Wales, and consists of 728 pages. Appended are reports on the Artisans' and Labourers' Dwelling Act, 1875, from various towns, and a number of statistics bearing on the general subject.—The members of the Royal Commission on the Housing of the Poor concluded their sittings in Dublin last week, and afterwards attended a meeting of the Dublin Ladies' Sanitary Association. Sir C. Dilke said that the condition of the dwellings of the poor in Dublin, though in some cases bad, was not so deplorable as in other Irish cities and towns, or in London.



On Monday, Elizabeth Grey, a gipsy, was brought up in custody at Whitehaven Police Court charged with fortune-telling. The prisoner at various times had gone to the house of a farmer at Moor-row, to whose housekeeper, named Mary Briggs, she stated that she would read the planets for her and put bad luck away; that Miss Briggs would marry some rich man, and that she would have better health. In various sums, the prisoner obtained £105. Last Thursday evening she called again and wanted another £30, and when she could not get it said it was a bad job, as she could do nothing without it, and that it was a pity, as there was a full basket of gold coming to Miss Briggs. She was sentenced to three months' imprisonment.

...NT QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL TO GENERAL MIDDLETON, C.B.

ST. PETERSBURG A SEAPORT.

The Emperor and Empress of Russia, on Wednesday week, the second anniversary of their Coronation at Moscow, opened the Maritime Canal, in the Bay of Cronstadt, the shallow upper extremity of the Gulf of Finland; by which great work the City of St. Petersburg is made a seaport as much as London. St. Petersburg, indeed, stands almost on the sea-shore, at the very mouth of the Neva, though behind several low islands which crowd the head of the Gulf; and though this is an inland sea without saltness or tides, and is closed by ice in winter. Seventeen miles to the west is the island of Cronstadt, a great fortress, with naval dockyards and arsenals for the Imperial fleet, and with a spacious harbour for ships of commerce. The navigable entrance channel up the Bay of Cronstadt to the mouth of the Neva lies under the south side of Cronstadt, and is commanded by its batteries. As the bay eastward has a depth not exceeding 12 ft., and the depth of the Neva at its bar is but 9 ft., all large vessels have been obliged hitherto to discharge their cargoes at Cronstadt, to be there transferred to lighters and barges which brought the goods up to the capital. "The delay and expense of this process," says Mr. William Simpson, our Special Artist, "will be understood by stating that a cargo might be brought from England by a steamer in a week, but it would take three weeks at least to transport the same cargo from Cronstadt to St. Petersburg. Of course, much of this time was lost by custom-house formalities. Sometimes it has taken even longer than is here stated, which made the delivery of goods at St. Petersburg a matter of great uncertainty, thus rendering time-contracts almost an impossibility. This state of things had continued from the time of Peter the Great, and his great scheme had never been fully realised. The increase of commerce and shipping had long made this a crying evil; but even with all these difficulties, the trade here has been rapidly growing. A scheme to bring the shipping direct to the capital had thus become almost a necessity. As Manchester wishes to bring the ocean traffic to her doors without the intervention of Liverpool, so St. Petersburg desired to have its steamers sailing up to the city, delivering and loading their cargoes direct at the stores and warehouses in her streets. If Glasgow had not improved the Clyde, and had up to the present day to bring up all goods carried by her ocean-going steamers from Port Glasgow—a place constructed for that purpose last century, and which is twenty miles from Glasgow—she would have been handicapped exactly as St. Petersburg has been till now in the commercial race.

"For some years the subject was discussed at St. Petersburg, and more than one scheme was proposed; at last the project of General N. Pooteloff was adopted. According to this plan, a canal has been cut through the shallow bottom of the Gulf of Finland, all the way from Cronstadt to St. Petersburg. The line of this canal is from north-west to south-east; it may be said to run very nearly parallel to the coast line on the south side of the Gulf, and about three miles distant from it. This line brings the canal to the south-west end of St. Petersburg, where there are a number of islands, which have formed themselves, in the course of ages, where the Bolshaya, or Great Neva, flows into the Gulf. It is on these islands that the new port is to be formed. It is a very large harbour, and capable of almost any amount of extension. It will be in connection with the whole railway system of Russia. One part of the scheme is that of a new canal, on the south side of the city, to connect the maritime canal, as well as the new harbour, with the Neva, so that the large barges may pass, by a short route, to the river on the east, and thus avoid the bridges and traffic of the city.

"The whole length of the canal is about eighteen miles. The longer portion of it is an open channel, which is made 350 feet wide at bottom. Its course will be marked by large iron floating buoys; these it is proposed to light with gas by a new self-acting process which has been very successful in other parts of the world; by this means the canal will be navigable by night as well as by day. The original plan was to have made the canal 20 feet deep, but this has been increased to 22 feet. The Gulf of Finland gradually deepens towards Cronstadt, so that the dredging was less at the western end. This part was all done by dredgers, and the earth brought up was removed to a safe distance by means of steam hopper barges. The contract for this part of the work was sub-let to an American firm—Morris and Cummings, of New York. The eastern portion of the work on the canal is by far the most important, and about six miles of it is protected by large and strong embankments on each side. These embankments were formed by the out-put of the dredgers, and are all faced with granite boulders brought from Finland; at their outer termination the work is of a more durable kind, the facing is made of squared blocks of granite, so that it may stand the heavy surf which at times is raised by a west wind in the Gulf. These embankments, as already stated, extend over a space of nearly six miles, and represent a mass of work to which there is no counterpart in the Suez Canal; nor does the plan of the new Manchester canal present anything equivalent to it. The width of this canal also far exceeds any of those notable undertakings. The open channel is, as stated above, 350 ft. wide; within the embankments the full depth of 22 ft. extends to 280 ft., and the surface between the embankments is 700 ft. This is nearly twice the size of the Suez Canal at the surface, which is 100 mètres, or about 320 ft., while it is only about 75 ft. at the bottom; the Amsterdam Canal is 78 ft. wide. The new Manchester Canal is to be 100 ft. of full depth, and it boasts of this superiority over the great work of Lesseps. The figures given above will show how far short it comes of the dimensions of the St. Petersburg Canal. The Manchester Canal is to be 24 ft. in depth, in that it has the advantage of 2 ft. more than the St. Petersburg Canal; but with the ample width this one possesses, this, or even a greater depth, can be given if it should be found necessary. Most probably this will have ultimately to be done, for ocean-going steamers are rapidly increasing in size since the St. Petersburg Canal was planned, and in a very few years the larger class of steamers might have to deliver their cargoes at Cronstadt, as before, if the waterway to St. Petersburg be not adapted to their growing dimensions.

"The dredging between the embankments of the canal was done by an improved process, which may interest those connected with such works. It may be remembered that the Suez Canal was mostly made by dredging, and that the dredgers had attached to them what the French called 'long couloirs' or spouts, into which water was pumped, and by this means the stuff brought up by the dredgers was carried to the sides of the canal, and there deposited. The great width of the St. Petersburg Canal was too much for the long couloirs, hence some other plan had to be found. The plan adopted was that invented by Mr. James Burt, and which had been used with the greatest success on the new Amsterdam canal. Instead of the couloir, floating pipes, made of wood, are in this system employed; the earth or mud brought up has a copious stream of water poured on it, which mixes in the process of descending, and the whole becomes a thick liquid. This, by means of a centrifugal pump, is propelled through the floating pipes to any point required, where it can be deposited. The couloir can only run the out-put a comparatively short distance, while this system can send it a quarter of a mile, or even farther, if necessary. Its power is not limited to the level surface of the water. I saw on my visit to the canal one of the dredgers at work, and the floating pipes lay on the water like a veritable sea-serpent, extending to a long distance where the stuff had to be carried. At that point, the pipe emerged from the water, and what looked very much like a vertebra or two of the serpent crossed the embankment, went down the other side, and there the muddy deposit was pouring out in a steady flow. Mr. Burt pointed out to me one part of the works where his pump had sent the stuff nearly half a mile away, and over undulating ground. This system will not suit all soils. Hard clay, for instance, will not mix with the water; but where the matter brought up is soft and easily diluted, this plan possesses many advantages, and its success here affords ample evidence of its merits.

"About five miles below St. Petersburg, a basin had been already finished, with landing-quays, sheds, and offices; and there is an embankment connecting it with the railways of St. Peterburg, all ready for ships to arrive When the ships of all nations sail up to the capital then the ideas of Peter the Great, when he laid the foundations of St. Petersburg, will be realised. St. Petersburg will be no longer an inland port. It will, with its ample harbour and its numerous canals among its streets, become the Venice of the North. Its era of real commercial greatness is now about to commence. The ceremony of letting the waters of the canal into the new docks was performed by the Emperor in October, 1883. The Empress and heir apparent, with a large number of the Court, were present on the occasion. The works on the canal, costing about a million and a half sterling, were begun in 1876, and have been carried out under the direction of a committee appointed by the Government, presided over by his Excellency N. Sarloff. The resident engineer is M. Photiesky; and the contractors are Messrs. Maximovitch and Boreysha."

We heartily congratulate the Russian Government and the Russian nation upon the accomplishment of this great and useful work of peace. It will certainly benefit English trade. The value of British imports from the northern ports of Russia in the year 1883 was £13,799,033; British exports, £6,459,993; while from the southern ports of Russia our trade was—British imports, £7,177,149; British exports, £1,169,890, making a total British commerce with European Russia of £20,976,182 imports from Russsia, and £7,629,883 exports to Russia. It cannot be to the interest of nations which are such large customers of each other, to go to war about a few miles of Afghan frontier. The London Chamber of Commerce Journal, ably edited by Mr. Kenric B. Murray, secretary to the Chamber, has in its May Number an article upon this subject well deserving of perusal. It points out that, in the case of war, most of the British export trade to Russia would go through Germany, and might possibly never again return under British control. In spite of Russian Protective duties, this trade has been well maintained, even while the British import of Russian commodities, wheat, flax, hemp, tallow, and timber, was declining 40 per cent from 1883 to 1884. The St. Petersburg Maritime Canal will evidently give much improved facilities to the direct export of English goods to Russia. Without reference to our own manufactures, it should be observed that the Russian cotton-mills, including those in Poland, consume yearly 264 million pounds of cotton, most of which comes through England. The importation of English coal to Russia has afforded a noteworthy instance of the disadvantage hitherto occasioned by the want of direct navigation to St. Petersburg; the freight of a ton of coal from Newcastle to Cronstadt was six shillings and sixpence, but from Cronstadt to St. Petersburg it cost two shillings more. It is often said, in a tone of alarm and reproach, that Russia is very eager to get to the sea. The more Russia gets to the sea everywhere, the better will it be for British trade with Russia; and friendly intercourse with an Empire containing nearly a hundred millions of people is not to be lightly rejected.

Mr. Edmund Yates was on Saturday last entertained at a complimentary dinner, at which Lord Brabourne presided. Members of Parliament and about 200 representatives of literature, art, and the drama were present.

The Lady Mayoress (Miss Fowler) held her first reception at the Mansion House on Tuesday. The receptions will be continued on the third Tuesday in June and the first and third Tuesdays in July.

Earl Spencer presided last Saturday at a Privy Council meeting in Dublin Castle, and subsequently visited Sir Edward Cecil Guinness, whose baronetcy was gazetted on Friday, in connection with the Royal visit.

Steamers arrived at Liverpool during the past week with live stock and fresh meat on board from American and Canadian ports bearing 2026 cattle, 9644 quarters of beef, and 1350 carcases of mutton, showing a decrease in the supply of live stock, but an increase in that of fresh meat.

Owing to the great success of the "Masque of Painters" at the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours, and in compliance with numerous requests, the Committee gave a repetition of the tableaux at the Kensington Townhall on Thursday evening.

The King of the Netherlands has awarded to Mr. H. Baxter, master of the Grimsby smack General Wolseley, and four of the hands, a bronze medal each for gallant conduct in saving the lives of the crew of the Dutch lugger Maartje under perilous circumstances in the North Sea. Mr. Baxter has also been presented with a diploma by the Netherlands Government.

It was announced at a meeting held at Marlborough House last Saturday that the Lord Mayor's committee for promoting the Gordon Memorial had been compelled to abandon the scheme of erecting an hospital at Port Said, on account of the unsuitability of the site. It was resolved to invite fresh proposals for the consideration of a sub-committee. This course received the approval of the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Cambridge, who were present.

There was an unprecedentedly large assemblage in Hyde Park last Saturday to witness the first meet for the season of the Coaching Club. The master of coaches, headed by Lord Hothfield, numbered twenty-two.—Eighteen coaches mustered on Monday at the opening meet of the Four-in-Hand Club in Hyde Park. The Prince of Wales occupied a seat on the Earl of Fife's coach; and the Princess of Wales and her daughters witnessed the start.

On the motion of Mr. Beard, the Court of Common Council recently requested the Bridge House Estates Committee to obtain from four eminent artists designs for statuary for the pedestals of Blackfriars Bridge, and to select therefrom four subjects for the approval of the Court. It was also agreed to vote 200 guineas for a marble bust of the late Lord Mayor, to be placed in the Guildhall. The Council likewise resolved to increase the salary of Sir John Monckton, the Town Clerk, from £2500 to £3000 per annum from Lady Day last.

Our military correspondent, Captain H. De H. Haig, R.E., Assistant Quartermaster-General on the Staff of General F. D. Middleton, C.B., commanding the militia forces of the Dominion of Canada, has sent us a Sketch of the first conflict with the half-breed and native Indian rebels, which took place on April 24, at Fish Creek, on the North Saskatchewan. He writes the following account of this engagement:—

"We began our day's march at seven o'clock in the morning. There being a number of prairie chickens about, a staff officer rode out ahead of the scouts, to shoot them undisturbed. He saw a heifer feeding in a cleared space, and called a scout up to capture it for fresh beef; while doing this, there was a tremendous amount of shouting, and a party of the enemy forty or fifty strong dashed out of the ravine in front of them. They fired at the staff officer, and at the scouts in front of them, who dismounted and held them in check, but had six men wounded and five horses shot in a few minutes. The staff officer escaped and informed the General, who formed the advanced guard and the troops in rear into a skirmishing line with supports, and advanced towards the ravine, driving the rebels out of the bluffs, one after another. The rebels now set the grass on fire on the right, but the effect was not serious. Our nine-pounders opened fire on a house and a haystack, behind which were a number of rebels, and set fire to both. Our left pushed the enemy back across the ravine, and after our advance, which at one time looked dangerous to our right, all the rebels began to make off, except those in the rifle-pits, the position of these being such that they could not get away without being seen and shot. Our guns fired thirty rounds of grape, shrapnel, and shells at them; and part of our force advanced through the ravine to drive them out, but, losing a third of their men in killed and wounded, had to return. Our half-breed interpreter, Howie, was now sent forward to parley. He went up to the crest of the hill above the rifle pits, and asked if Gabriel Dumont was present. The answer was 'Yes.' 'How many men have you?' 'Plenty,' said Gabriel. 'May I come down and speak to you?' asked Howie. An ominous silence followed this inquiry, and Howie thought it better not to try. Shortly after this, the troops from the left bank began to arrive, and were very keen to have a brush with the rebels. The General, however, decided that we had lost enough lives, and would allow no one to go into the ravine. Our loss of lives was ten; of these five were killed on the spot, and five have since died; we had altogether fifty-two killed and wounded, and among these were five officers, of whom one has died; the remainder are doing well. Both of the General's aides-de-camp were wounded, one having also two horses shot under him; while the General had a bullet through his cap. As we did not go over the battle-field for two days, the enemy carried off all their dead and wounded, except two dead Sioux Indians, who were so far advanced that they were afraid to come for them. Judging by the amount of blood, clothing, and arms that were left, their loss must have been very heavy; probably about sixty. Fifty-six of their ponies were killed and about twenty captured, besides forty head of cattle. All the houses in the half-breed settlement around here are deserted, but all their furniture, tools, and implements left standing. I have drawn a plan of the battle-field, showing the enemy's position at the beginning of the engagement, and our position at the end of it. More difficult country for a military advance it is hard to conceive. There are many coppices and bluffs, with not more than fifty or a hundred yards of level grass between them, and extending a vast distance. Each bluff affords shelter for hundreds of men, if they choose to hide there, and no amount of scouting can completely guard against ambushes, the favourite Indian method of warfare. Had the rebels chosen a better position, we might have had another Majuba Hill or Isandlwana, but owing to no fault of our own. However, we shall now move out of this country, and advance through open prairie by a longer but safer route. This experience shows some of our difficulties; we are 230 miles from a base, in a country affording scarcely any supplies, our waggon-train has therefore to be enormous, an average of one waggon to five men. Half our force, on the day of battle, was on the left bank of the Saskatchewan, while the fight was on the right bank. We rigged up a wire rope, to aid our one boat in crossing the 300 yards width of rapid stream; but when a quarter only of the waggons, or trams, as they call them here, were over, the rope broke. We intended to work all through the night of the battle; but this happened at midnight, and the waggons of the left column had to be left in a very dangerous and badly protected situation for a day and a night."

The latest news is that on May 31, last Sunday, General Middleton left Battleford for Fort Pitt, in steamers, with three regiments of infantry, two Gatling guns, and a body of cavalry, to reinforce General Strange. The latter, with 300 men, has been keeping at bay for three days Big Bear and 500 braves, who have been used to Indian warfare in the United States. Big Bear has a stronghold some twelve miles north-east of Fort Pitt, in a country abounding in deep ravines and wide streams, and covered with dense forest. Last week General Strange had a fight, which lasted four hours, with Big Bear's force, when the field-guns silenced the Indian fire; but fighting of the same nature was renewed the next day. Since the victory of General Middleton at Batouche, Gabriel Dumont has fled into the United States territory of Montana

In acknowledgment of the position and services of the late Lord Mayor, Mr. Alderman Nottage, Mr. Gladstone has intimated to Mrs. Nottage that the Queen has sanctioned her assumption of the title belonging to the wife of a knight.

At the request of the Queen and in commemoration of the visit of the Prince and Princess of Wales to Queenstown, the naval station at Haulbowline Island is henceforth to be known as the Royal Alexandra Yard.

The Royal Irish Military Three-Days' Tournament was held at the close of the week in Dublin, the event being under the patronage of the Queen. Cavalry, artillery, infantry, and Dublin police took part in the different competitions, there being 870 competitors. Lemon-cutting, tent-pegging, tilting, and driving competitions were included in the programme. There was a military encampment on the grounds.

Situated on the Norfolk coast in a most enviable position, Cromer has been since 1780 a fashionable resort for Norfolk families; and it is proposed to make its health-giving properties and romantic scenery available to a wider circle. The owners of the property are alive to the importance of further developing this beautiful place. On Wednesday next, the 10th inst., the first sale of freehold building plots is to take place; and the Great Eastern will on that day run a special train from London—leaving Liverpool-street station at nine in the morning, and returning the same evening—to suit the convenience of persons wishing to invest their money by building for themselves or others seaside residences. The town stands at a considerable height above the beach, and is sheltered on three sides by a towering amphitheatre of hills; and the sea view is nowhere to be excelled in extent and sublimity.

INDIANS ATTACKING A MAIL-COACH.

The North American Indians in the south-western territories of the United States, as well as those in the North-West Territory of Canada, have lately been giving much trouble. Only last week, it was reported that fresh outrages had been perpetrated by the Apaches of Arizona, where five white settlers had been killed by them, and they captured and plundered a "mail-stage," what used to be called in England a "mail-coach," between the towns of Eagle and Grafton. Incidents of this disagreeable kind have often occurred to travellers in that region; and two or three such stories are told by Mr. A. Hayes in his book on "New Colorado and the Santa Fè Trail," published four years ago. But the marauding parties of highwaymen were more frequently those white desperadoes, who are euphoniously called "road-agents," and who disguise their faces with black masks, each man being armed with two loaded revolvers. So recently as the 22nd ult., near the Yosemite valley in California, a stage-coach with a party of tourists was attacked and robbed by a gang of these ruffians; a large sum of money, besides the gold watches and ladies' jewellery, became their valuable booty. The wild Apache Indians of Arizona may be worse, as they will add torture, mutilation, and massacre to the practice of plunder; but the white men do not scruple to kill, if there be any attempt at resistance. The Indian band in Arizona, led by a captain named Geronimo, killed or wounded more than twenty persons in a week of the present year's campaign. A strong force of United States' troops has been sent in pursuit of them, and it is hoped that they will soon be captured or slain.

THE ULSTER LIBERAL CLUB, BELFAST.

The new building shown in one of our Illustrations is that which has been erected in the thriving and growing town of Belfast for the accommodation of the Ulster Liberal Club. It was to have been opened last week by Lord Hartington, but his Lordship was unfortunately taken ill while at Dublin, a day or two before, and his visit to Belfast has therefore been deferred till after the conclusion of the Parliamentary Session. We shall probably then have a better opportunity of describing the Ulster Liberal Club, or Reform Club, of which Lord Waveney is President, and which is likely to exert some influence over the efforts of the Liberal Party in the North of Ireland at the approaching General Election. A banquet which had been arranged for the reception of Lord Hartington took place on Thursday week at the Ulster Hall, Belfast, and was very well attended; Lord Waveney was in the chair, and the Earl of Howth, the Earl of Granard, the Attorney and Solicitor-General for Ireland, Sir E. P. Cowan, Mr. T. Dickson, M.P., Mr. Villiers Stuart, M.P., and other gentlemen of position in the Irish Liberal Party, were present.

St. Paul's Church, Woodford, Essex, was on Monday almost wholly destroyed by fire. The walls and the spire still stand, but it is expected that they will have to be replaced.

The Bishop of London presided on Thursday week at a meeting in support of the Women's Union of the Church of England Temperance Society, held at Grosvenor House, which was addressed by several speakers.

The annual congress of the General Association of Church School Managers and Teachers was held at Worcester, at the close of last week. There were about 350 delegates present. Earl Beauchamp, the President for the year, gave an address in which he enforced the advantage to teachers of a clear perception of religious truth.

The eighth annual special excursion on behalf of the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Station-Masters and Inspectors' Mutual Aid and Widows' Fund will take place on Monday, the 29th inst. Admission has been granted to the beautiful grounds of Devonshire Park, and the company has arranged for very cheap fares to Eastbourne.

THE NEW HEAD MASTER OF HARROW.

The important post of Head Master of Harrow School, made vacant by the appointment of the Rev. H. M. Butler to the Deanery of Gloucester, is filled by the election, a month ago, of the Rev. J. E. C. Welldon, who has for three years past been the successful Head Master of Dulwich College. Mr. James Edward Cowell Welldon had a distinguished career at Eton, and King's, Cambridge, of both which colleges he was a scholar. At Eton he won the Newcastle Scholarship; and at Cambridge, where he went up in 1873, he was Bell's Scholar in 1874 and Craven Scholar in 1876, and obtained in 1873 the Carus Greek Testament Prize, and in 1875 and 1876 Sir William Browne's medal for a Greek ode. He took his degree in 1877 as Senior Classic and Senior Chancellor's Medallist, and was elected, in 1880, a Fellow of his college. He was ordained in 1883. It will be remembered that Mr. Welldon was last year a candidate for the head mastership of Eton, on Dr. Hornby's resignation, and it was understood that the choice of the electors ultimately lay between him and Dr. Warre, the present Head Master.

The Portrait is from a photograph by Mr. Fradelle, Regent-street.

THE LATE MASTER OF CHARTERHOUSE.

The Rev. George Currey, D.D., Prebendary of St. Paul's Cathedral, and Master of the Charterhouse, who died on the last day of April, had been born and bred in that ancient and venerable institution. His father, the Rev. James Currey, was preacher of the Charterhouse seventy years ago. The late Master was born there in 1816, was educated at that school, and subsequently at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he took his degrees and won high University honours, and became a Fellow of the college. He was at one time a preacher at the Royal Chapel, Whitehall, and was Hulsean Lecturer to the University in 1851 and 1852. He was also a contributor to the "Speaker's Commentary on the Bible," and was held in much reputation for theological learning and general scholarship, as well as for his services in the government of the Charterhouse School.

The Portrait is from a photograph by Messrs. Boning and Small, 22, Baker-street.

BENEVOLENT OBJECTS.

The Rector and Churchwardens of St. Andrew, Holborn, have handed over to the vestry of St. Pancras the conveyance of the disused burial-ground in Gray's-inn-road, together with a faculty obtained from the Bishop of London for laying out the same as an open space.

An attractive bazaar was opened by the Lord Mayor in the large hall of the Cannon-street Hotel on Tuesday afternoon, on behalf of the Working Lads' Institute, Whitechapel. The institution provides boys employed in the east end of London with healthy sources of amusement and improvement during their leisure hours. It has been the means of benefiting about 1300 youths hitherto, and the new building will provide permanent accommodation for 1130 members. The estimated cost of the site and structure is £10,500, of which sum £5500 has been raised.

The Board of Trade have awarded a binocular glass to Captain Pierre Joseph Joonnekindt, of the Belle Hélène, of Dunkirk, in acknowledgment of his humanity and kindness to the shipwrecked crew of the British vessel Sophia, of Carnarvon, which was abandoned at sea on Aug. 24, 1884.—The Board of Trade have received through the Foreign Office a gold medal, which has been awarded by the President of the United States to Mr. Norman Bell, mate of the British ship Jessie Burrill, in recognition of his services in rescuing the crew of the American ship Jennie Morton on Feb. 9, 1882.—The board have also received through the Foreign Office a gold watch and chain, which have been awarded by the President of the United States to Captain Bartholomew Cremor, of the British ship Don Enrique, for his humane services in rescuing the crew of the American barque Aberdeen in November, 1881.

Last Saturday the inhabitants of Dumbarton received a free gift from Mr. Peter Denny, of Helensile, and Mr. John M'Millan, of College Park, of a public park, which has cost about £20,000. The day was observed as a general holiday.

Countess Cadogan yesterday week opened the grounds adjoining Christ Church, Battersea, which have been laid out by the Metropolitan Public Gardens Association.

Last Saturday the annual meeting and jubilee of the supporters and friends of the Princess Louise Home and National Society for the Protection of Young Girls was held at Exeter Hall. Lord Brabazon presided, supported by the Bishop of Bedford, the Hon. and Rev. E. Carr Glyn, and others. The prizes and rewards gained by the children of the homes during the past year were distributed by Lady Brabazon.

Major Gildea, in closing his work of supplying our sick and wounded with readable matter (now undertaken by the National Aid Society), wishes especially to thank the authorities at the Admiralty, the P. and O. Steamship Company, and Messrs. Dixon, of the Harrow-road Depository, for their valuable aid. During the last six months, over 20,000 books, 11,000 cigars, 40,000 cigarettes, besides jackets, smoking-caps, and games, have been forwarded to the Soudan. The books yet left over Major Gildea proposes sending in due course to the Gordon Memorial Hospital, at Port Said; and to hand over the balance from expenses, amounting to £31, in three equal amounts, to the Royal Cambridge Asylum, the Royal School for Daughters of Officers of the Army, and the Sailors' Orphan Girls' School and Home.

The fifty-eighth anniversary festival of the Licensed Victuallers' Asylum will be celebrated next Tuesday in the grand concert-room at the Crystal Palace.

A meeting will be held this (Saturday) afternoon at Grosvenor House in aid of the Hospital for Women, Soho-square—the Duke of Westminster in the chair, supported by several noblemen and gentlemen.

The Nottingham Corporation has decided, at a cost of £141,000, to buy a number of small unhealthy tenements in the centre of the town, and to erect upon the spot a hospital, at a further expenditure of £26,000.

EPPS'S COCOA. GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.
By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

STAMMERERS and STUTTERERS should read a little Book, written by Mr. B. Beasley, who CURED HIMSELF after suffering for more than thirty years.—Green Bank House, Hall Green, near Birmingham. Free for 13 stamps.

LIGHT-BROWN COD-LIVER OIL.
Incontestably proved by thirty years' medical experience to be
THE PUREST, THE MOST PALATABLE, THE MOST DIGESTIBLE, AND THE MOST EFFICACIOUS
IN CONSUMPTION, THROAT AFFECTIONS, AND DEBILITY OF ADULTS AND CHILDREN.
SELECT MEDICAL OPINIONS.
SIR HENRY MARSH, BART., M.D., Physician in Ordinary to the Queen in Ireland.
"I consider Dr. De Jongh's Light-Brown Cod-Liver Oil to be a very pure Oil, not likely to create disgust, and a therapeutic agent of great value."
DR. GRANVILLE, F.R.S., Author of "The Spas of Germany."
"Dr. De Jongh's Light-Brown Cod-Liver Oil does not cause the nausea and indigestion too often consequent on the administration of the Pale Oils."
DR. EDGAR SHEPPARD, Professor of Psychological Medicine, King's College.
"Dr. De Jongh's Light-Brown Cod-Liver Oil has the rare excellence of being well borne and assimilated by stomachs which reject the ordinary Oils."
SIR G. DUNCAN GIBB, BART. M.D., Physician to the Westminster Hospital.
"The value of Dr. De Jongh's Light-Brown Cod-Liver Oil as a therapeutic agent in a number of diseases, chiefly of an exhaustive character, has been admitted by the world of medicine."
DR. SINCLAIR COGHILL, Physician to the Hospital for Consumption, Ventnor.
"In Tubercular and the various forms of Strumous Disease, Dr. De Jongh's Oil possesses greater therapeutic efficacy than any other Cod-Liver Oil with which I am acquainted."
DR. HUNTER SEMPLE, Physician to the Hospital for Diseases of the Throat.
"I have found Dr. De Jongh's Light-Brown Cod-Liver Oil very useful in cases of Chronic Cough, and especially in Laryngeal Disease complicated with Consumption."

THE TIME OF ROSES.
DRAWN BY DAVIDSON KNOWLES.

Sole Proprietors of
(SEE BELOW.)

The increasing popularity of the Electropathic system of cure, consequent on the unqualified success attending the introduction of the numerous valuable patents of the eminent electrician, Mr. C. B. HARNESS, has resulted in such an hitherto carried on at 21, Holborn Viaduct, E.C., and 205, Regent-street, W., as to necessitate their

ENORMOUS

REMOVAL TO MORE COMMODIOUS PREMISES.

Accordingly, a new company has been formed, entitled,

"THE MEDICAL BATTERY COMPANY, LIMITED,"

for the purpose of taking up the work commenced by the Pall-Mall Electric Association, and still further developing and popularising the important science of Curative Electricity. The freehold of the spacious and handsome premises,

52, OXFORD-STREET, W.

(as per Engraving), has been secured, and no expense spared in fitting up in the most recherché manner the laboratories, consulting and reception rooms, with the most approved means of ensuring successful Electropathic treatment. The new company comprises a distinguished body of savants and capitalists, who have done much in the past to popularise Curative Electricity, and who personify that legitimate alliance between Science and Capital without which Science would languish for lack of the power of development which Capital provides.

As an earnest of the determination of the Medical Battery Company, Limited, to maintain their proud position as the only dispensers of bond-fide electro-curative appliances, it may be mentioned that no less a sum than £60,650 has been paid to Mr. C. B. HARNESS for the assignment of the various patents taken out or acquired by him during his distinguished scientific career, viz., No. 4881, No. 5573, and No. 9369 for Electric Belts; No. 3443 and No. 10,318, for Electric Constant Current Batteries and Electrodes, also for Electric Hair and Flesh Brushes; No. 1463 and No. 10,500, for Improved Inhalers, (comprising Dr. Carter Moffat's world-famed Ammoniaphone); besides many others of minor importance. A reference to the specifications of these patents will afford ample evidence of their value and importance; and, in addition, Mr. C. B. HARNESS' valuable services have been exclusively retained, in order that he may supervise the working of his inventions, and devote his unique inventive capacity alike to the interests of the Company and to the benefit of humanity. Enough has been said to indicate the lines on which The Medical Battery Company, Limited, base their plans for the future, and in conclusion it is only necessary to intimate that the handsome and commodious saloons at No. 52, Oxford-street, W., replete with the latest and most approved products of Electrical and Curative Science, are open to the inspection of all who are directly or indirectly interested, and the services of the Consulting Electrician, a gentleman of ripe experience and proved capacity, are at the disposal, free of charge, of all who desire information on the subject of Electro-Therapeutics. When a personal visit is impracticable, an "Advice Form," which may be had on application, should be filled up and returned, addressed to the Consulting Electrician, The Medical Battery Company, Limited, 52, Oxford-street, London, W., when sound and practical advice will be given, free of charge, on all subjects relating to health and the application of Curative Electricity. All communications will be treated as strictly private and confidential, and a copy of

HEALTH AND INTEGRAL STRENGTH IMPARTED AND IMPAIRED VITALITY RESTORED BY THE USE OF MILD CONTINUOUS GALVANIC CURRENTS, AS GIVEN BY MEANS OF THE ELECTROPATHIC BATTERY BELT

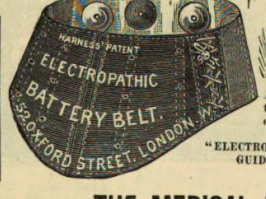
Proprietors, THE MEDICAL BATTERY COMPANY, LIMITED, Successors to THE PALL-MALL ELECTRIC ASSOCIATION.

Universally approved by the Leading Physicians as the Best, Safest, and Most Effectual Remedy for SCIATICA, LUMBAGO, RHEUMATISM, KIDNEY DERANGEMENT, CONSTIPATION, LOSS OF NERVE-POWER, DEFICIENT VITAL ENERGY, ASTHMA, BRONCHITIS, EPILEPSY, PARALYSIS, HYSTERIA, INDIGESTION, SLUGGISH LIVER, &c., and has cured some of the most obstinate and distressing cases, after all Remedies (so-called) have failed. The Electric Current it produces IS THE BEST TONIC IN THE WORLD.

TESTIMONIALS.

The attention of Ladies is directed to the following HIGHLY SATISFACTORY CASE, which is worthy of the closest investigation by all who suffer from these DISTRESSING IRREGULARITIES:—

From Mrs. J. HAWKEY, 16, Matilda-street, Barnsbury, London, N., April 21, 1883:—"I have received great benefit since wearing your ELECTROPATHIC BELT. Wearing it has improved my health every way. I fail to express in words the satisfaction it gives me. I have not felt so well for years as I have since wearing your belt. I was under the care of a physician for six months, suffering from the usual irregularities incidental to debility and bad circulation. I was despairing of ever feeling well again, when I was recommended your ELECTROPATHIC BELT. I cannot say enough in favour of it, but I shall be glad to communicate with any lady who would like further particulars of my case."



INTERNAL WEAKNESS.

From Miss S. HUDSON, Twyford, Derby, March 20, 1883:—"Seven months ago I purchased one of your ELECTROPATHIC BELTS. I need not describe the symptoms here, but refer you to my letter of June 17, 1884, No. 3164. I have worn the Belt every day since that date; it has been an untold comfort to me. I would not be without one, and cannot say enough in favour of your Belts; all I regret is they are not better known. I shall be glad to write to any lady who may wish to hear more particulars respecting my case, and shall certainly recommend your appliances to my friends."

INDIGESTION & KIDNEY DISORDER.

From Mr. H. VINCHAM, 34, Lugard-road, Peckham, S.E., Oct. 8, 1884:—"Before I came under your treatment I was a great sufferer with intense agony from Indigestion and Kidney Disorder, and had been to many doctors, but could get no relief. Before wearing your ELECTROPATHIC BELT I must say I had very little faith in it, but I am now completely cured."

IMPORTANT TO INVALIDS.

The Consulting Electrician of the Association, who has made the application of Electricity to the Cure of Disease a special study, attends daily for consultation (personally or by letter) at the PRIVATE CONSULTATION - ROOMS, 52, Oxford-street, London, W. An Experienced Lady is also in attendance.

Residents at a distance should send for a Private Advice Form, post-free.

TESTIMONIALS.

INDIGESTION AND LIVER COMPLAINT.

From Mr. THOMAS SMITH, 4, Hilbert-street, Hey, Lees, March 2?, 1883:—"I write to inform you of my recovery from ill-health. I may say I have been a suffering patient for many years, and during the last three have been in two hospitals, and the Manchester Infirmary, but never got the benefit I have found during the last few months I have been wearing your ELECTROPATHIC BELT—for I can assure you I have now no pain, am gaining weight, and getting stronger daily. You may make what use of this you think fit, and I shall not fail to make your appliances known to all my friends."

BRONCHITIS.

The Rev. E. AUBREY, Rose Cottage, 130, Ystrad-road, Ystrad, Pontypridd, writes Jan. 3, 1883:—"I have great pleasure in giving a favourable report of the Child's LUNG INVIGORATOR, received last October for a little relative of mine who suffered from Bronchitis. It has materially benefited her, and produced a wonderful change in her general health."

TESTIMONIALS.

INDIGESTION AND CHRONIC DIARRHŒA.

Mrs. C. HITCHCOCK, Brashfield, Bicester, Oxon, Jan. 5, 1883:—"I am thankful to tell you what great benefit I have derived from your ELECTROPATHIC BELT. I wish I had had one long before I did, and thus prevented so much suffering. I am a great deal better in every way; sometimes I felt nearly dead from exhaustion, and after suffering so many months from a fearfully weak digestion and a very sluggish liver, bringing on chronic diarrhœa until I was almost helpless. I had not worn your ELECTROPATHIC BELT a week before I began to feel stronger, my chest got gradually better, until I may say my digestion is almost perfect; my liver is much more active, and the diarrhœa gone long since. I was so ill and weak I even felt afraid to try your Belt, but it has strengthened me more than all the food I took before, because I could not digest it. I say again, I wish I had purchased one before, and remain, yours thankfully, C. HITCHCOCK."

RHEUMATIC GOUT.

Major PAKENHAM, Lonestone-house, Armagh, Feb. 2?, 1885, writes:—"I am very happy to inform you that the ELECTROPATHIC BELT which you supplied me with has completely cured me of the Rheumatic Gout, from which I had suffered such intense agony for nearly two years, and I now feel as strong and active as I have ever felt in my life. Several of my friends have, on my recommendation, tried these Belts, and in every case the result has been most satisfactory."

On receipt of Post-Office Order or Cheque for 21s., payable to C. B. HARNESS, Managing Director, THE MEDICAL BATTERY CO., LIMITED, 52, Oxford-street, London, W., will forward, post-free, to any part of the United Kingdom, the ELECTROPATHIC BELT, for a Lady or Gentleman, as represented in the accompanying woodcuts.

Send for Copies of the innumerable Testimonials.
150,000 of these celebrated Appliances are now in use.

Note New Address—THE MEDICAL BATTERY COMPANY, LIMITED, 52, OXFORD-STREET, LONDON, W.

THE TIME OF ROSES.

The months of June and July in England—it is just the opposite among our colonial kinsfolk in Australia—subdue the senses and the heart with the sweetness of the early summer. Year by year, if we are free from disease, free from painful anxieties, free from guilt, from "envy, hatred, and all uncharitableness," each of us, young and old, may for a few short weeks feel the kindness of Nature, and bask in her maternal smiles. It is then good simply to be alive on earth, though we have nothing, and can do nothing, and can be nothing but her children or her guests, enjoying the mere gift of life in a genial atmosphere, the sunlit sky above us, the verdure and flowers of a grateful soil around us. This is the time of many pleasant and beautiful things; and it is "the Time of Roses," which are things whose beauty not only pleases the eye, as their fragrance delights another sense, but is associated to the English mind with ideas of the most engaging aspect of human life. Our poets, the teachers of imaginative sentiment, have vied with one another in likening the rose to the bloom of youthful womanhood, which has its own season, at least from seventeen to five-and-twenty, and is more charming than any flower. Witness the young lady whom our Artist has drawn, carrying her basket of roses, holding one in her hand, and wearing another in her bosom—does she not render fair observance to the bounty of Nature in June or July? The earth, the sky, the sun, whatever else they combine to produce and cherish, foster no living creature so lovable as a human being of this age and sex. Must she grow old, have infirmities, perhaps defects or even deformities of old age, and finally succumb to death? Yes; for earthly life and its beauty is temporal and subject to gradual decay. The rose, indeed, has often been noted, in our climate, to lose its peculiar glory more suddenly than most other flowers; but it is not so with our English women, the physical constitution of their race is such as to preserve the charms of their youth much longer than do those of Southern and Eastern nations. Some English poets, it must be confessed, have pursued the topic of this comparison too far, insisting with questionable accuracy upon the speedy decline of female loveliness immediately after its full bloom, the limit of which varies in different specimens of the human flower. It is bold to contradict Shakspeare; but we must deny the truth of his assertion in this:—

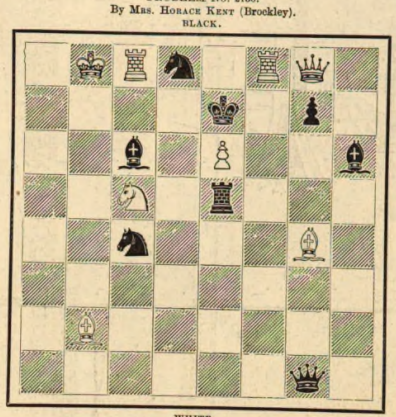
> For women are as roses; whose fair flower,
> Being once displayed, doth fall that very hour.
> And so they are; alas that they are so!
> To die even when they to perfection grow.

There is a great deal more to the same effect, about the fragile tenure of beauty, and even of life, in women as in roses, to be found in Shakspeare, Spenser, and many of the Elizabethan and of the seventeenth-century poets. We can only say that it is not so with the women of the nineteenth century in this country, some of whom contrive to shift their floral existence, metaphorically speaking, to the proper blossoms of a later season, and, after having been roses in July, make very agreeable chrysanthemums in the November of life. Moreover, we have invented conservatories and imported a great variety of exotics with which Shakspeare and the old poets were unacquainted. No woman, since Madame Rachel was discredited, can expect to be "beautiful for ever"; but it is possible, somehow or other, to be attractive all the year round. Everyone, married or single, for the sake of others, not for vanity, should study to keep her good looks as long as she can.

SKETCHING TROUBLES.

The landscape artist who visits a rustic neighbourhood, for the purpose of sketching its picturesque views, ought to proceed with circumspection, as he has to take care of his easel, his box of colours and brushes, his paper and unfinished work. An incautious movement or brief absence, leaving these essential articles without protection, especially near a farmyard, may be followed by such disastrous consequences as are displayed on our next page. The stupid and mischievous persons, very likely insane, who scratched many of the oil-paintings at the Royal Academy Exhibition one day last month, could find among geese and swine fellow-conspirators and culprits of congenial taste. We sympathise with our industrious friend, who set forth in the fair summer morning, laden with the instruments of his charming pursuit, and judiciously chose his point of view at the stile overlooking a characteristic bit of rural scenery. He sketches the field rising to a flowery hedge and clump of trees, with an orchard and some cottages, and the village spire rising behind them. Any lover of nature and of mankind, anyone who enjoys art and is a friend of artists, happening to stroll that way, at the hour when patient labour deserves and craves the modest refreshment of bread and cheese and beer, would have readily offered to stand on guard, while this interesting stranger to the country walked half a mile to the nearest public-house. The hissing and the grunting tribes of brute unsympathetic critics should have been driven from the spot; the meddlesome curiosity of little children, and the pilfering or annoying disposition of rude persons, should have been checked; the whole sketching apparatus, with the pleasing work begun in a promising moment, should have been kept perfectly safe. This little service, which we, for our own part, would have been glad to render to the humblest of the brethren of that gentle craft, whose skill reproduces the beauties of rural landscape to delight the eyes of dwellers in town, was unfortunately not to be had. The poor artist goes and returns; but what havoc is made in the meantime of all that he has been striving to create! Who could laugh at him, or even laugh with him, though with the light-heartedness of an elastic youthful mind, and with a lively perception of the ridiculous, he might himself turn disgust and disappointment to an occasion for manly mirth? Yet there is an extremely comical and humorous aspect of this sad affair; the congregation of silly animals, after shyly inspecting his incomplete picture, seem to have decided, like a Hanging Committee, or like a clique of connoisseur reporters in the Fine-Art Galleries, that it is not fit for public exhibition. They have zealously demolished it, there and then, as an offence against their profound judgment of art. He remembers, with a slight trace of remaining bitterness, but no longer with personal resentment, how it fared last season, and the year before, with some laboured work of his proffered in vain to certain authorities in London, or perhaps exhibited and scornfully contemned by some arbitrary and prejudiced writer for the Press. Alas, he thinks to himself, the pigs and the geese are not the only stupid folk in the world; others there are, who have equally belied my talent, and their ignorance, if not malice, would destroy my career, though it may not actually destroy my pictures!

At the anniversary festival of the Hospital for Diseases of the Chest, held at Cannon-street Hotel last week, subscriptions were announced to the amount of £1712.



A handsome piece of plate, subscribed for last year, has been presented to the Lord Mayor, Mr. Alderman Fowler, M.P., in recognition of the many services which he had rendered to the city of London. A necklace and a bracelet have been presented to the Lady Mayoress.

PROBLEM No. 2150.
By Mrs. Horace Kent (Brockley).
BLACK.

WHITE.
White to play, and mate in three moves.

A Game played at the Melbourne Chess Club between Mr. Blackburne and Mr. C. M. Fisher. The notes appended are by Mr. Blackburne.

WHITE (Mr. B.)	BLACK (Mr. F.)
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th
2. Kt to K B 3rd	Kt to Q B 3rd
3. B to B 4th	Kt to B 3rd
4. P to Q 3rd

This is considered by many persons to be too slow; however, it is quite as good as the orthodox move, 4. Kt to Kt 5th.

4.	B to B 4th
5. Castles

Somewhat premature. The modern method in this kind of opening is to develop the Queen's Knight, and delay castling as long as possible.

5.	P to Q 3rd
6. P to B 3rd	B to Kt 3rd

Fearing 7. P to Q 4th; but there was nothing to apprehend from that move, and it would have been better to "castle" at once.

7. Kt to R 3rd	Castles
8. Kt to B 2nd	B to K 3rd
9. B to Kt 3rd	Q to Q 2nd

It is the usual and better plan to bring the Queen's Knight round to K Kt 3rd, via K 2nd, before playing the Queen, so as to give her the choice of K 2nd or Q 2nd, according to circumstances.

10. Kt to K 3rd	Kt to K 2nd
11. B to B 2nd	P to B 3rd

Leaving the Q P weak. Perhaps 11. Kt to Kt 3rd would have been stronger.

13. Kt takes P

WHITE (Mr. B.)	BLACK (Mr. F.)
	So as to enable him to bring the Rooks to bear on the weak Pawn.
13.	P to Q 4th

This is immediately fatal, but Black has already a bad position.

14. P to K 5th	Kt to K 5th
15. P to B 3rd	Kt to Q B 4th
16. P to K B 4th

Driving the Kt back to R 3rd by 16. P to Q Kt 4th would have been better.

16.	Kt to K 5th
17. P to K Kt 4th	P to K B 4th
18. P takes P (en. pas.)	Kt takes K B P
19. P to B 6th	B to K B 2nd
20. P to Kt 5th	Kt to K 5th
21. K to R sq	B to B 2nd

The Kt's Pawn cannot be safely captured, because of 22. P to B 6th, and then, if 22. P takes P, 23. Kt to Kt 4th.

22. Q to Kt 4th	Q to Q 3rd
23. Q to Kt 2nd	B to K B 4th

Again he cannot take the Kt's Pawn, and for the reason given above.

25. Kt (K 3rd) to B 5th	Kt takes Kt
26. Kt takes Kt	Q to Q 2nd
27. P takes Kt	R takes P
28. Q to R 3rd	Q to K sq
29. B to Kt 5th	R to K 3rd
30. Kt to K 7th (ch),	and Black resigned.

THE BRITISH CHESS ASSOCIATION.

The programme of the first meeting of the revived British Chess Association was settled at a meeting of the council, held at Simpson's, on the 30th ult. There will be two playing tournaments—viz., 1. Open to all members of the B.C.A., bonâ fide domiciled in the British Empire. Entrance fee £1, to be applied to increasing the number or value of the prizes, which shall not be less than—First prize, £21; second prize, £10 10s.; third prize, £5 5s.; fourth prize, £3 3s.

2. Open to two representatives of each club or association federated with the B.C.A. Prize—a silver cup, to become the property of the successful club. Entrance fee, £1. The entries for these tourneys will be closed on the 12th inst.

3. Problem Tournament: For the best sets of three problems in two, three, and four moves respectively—First prize, £5 5s. (presented by J. O. S. Best Report (in any daily, weekly, or monthly periodical) of the Proceedings of the Association.—Prize, £3 3s., presented by W. Cubison, Esq.

A prize, consisting of the works of the Poet Laureate, Lord Tennyson, with his Lordship's autograph inscription will be presented for competition by two representative members of the professions, the Church, Law, Medicine, Army, Navy, and Literature.

The meetings will be held in rooms specially provided by "Simpson, Limited," and will extend over the two weeks beginning the 15th and ending the 27th of June.

A match between the Rev. A. B. Skipworth and Mr. H. E. Bird was begun at the St. George's Chess Club on the 21st ult. The first game was won by Mr. Skipworth; and he scored one more in the course of the match, which was eventually won by Mr. Bird by five games to two.

A return-match, Bristol and Clifton against Bath and District, was played at Bath on the 20th ult. There were thirteen competitors a side, and the play resulted in a decisive victory for the champions of "Avon's rolling pride," with a score of sixteen games to eight for Bristol.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated July 25, 1872), with three codicils (dated July 24, 1874; March 5, 1881; and Nov. 22, 1882), of Mr. John Eden, late of Beamish Park, Durham, and of No. 15, Wilton-crescent, Belgrave-square, who died on April 4 last, was proved on the 19th ult. by the Rev. Arthur Duncombe Shafto and the Rev. Edward Abercrombie Wilkinson, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £307,000. The testator bequeaths £10,000 to the Durham Infirmary; £10,000, upon trust, to apply the income in payment of the repairs and of the superintendent of the almshouses erected by him at Beamish, and the remainder of the income to be divided among the almspeople therein; £5000 each to the Northern Counties Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, Newcastle-on-Tyne, and the Royal Albert Asylum for Idiots, Lancaster; £2000 to the Cancer Hospital, Brompton; £1000 to the Royal Victoria Asylum for the Blind, Newcastle-on-Tyne; £500 to the Ryde Infirmary; £200 each to the Gateshead Infirmary and the Ramsgate Dispensary; £200 to be distributed by the Incumbent among the poor inhabitants of Tanfield, Durham; his wines, consumable stores, live and dead dairy and farming stock, and £2000, to his brother, Edward Methold; £6000 to his said brother's wife; the household furniture and effects at Beamish Park to go as heirlooms with the estate, under the settlement thereof; and considerable other legacies. The residue of his real and personal estate he leaves to his two executors for their own use absolutely.

The will (dated May 15, 1876) of Mr. John Lucas Walker, formerly of Albany Court-yard, but late of 71, Oxford-terrace, Hyde Park, who died on Dec. 12 last, was proved on the 19th ult. by Thornton Roger Trevelyan, the sole executer, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £297,000. The testator bequeaths numerous legacies, including £10,000 to Mr. R. E. Webster, Q.C., to be spent as he shall think best in the promotion, without regard to sect or party, of scientific and literary research, or either of those objects, in Cambridge or in the metropolis, or in both places; £10,000 to the National Gallery, to be spent in the purchase of a picture or pictures for the national collection, the said picture or pictures to be labelled with the donor's name; and £100 each to the Royal Humane Society, the Society for the Organisation of Charitable Relief and the Repression of Mendicity, and the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. All the legacies are directed to be paid free of duty. The residue of his real and personal estate is to be divided between the persons who would be entitled to his personal estate under the Statute of Distribution if he had died intestate.

The will (dated Feb. 18, 1874), with four codicils (dated Feb. 22, 1882; March 28 and Aug. 29, 1883; and Oct. 30, 1884), of Mr. William Muggeridge, late of Knightons Dunsfold, Surrey, and of Reed's Rest, Clifton Hill, Brighton, who died on Feb. 10 last, was proved on the 5th ult. by Thomas Benjamin Muggeridge, the brother, and Frederick Sharp and Edward Henry Sharp, the nephews, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £74,000. The testator leaves to his wife, Mrs. Sarah Rose Muggeridge, £1000, all the household furniture and effects at his principal residence, an annuity of £100, and a contingent further annuity, in addition to the provision made for her on their marriage; to his daughter, Mrs. Helen Adams, his freehold house Reed's Rest, with the furniture and effects, and an annuity of £500; to his nephew Edward Henry Sharp £10,000; an annuity to his sister, Mrs. Willeter, and legacies to her children, and also to his executors, Mr. T. B. Muggeridge and Mr. F. Sharp. The residue of his real and personal estate is to be held, upon trust, to accumulate for a period, then to pay the income to his said daughter, for life, and at her death for his grandchildren, May Helen Adams, George Muggeridge Adams, and Harold William Adams, in equal shares.

The will and codicil (both dated Dec. 16, 1880) of Mr. Charles Stephenson, late of No. 67, St. George's-square, Pimlico, surveyor, who died on Feb. 11 last, were proved on the 2nd ult. by Mrs. Mary Ann Stephenson, the widow, and Harry Jones, the acting executors, the value of the personal estate exceeding £38,000. The testator bequeaths legacies to his wife, children, grandchildren, and brother; and he leaves all his real estate (if any) and the residue of the personalty, upon trust, to pay the annual produce to his wife, for life, and then to transfer the same equally between all his children.

The will (dated Jan. 22, 1885) of Mr. Samuel Ashton, late of Telham, Battle, Sussex, who died on Feb. 19 last, at Colombo, Ceylon, was proved on April 25 by Charles Andrew and James Crofts Ingram, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £32,000. The testator makes bequests to his brother-in-law, Colonel John Ashton Papillon, R.E., and to his sisters-in-law, Mary Graham Papillon, Catherine Papillon, and Florence Papillon; and leaves the residue of his real and personal estate to fourteen nephews and nieces.

The will (dated July 5, 1878) of Mr. James Cooper Hall, late of Whitby, who died on Oct. 11 last, has been proved by William Henry Marwood and John Henry Corner, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £15,000. The testator bequeaths his furniture and household effects to Jane McKenzie, for life, and then to the Evangelisation Society, Surrey-street, Strand, free of duty; £500 to the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, or the person who shall be the director, at the time the legacy becomes payable, of the Baptist Pastors' College in connection with the Metropolitan Tabernacle; £500 to George Müller, or the director, at the time the legacy becomes payable, of the New Orphan Houses, Ashley Down, Bristol; £500 each to the British and Foreign Bible Society, the Religious Tract Society, and the London City Mission; £100 to the said Evangelisation Society; and other legacies. The residue of his real and personal estate he leaves, upon trust, for his nieces, Dorothy Ann Barnes and Edith Dickson, and their children.

The will (dated Oct. 23, 1883), with a codicil (dated Nov 8 following), of Miss Mary Ann Blundell, late of No. 184, Alexandra-road, St. John's-wood, who died on the 14 ult., was proved on April 29 by James Frederick Robinseu, the sole executor. The testatrix bequeaths £200 each to the British and Foreign Bible Society and the Church Missionary Society; £100 each to the London City Mission, the Seaside Home in connection with the London City Mission, the Church Pastoral Aid Society, the British Home for Incurables, Clapham-rise; the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews; and the Clergy Orphan Corporation, 63, Lincoins-inn-fields; and £200 to the Vicar and Churchwardens of St. Mary's, Kilburn, to be applied as they think best for the use and benefit of the charitable and benevolent institutions connected with the church and district, or any of them.

The Scotch Confirmation, under seal of the Commissariot of Edinburgh, of the trust disposition and settlement (dated July 4, 1879) of Captain William Hobson Moubray, R.N., of Otterston and Cockairnie, county Fife, and of No. 7, Belgrave-crescent, Edinburgh, who died on Feb. 7 last, granted to Captain William Henry Hallswell Carew Moubray, Lieutenant Beauchamp St. John Moubray, R.N., and Arthur Moubray, the sons, William Babington and Thomas Paterson, the executors nominate, has been resealed in London, the personal estate in England and Scotland exceeding £46,000.

THE PARIS SALON.

SECOND NOTICE.

Although Antonio Mercie, who is famous also as a sculptor, may cite the interests of science as a warranty for his work, the subject he has chosen and painted so powerfully is only on that ground less repulsive than those mentioned in our last notice. It represents Michael Angelo, a dead subject before him, eagerly copying, by the light of a spluttering candle, the exposed muscles of a dissected arm, which a piece of cord retains in an uplifted position.

Léon Bonnat, for his "Martyrdom of St. Denis," may plead the commands of the Church; and, considering that he had to struggle against the comical on one side and the repulsive on the other, it is astonishing the amount of religious exaltation he has managed to throw into his subject. The decapitated St. Denis is seen, to the horror of the Pagan priest and the executioner, round whom lie the trunks of butchered martyrs, quietly stooping to pick up his own head. A star-like effulgence covers the shorn neck, and a halo glorifies the trunkless head, while, above, an angel holds over the saint a palm-branch and a martyr's crown. Of all the decorated panels in the Panthéon, there is little doubt this will be the one most edifying. There are several other pictures whose subjects would be very questionable in English eyes.

Turning to themes of more immediate interest and more in accordance with Western ideas of civilisation, we would name three life-sized groups which for their high art merits have deservedly attracted much attention. First, there is the meeting in the Salon of the "Jury of Painters," who give their votes for the pictures they approve by an excited uplifting of sticks and umbrellas. The thirty-three portraits include all the most famous painters in France. The author is Henry Gervex. Then there is the "First Meeting of the Municipal Council of Paris Round the Table in the New Hôtel de Ville," by Jobbé-Duval; and lastly, there is a no less forcible group, by Fantin-Latour, of gentlemen gathered around a pianoforte-player.

Among the sea-pieces which have attracted our attention we would record our special admiration for the fleet of returning shrimpers taking the harbour of Honfleur under a brisk wind and a lowering sky, with some rocks in the right foreground, by Courant; for the long wave with the swirl of level water preceding it, all in excellent drawing by Alexander Harrison, of Philadelphia; and, especially, for the truly dramatic sea-piece by George Haquette, showing a fisherman's wife and little girl standing on a storm-beaten jetty, watching an approaching vessel. The mother holds up her arms in an agony of terror and suspense, for at that moment a mighty sea has struck the craft.

We would include also in this list Hagborg's "Fisherman's Daughter" wheeling a barrow across the wet sand, Lepic's "Stand by to Luff!" Clay's "Vessels Under a Morning Effect," Vernier's fishermen pulling in a boat on the top of the tide, and Morlon's "Life-Boat" bringing through a tempestuous sea some shipwrecked mariners. Mesdag's "Boats Under an Evening Effect" is finely studied.

Sargent, the American artist, born at Florence, fully maintains his high reputation. His portraits of the three sisters, all in one canvas, is very powerful; so also is his portrait of "Madame V——," though in a less degree, perhaps. Mr. Whistler is much more appreciated in Paris than he is in London. His portrait of "Theodore Duret," with a lady's pink cloak over his left arm and carrying his hat in his right hand, is wonderfully simple and natural in attitude; and his "Lady Archibald Campbell," in black dress and black fur tippet, who turns her handsome face towards us as she walks away, is no less telling, and occupies a conspicuous place on the line. The portrait of "Miss H——," by William Dannat, of New York, is a good example of the Whistler school.

Léon Comerre has two female portraits in blue. His portrait of the lovely "Madame F. D." is in dark blue; that of "Mdlle. C. F.", at the other end of the room, each being in the place of honour, is in light blue, and strikes us as fuller of knowledge and the better of the two. The left arm of the former is rather stiff and lacks modelling; but they are both of them remarkably clever. Carolus-Duran has two admirable lady portraits in Room 10. William Stott, of Oldham, has his father and mother on one canvas most admirably painted.

J. L. Stewart, of Philadelphia, sends a "Hunt Ball," which has attracted no small share of the attention of artists. The white and pale-pink and lavender dresses of the ladies contrast well with the strong red of the gentlemen's coats, their black breeches and stockings and white waistcoats. There is only one black coat in the whole composition, and its wearer sits chatting with a comely lady in the foreground. It is surprising how cleverly the artist brings the whole into harmony by the judicious treatment of the curtained doors and mirrors of the background. Another eminent American, Julian Story, is well represented by the picture of an "Odalisque."

A picture very much affected by artists fills a very large canvas in the first Salon Carré. It represents a vast grey stone-yard with masons and labourers all busy at work. A grey horse is in the centre of the picture, and a lofty stage with a moving trolly runs across the canvas, while the Seine flows in the background. The author is A. P. Roll, and his method recalls that of the late lamented Bastien Lepage, without for a moment suggesting anything like imitation. A similar subject is handled in a similar manner by Roger Jourdain. It represents two men in a lime quarry near Villerville. The one is seated on a barrow, and the other stands on the edge of the white rock looking seawards. The painting of this is perhaps closer and firmer than that of Roll, who purposely affects a looser and slighter handling.

Opposite the great stone-yard of the latter hangs a fine historical work by Casanova Y. Estorach, of Tortosa, representing "The Last Moments of Philip the Second." The haggard face of the cruel and wily fanatic is as white as his pillow, and a courtier kneeling in white, and a lady standing by the Monarch's bedside weeping, also attired in white, give the focussing keynote to a scheme of colour which affects the eye pleasurably and lightens up what would otherwise be a sombre enough subject. On one side of this picture hangs a lady's full-length portrait by Adolph Yvon, in white-flowered creamy satin kirtle and claret-coloured dress trimmed with white lace. This is the painter who painted for the Emperor the battle-pieces at Versailles of the Crimea and Italy. The pendant to this is a lady in black figured dress, sitting on a sofa of dark yellow and red, in the act of buttoning her glove. The artist of this remarkably fine portrait is an Italian named V. M. Corcos; and, between these portraits of two elegant ladies, lies her length on the grass a peasant girl shading her eyes from the sun. The painter is A. Durst.

In the Salon Carré, to the extreme left, is displayed the largest canvas in the exhibition, showing a Moorish conqueror on horseback surveying the spoils of victory. The gigantic negro in the foreground, bestriding a dead woman and holding aloft in his arms a live one, gives dramatic intensity to G. Clairin's gorgeous creation. This same quality of intensity is conspicuous in the hurrying down to the water-side of the body of the murdered "Chilperic," by E. V. Luminais. P. A. P. Lehoux has rendered with similar force the carrying away of a man "After the Combat." Harry Thompson's "Shepherd outside the Fortifications of Paris" minding his sheep has a soothing effect after contemplating these scenes of blood.

J. F. R.

KALMUCKS OF THE RUSSIAN EMPIRE.

The whole population of the Russian Empire is computed to exceed ninety millions, of whom ten millions are in Asia, but some fragments of Asiatic races are to be found in the south-eastern part of European Russia. That portion of the country was formerly overrun by the Tartars, of whom there are several different nations. The Kirghese Tartars, dwelling in the country east of the Caspian, and spreading around the Sea of Aral and on the north bank of the Syr Daria, or Jaxartes, are a pastoral folk, of mixed Turkish and Mongolian race, professing the Mohammedan religion. The Kalmucks are purely Mongolian, and are mostly adherents of the Buddhist creed; their principal abode is to the south-east of Lake Balkash, on the river Ili, and on the western slopes of the mountains bounding Chinese Turkestan. But some of them, more than a hundred years ago, found their way along the north coast of the Caspian and across the Volga, where they still inhabit a corner of the European territory, preserving their language and their peculiar habits. They freely pitch their kibitkas or tents on the steppe, and keep their herds of cattle, flocks of sheep, horses and asses, paying a yearly rent or tribute to the Russian Government. The total number of these people is only a few thousand; but they are the remnant of a once powerful, conquering nation, which contested the dominion of Western Central Asia with the Turkish Moslems during the ages preceding Russian conquest. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the Kalmuck kingdom of Sungaria, beyond Lake Balkash and up the Irtish, towards the Altai mountains, was really formidable; and Peter the Great repeatedly sent military expeditions to check its aggressions, leading to the formation of the Russian province of Semipalatinsk. The north-eastern part of Turkestan was at this time subject to Kalmuck rule; but, in the middle of the last century, the Sungarian Kingdom was overthrown by the power of China, and great part of its population was dispersed, some flying westward, across the Kirghese country, to seek refuge in Russia. An account of these people, as well as of the Kirgheses, and of the different Turkish nations, will be found in "Russian Central Asia," by the Rev. Dr. Henry Lansdell, just published by Messrs. Sampson Low and Co.

The Queen has contributed a special donation of £50 towards the Triennial Festival Fund being raised at Charing-cross Hospital for providing accident wards, a children's ward, and other improvements.

The twenty-fifth annual meeting—known as the Northern Wimbledon—of the Yorkshire Rifle Association, was held last week at Sowthorpe Common, near York. There were ten competitions; nearly £620 was offered in 368 prizes. For the first time the Volunteers used the Martini-Henry rifle, and a marked improvement in the scoring as compared with last year was noticeable.

An important meeting was held at the Townhall, Folkestone, on Tuesday week—presided over by the Mayor—for the purpose of furthering the promotion of a National Art-Treasures Exhibition, to be held in Folkestone next year. A resolution was passed unanimously:—"That a National Art-treasures Exhibition should be held in Folkestone next May till the following October." Guarantees to a very large amount were announced. Mr. Felix Joseph has consented to act as honorary director.

NEW BOOKS.

The trumpet of many thinkers in the present day has an uncertain sound, and is on that account perhaps listened to the more eagerly. In Quest, by Thomas Sinclair (Trübner and Co.), a variety of topics, social, theological, and literary, are alluded to or discussed, sometimes with much ability, often with considerable daring and a disregard of public opinion. The reader who likes to be startled may have his taste gratified in this volume. The writer is often highly suggestive, and more frequently paradoxical. We may agree with him that "the publication of a true book hot from the soul is a far greater event for man than the taking of the greatest city"; but when he says that "Browning has long since forgotten what poetry is, if he ever knew"; that "Swinburne is a manufactured metrist, not an original one"; that Goethe's "Faust" "is too pantomimic, too burlesque, too ridiculous for the height of the high argument that it grew to at last"; and that, of the greater souls, there was never a blinder searcher after truth than he; and when he writes that there is a hardness in the best work of Shakspeare and Milton "which only the strongest readers can completely musicalise," the reader is apt to wish that Mr. Sinclair would give some reasons for these eccentric judgments. There are many more of such eccentricities in the volume for those who care to seek them. Thus we read—"It would not perhaps be far from truth to say that all martyrdoms, if not mistakes, which they possibly may be, are the undoubted signs of limitation in the natures of those martyred. Dying for truth is rhetorical nonsense." In spite of much effort to say profound things, rhetorical nonsense is a fault from which Mr. Sinclair is by no means free himself. There is more cant than meaning in such phrases as "processional lyric regions," "a purely processional poet," and in the remark that Milton, in his youth, "was a fine example of the musical, the processional, and the incipient epical." And is the English language so limited that the writer is forced to employ such words as "animalic" and "musicalise"?

The publication of such a work as Mr. J. E. Brown's Forest Flora of South Australia (Adelaide, S.A.), of which Part V. has just reached us, is sufficient evidence that the authorities are not neglectful of one of the most hopeful sources of revenue in that colony. The author, who holds the post of Conservator of Forests for the Government of South Australia, appears to be going carefully through the natural products of the South Australian soil, not only with the object of framing a scientific catalogue for the use of present and future students of botany, but with the more popular aim of making known the conditions under which the trees were originally found; the uses to which their fruits, bark, or wood may be applied; and of laying the foundation of a comparative dictionary of the local names by which the trees are now recognised. For example, the Poison-Berry Tree (the only Pittosporum of South Australia) is already known locally, in the far north of the colony, as the "Butter-Bush Tree"; on Yorke's Peninsula as the "Willow Tree"; and in the south as the "Native Willow," and as the "Poison-Berry Tree." Which of these popular names will survive, it is impossible to foretell; but future students of Australian folk-lore will find in Mr. Brown's "Forest Flora" help for whatever theories they may be anxious to set afloat. From an artistic point of view, we cannot speak too highly of the very excellent illustrations with which this publication is enriched; and we must congratulate our Australian relations on the degree of perfection to which they have brought colour-printing. In each case, in addition to a full-page coloured drawing of a branchlet of the tree, showing both fruit and flowers, longitudinal sections are given (magnified when necessary) of the flower, the fruit, the seed, the branch, and of the trunk, the last indicating the grain of the wood, and suggesting its applicability to trade purposes.

In the present day, history, like literature, is frequently brought before the public in brief "Studies," to be read without labour in a leisure hour. Mr. Alexander Charles Ewald, having written such essays for magazines, has now published them in a volume, entitled Studies Re-studied: Historical Sketches from Original Sources (Chatto and Windus). If the sources are new, the facts are, in many cases, familiar; but Mr. Ewald knows how to use his pen, and the reader will find much in the varied contents of the volume that is entertaining and suggestive. It would have been difficult to say anything new about a book so familiar as "Lord Hervey's Memoirs," but Mr. Ewald has contrived to make an attractive paper from it which will be acceptable to readers into dislike trouble. Bright, too, and picturesque is the description of "The Field of the Cloth of Gold"; and if the writer cannot be said to cover new ground in the account of Queen Elizabeth's rejected suitors, of "The Bloody Assizes," and of "The Rye House Plot," he has used his materials for these sketches like a skilful literary craftsman. Perhaps the first essay in the books is the weightiest. "A Bas les Juifs!" is a masterly statement of the persecutions of the Jews in England. It is strange to remember that, as recently as 1832, no Jew was allowed to open a shop in London, since that was a privilege only to be enjoyed by a freeman, and that even a converted Jew was not admitted to the freedom of the city until 1825. "Even now," Mr. Ewald writes, "though Jews have seated themselves in numbers upon the green benches of the House of Commons, no Jew by religion has ever sat as legislator upon the red benches of the House of Lords."

IS

"The favourite and most fashionable material of the day."

THE WEAR OF EVERY YARD IS GUARANTEED

by the Manufacturer, and every yard of the genuine bears the name

"LOUIS."

Patterns and Prices post-free from nearly all Drapers throughout the kingdom.

The strictest examiner may try every test of touch and sight without discovering that these are other than the Genoa Velvets which they so closely resemble, while the peculiar arrangements resulting in the fast woven pile enable them to stand interminable and rough wear, which would ruin real velvets at four times the price. For Costumes and Trimmings it is unequalled, and, in fact, for all purposes in which Silk Velvet may be used we specially recommend the "LOUIS" VELVETEEN.

Every yard of the genuine bears the name "LOUIS."

CAUTION.—To guard against fraudulent imitations, see that each Label bears the name of "WILCOX & CO., 239, Oxford-st., London."

There are three kinds, distinguished by a YELLOW, GREEN, and RED SILK THREAD, attached to the Bottles. That with the YELLOW stops instantly the most violent Toothache. That with the GREEN is invaluable for persons who suffer periodically from Toothache or Sensitiveness of the Teeth and Gums; for, by using a few drops in a little water to rinse the mouth daily, they will not only never suffer again, but will preserve their teeth sound and white. That with the Red is for Children's use. Green Thread, 4s.; Yellow Thread, 2s. 9d.; Red Thread, 2s.; Orange Tooth-Paste, for removing Tartar, 4s. 6d.; Suez Tooth-Brushes, 1s. 6d. FRY'S PURE COCOA.

FRY'S COCOA EXTRACT.

GUARANTEED PURE.

This absolutely genuine, pure, and delicious Cocoa, which consists of choice Cocoa only, from which the superfluous oil has been extracted, is strongly recommended to all who appreciate the full flavour and fine aroma of Cocoa.

"If properly prepared, there is no nicer or more wholesome preparation of Cocoa."—Dr. Hassall.
"Pure Cocoa, from which a portion of its oily ingredients has been extracted."—Chas. A. Cameron, Analyst for Dublin.
"It is strictly pure, and well manufactured in every way."—W. W. Stoddart, F.I.C., F.C.S., Analyst for Bristol.

FRY'S CARACAS COCOA.

A DELICIOUS ARTICLE.

Prepared with the celebrated Cocoa of Caracas, combined with other choice descriptions.

"A most delicious and valuable article."—Standard.

A NOVELTY.

This Chocolate possesses a peculiarly fine and delicate flavour, somewhat different from that of Chocolate prepared from Cocoa grown in the Western Hemisphere; and it will, we believe, be appreciated by many connoisseurs.

"It has a peculiarly delicious flavour, either in the cup or as a sweetmeat."—Medical Press.

FRY'S MALTED COCOA.

A combination of Fry's Pure Cocoa Extract with Allen and Hanburys' Concentrated Extract of Malt.

"This is an excellent preparation of Cocoa and Malt Extract. Its dietetic and digestive value is beyond all dispute, and it is very agreeable in flavour."—Lancet.

"The combination of Allen and Hanburys' Extract of Malt with Fry's Cocoa Extract meets the requisite indications of digestibility."—British Medical Journal.

MAJOR-GENERAL F. D. MIDDLETON, C.B.,
COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF OF THE COLONIAL MILITIA OF CANADA.

A GREAT CATCH ON THE NILE.

OUR NOTE-BOOK

Those, and they were many, who anticipated a poor yachting season, need not have any fears now. For a long time, in fact during the whole of the winter, orders for building were few and far between, several of the best-known cracks were reported as either to be relegated to cruising or not to be commissioned at all. But whether owing to the fine weather, or the chances of peace, last week threw quite a different light on the scene. Two of our smartest vessels will under winter spars and try-sails cross the Atlantic, the while their racing tackle precedes them by steamer, in a plucky endeavour to wrest back the cup which the America deprived us of in 1851. Schooners are certainly down in the world; but the schooner as a racing vessel has for a long time been no favourite with yachtsmen. The 40's look well, as do the 20 s, and there are stories told about new little craft which are determined to clip the Buttercup's wings. So, on the whole, what was a dark outlook is now bright and pleasant, and when Goodwood comes round again, the following week will behold as many of the dainty white-winged clippers as it has seen in former years.

Though Mr. Brodrick-Cloete does not bet, it is said that, after the close finish for the Derby, he offered to match Paradox against Melton and stake eight thousand guineas to six thousand. This was a good sportsman-like offer of the old-fashioned sort, as when, in 1719, Lord Grosvenor matched his daughter of Dux and Curiosity (dam of the celebrated sire Buzzard, well named Misfortune after she had lost the match) against Lord Abingdon's Cardinal York, over the Beacon Course, for 1000 gs., and 6000 gs. to 3000 gs. "bye." But there is no need to wonder if the offer was not accepted; it is not the fashion of the day to make matches for such a sum, and it would be a pity, perhaps, if the fashion were revived.

How good a thing it is to be a successful jockey may be inferred from the fact that up to the end of the Epsom meeting last week, at the rate officially recognised by the Jockey Club (but multiplied in practice by five, ten, twenty, up to a hundred) of five guineas for a "winning mount," and three for a losing (to say nothing of fees for "trials"), the amounts won in little more than two months by the most fortunate jockeys would have been as follows:—By Mr. F. Archer, 770 gs.; by Mr. C. Wood, 626 gs.; by Mr. A. Giles, 420 gs.; by Mr. J. Watts, 394 gs.; by Mr. G. Barrett, 671 gs.; by Mr. F. Barrett, 416 gs. This is almost enough to made a Vanderbilt's or a Westminster's mouth water; but on the other hand, it must be remembered that a jockey's mouth must very often do no more than water, and that of him, if of anybody, it may be said: "The youth who trains to ride or run a race, must bear privations with unruffled face." You may meet at the Turkish bath a grown man who is evidently rather undergoing a process than enjoying a relaxation, and who is carried out fainting; and you should not be surprised to learn that "That is Tela (or Sagittarius) the jockey, 'getting down to his weight.'"

When, in old age and blindness, Milton needed exercise, he was accustomed to take it in a kind of swing. Had he lived in our day, he would probably have been advised to try the automatic exercising stool, or the automatic horse-exercising machine. Sitting on the stool, the body, we are told, can be vibrated up and down, with a gentle bumping action; seated on the horse, or rather saddle, with its four padded buffers corresponding to the four feet of a horse, the rider can cause the movement to be as easy or as violent as he pleases. A horse-machine that can be kept in a bed-room has obvious advantages over a horse that must be kept and fed in a stable. The best trained horse may rear, may shy, may run away, or may stumble. "How can you ask if I keep a dog," said the poet Gray; "an animal that might go mad and kill me?" But horses cause far more deaths than dogs, and yet rash people will persist in keeping them: and, in order to preserve health, are daring enough to risk life. A horse-machine will save both purse and bones. Instead of a glorious gallop over turf, with its attendant dangers, a rider can now sit at home at ease, and in imagination perform the most daring feats of horsemanship. Truly a brave pastime! and one that, if its inventor's wishes are fulfilled, may make a desert of Rotten-row.

Lieutenant Austin, who behaved so pluckily in the defence of Baker's zereba, came home last week from Souakim, on board the Tyne, with his wound still unhealed, but bringing with him the standard for which he has suffered so much. It may be remembered that he dashed out from the main body of the troops and presented a revolver at the head of an Arab standard-bearer, who threw his spear at the same moment as the English officer fired. The savage fell dead, but his weapon tore a deep jagged gash from Lieutenant Austin's wrist to his elbow; in spite of which he advanced to his mark, and returned to his commander carrying the captured standard.

Cricket extraordinary may be looked for—nay, has already been exhibited—this year; for, not to mention any other instance, there were 330 runs scored, in the match between M.C.C. and Yorkshire, on the 2nd inst., by Gunn and Barnes together, before they were separated. This is a "long firm" partnership with a vengeance; in fact, "the longest on record (for a first-class match) by six." Altogether, moreover, there was "a full day's cricket, in which 437 runs were scored," and yet "only three wickets fell." We may expect to see Mr. Jingle's famous feat, with the "bat in blisters," reduced to the common-place before the season is over.

American women are very patriotic, and there is an assemblage of thirteen of them now sitting at Mount Vernon, once the abode of General Washington. One of them, a delegate from South Carolina, has just had the old dining-room carefully restored with funds contributed in that State; another, who comes from Louisiana, has presented to the association a piece of the point lace which the father of his country wore on his sleeves when sitting for his portrait to Gilbert Stuart; and the bereaved husband of the lady who until her recent death represented Alabama hung up in the hall the sword that General Washington wore and probably used at Braddock's defeat. Mount Vernon has become a kind of national museum, a shrine to the memory of the national hero.

One day last month the New York Herald kept its fiftieth birthday, and among other curious items of information given to the public on that occasion was that the now world-renowned paper was first published in a cellar, and the furniture of that queer editorial office consisted only of a broken chair and a board laid across an empty barrel to form some sort of substitute for a desk. The population of New York at that date was 270,000, and it now contains 1,400,000 souls. This is something like growth.

Because a few fatuous worshippers have written of the poet Shelley as wellnigh immaculate, it seems hard that people who believe nothing of the kind should be asked to read two thick volumes of fault-finding and re-crimination. This, however, is the demand made on us by the publication of "The Real Shelley." Mr. Jeaffreson's indictment is not confined to the poet, and it must be allowed that he always directs his blows with vigour and sometimes with precision. There is pertinent matter in his volumes, but there is more that is irrevelant and much that is coarse. It is right, no doubt, to call a spade a spade, but there are two ways even of saying that, and Mr. Jeaffreson has chosen the worst. No doubt his laborious book will dispel some illusions, and rectify some mistakes; no doubt it has cleared the ground in some respects for the future biographers of the poet; but on the whole the game is not worth the candle. If it had been the writer's sole purpose to refute certain opinions expressed by enthusiastic admirers of Shelley, he might have achieved that purpose in fifty pages. He has written more than nine hundred, and, like a tedious preacher, who exhausts his congregation, has spoilt his work.

Last week there was another match for the championship of billiards; this time between the Champion, Mr. John Roberts, jun., and an ex-Champion, Mr. Joseph Bennett. The match was no match; Mr. Roberts led from start to finish, "beating the record" both in the total number of points made at a break and in the number of consecutive "spots" (at a championship table, in a championship match). He scored 155 in one break; he made sixteen consecutive "spots"; and he won by 1640 points out of 3000. Mr. Bennett, however, was "amiss." Mr. John Roberts, jun., is evidently better than any living English player who has ever performed in public, whether at the "spot-barred" game or at the "all in" game, on an ordinary table, or at the usual game on a championship table. It may be worth while to call to mind again how a championship table differs from an ordinary table: in the former, the "spots" are marked by chalk only, the pieces of black plaister are dispensed with; the pockets are only 3 inches wide at the "fall," instead of 3¼ or 3½ inches; the "red spot" is 12½ inches, instead of 13, from the top cushion; the diameter of the D (as the "baulk semicircle" is called) is 21 inches instead of 23. The object of a championship table is not quite plain, unless it be to weary the spectators; for, so far as the example of Mr. John Roberts can be taken for a guide, the best player at the ordinary table will be (if he practises) the best at the championship table, and the former, of course, gives more opening for those long and varied breaks which alone keep up the spirits and attention of the spectators, and prevent them from wishing that they had never been born.

The small island of Tristan d'Acunha, which supports a vigorous little colony of about a hundred souls, is as much overrun by rats as Australia by rabbits, and with similar deplorable results. The destructive little rodents were imported by accident, an American schooner having been wrecked on the coast, when the rats from her hold swarmed up into the fields and devoured the promising harvest. This was quite misfortune enough for one season; but before the next came round, the creatures had increased and multiplied to such an extent that it was no use planting cereals at all. The inhabitants are now entirely dependent on passing vessels for supplies of flour and meal, for which they barter fish, poultry, pigs, and cattle. The island is so mountainous that their pasture land is limited in extent; but it affords abundant feed for six hundred head of cattle and five hundred sheep. A dozen good wiry terriers, with reputations to maintain, would be a perfect godsend to the colonists.

Belgium and the International African Association have unforeseen difficulties to cope with in the government and occupation of the Congo Free State. A powerful chief named Tipu Taib has proclaimed the territory as belonging to the Sultan of Zanzibar, and announced his intention of fighting to the bitter end in its defence. He has a large and powerful army, a considerable portion of which is armed with modern weapons; and it is thought that all the Mohammedan races in Central Africa will join him. Tipu Taib has had his eyes opened to the riches of the interior by having acted as escort and protector to one of the ivory expeditions commanded by an agent of the International Association, which ought to have followed the precedent of descending the Congo River to Stanley Pool with its valuable collection of tusks, but instead of doing so pushed on eastward to Zanzibar. Tipu honourably carried out his bargain, but kept his ears open; and having heard that El Mahdi had not been altogether routed by the British in the Soudan, determined to become the leader of the tribes around Lake Tanganyika, and to offer a stout resistance to all encroaching foreigners.

The sugar trade has never been at such a low ebb as during the last few months, when the very best loaf has been sold retail by all the large firms at twopence per pound, and the planters of Barbadoes and Demerara have been wellnigh ruined. Those who are learned in the subject say that this state of things has been brought about by the excessive production of beetroot sugar on the continent of Europe which has entirely supplied itself, England being the only European country that has demanded cane sugar. But there has been so little profit on the beet crop after all expenses were paid that growers have planted less and less of it for two years, the quantity being 130,000 tons less in 1884 than in 1883; and, as there is just as much demand for sugar as ever, merchants are ordering the product of the cane so rapidly that a large quantity of gold has been sent out to Havana to enable planters to increase the area of their cane-fields as speedily as possible.

Of the five "classic" races (the Two Thousand, the One Thousand, the Derby, the Oaks, and the St. Leger) four have already been decided; and it is worthy of note that all the winners (Paradox, son of Sterling; Farewell, daughter of Doncaster; Melton, son of Master Kildare; and Lonely, daughter of Hermit) are descendants in the direct male line of Darley's Arabian. The only horse that ever won a "classic" race and was not descended in the direct male line from Darley's Arabian, or Godolphin's Arabian (Barb), or Byerley's Turk, was Aimwell (son of Marc Antony), who won the Derby in 1785, and was descended in the direct male line from Alcock's Arabian (whose services, perhaps unfortunately, were not very liberally employed). Marc Antony was a "first foal" and a half-brother to Highflyer; and with Conductor, Pyrrhus, and Pantaloon, who were also "first foals" and of his year, did enough to remove the unreasonable prejudice which nevertheless existed for many years after his date against a dam's first produce. It is a pity, perhaps, that both Aimwell and Marc Antony, like Alcock's Arabian, were, to all appearance, comparatively neglected as sires; for Marc Antony was a very stout horse, and won twenty out of the twenty-eight events for which he started, and he ran nowhere but at Newmarket.

A truly remarkable career is that of William Mellor, farm labourer, who was reported the other day to be "wanted" by the police for stealing a horse. At nine years of age, when some geniuses, like Mozart or another, would be astonishing the world with precocious musical or other performances, Mellor, it is said, "collected eight shillings for a juvenile Wesleyan missionary" in a money-box, and "then got drunk and burned the box." With this early feat to his credit, he "nearly twenty years ago joined the Manchester (police) force; but was soon dismissed," as might have been predicted, even by a "sporting prophet," with some chance of a successful prophecy. Nothing daunted, however, Mellor "made a false declaration, and was admitted to the Staffordshire constabulary; but the perjury was discovered, and he was dismissed after two days' service." Hereupon he rose to the occasion, and applied to "a money society for funds with which to stock an imaginary farm"; took the "inquiry officer" over somebody else's well-stocked premises in the absence of the owner; and obtained £120, with which he naturally decamped, and which he must have employed to some purpose as he was "not heard of again for ten years." Then came his greatest triumph, when he "succeeded in representing himself as dead, in registering his death, and in obtaining burial-money from a lodge of Foresters, of which he was a member."

That a man who had thus taken the bread, as it were, out of the mouth of an undertaker, and had actually lived on his own funeral, should have been driven by adverse circumstances to common horse-stealing, shows once more to what "vile uses we may come." Mellor is clearly one of those felonious persons to whom, when they are caught and convicted, a Judge is wont to deliver an address about their talents which, "if properly applied to some honest trade, &c.," would have enabled them to reach a "position of respectability and affluence." It has always seemed strange that "the prisoner at the bar" has never retorted: "But you forget, my Lord, that we thieves are, as yet, a minority; there is too much competition in the honest line." Or does "the prisoner at the bar" believe that all men are as bad as he, only they have not been found out? This may account for his silence. At any rate, it is a fallacy to hold that the very greatest talents will certainly bring success in "the honest line," though that is no reason for trying the dishonest.

There is a new proposition with regard to silver coinage, which would, if adopted (an unlikely contingency), effectually put a stop to any public disadvantage which might be effected in consequence of the depreciation of the intrinsic value of the white metal. A new coterie in America suggest that instead of issuing coin the silver should be kept in bars, and that certificates should be issued to anybody disposed to accept them in lieu of currency. Unfortunately for the ingenious promoters of the idea, it cannot become popular because the holders of the certificates would at once become speculators in silver. If the value decreased, their securities must go down; and if it went up, the public could purchase what they wanted from the Treasury at the market or current value. The suggestion, therefore, must fail, although some proposition which would be advantageous and just would be welcome on the principle pointed out in these columns the week before last.

The fine old line-of-battle ship Howe, one of our few remaining "wooden walls," is about to be sent to Devonport as a training-ship, in the place of the Impregnable, which has been there for the last five-and-twenty years. The Hastings, another old liner, has been examined as to its capabilities, and will probably be handed over to the Government of New South Wales after being properly fitted up for training purposes.

THE COURT.

Her Majesty's birthday was celebrated in the customary way last Saturday by the Brigade of Guards "trooping the colours" on the Horse Guards' Parade. The Prince of Wales and the Duke of Cambridge took part in the display, and the Princess of Wales, with the Princesses, was among among the spectators. In the evening dinners and receptions were given by the Ministers and the principal officials. The Prince of Wales and Prince Albert Victor dined with the Premier; and the Prince and Princess, with Prince Albert Victor and Prince George and Princess Louise, were present at the evening party given by Countess Granville. The Hon. Artillery Company and the Post-Office Volunteers held special parades in honour of the occasion, which was also observed in the usual manner by military displays in Dublin and at some of the other principal garrisons. A number of appointments were made to various orders and to knighthood. Divine service was conducted on Sunday at Balmoral Castle by the Rev. Archibald Campbell, Minister of Crathie, in presence of the Queen, Princess Beatrice, Princess of Leiningen, and the Royal household. The Rev. A. Campbell had the honour of being invited to dine with the Queen and Royal family. On Monday afternoon her Majesty drove to Braemar. Mr. William Simpson, Special Artist of the Illustrated London News, has had the honour of submitting to the Queen at Balmoral, for her Majesty's inspection, drawings of various places on the line of the Russian and Afghan frontier, and in Persia, which Mr. Simpson made when accompanying the Afghan Frontier Commission. The Queen has contributed £50 to the Newspaper Press Fund.

A Levée was on Tuesday held at St. James's Palace by the Prince of Wales, on behalf of her Majesty, at which the presentations numbered 430. The Prince was accompanied by the Duke of Edinburgh and the Duke of Cambridge. Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, the Prince of Leiningen, and the Duke of Teck were present.

The Prince and Princess of Wales, Prince Albert Victor, and Prince George, and Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud, were present at Divine service on Sunday. The Prince and Princess, accompanied by Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud, left Marlborough House on Monday morning for Gravesend, where they embarked on board Lord Alfred Paget's steam-yacht, the St. Cecilia, and witnessed the first day's regatta of the Royal Thames Yacht Club, of which his Royal Highness is the Commodore. Their Royal Highnesses returned to London in the evening. On Tuesday morning the Prince proceeded to the Natural History Museum, in Cromwell-road, South Kensington, where, in presence of a numerous and distinguished company, his Royal Highness, as principal trustee for the British Museum, accepted, in the name of the trustees, a marble statue of the late Charles Darwin, formally presented by Professor Huxley on behalf of the Darwin Committee. In the afternoon the Prince and Princess, with their daughters, and the Duke of Edinburgh, visited the Horse Show at the Royal Agricultural Hall; and in the evening the Prince and Princess of Wales, with the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, Princess Louise (Marchioness of Lorne), and other members of the Royal family, were present at the concert given at St. James's Hall by the American residents in London in aid of the National Fund for Sick and Wounded Soldiers. On Wednesday Prince Albert Victor was called to the Bench of the Middle Temple, and dined with the Benchers in their fine old hall in Plowden-buildings. The Prince of Wales, who is also a Bencher of this society, was present. About 400 members of the Inn dined in the hall, and several distinguished guests accepted invitations.

Princess Christian assisted on Tuesday evening at a concert given by the members of the Windsor and Eton Amateur Orchestral Society, at the Albert Institute, Windsor. Her Royal Highness played a pianoforte solo and in a concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, by Bach, and was much applauded.

A select wedding party met early last Saturday morning at the Church of Holy Trinity, Sloane-street, Chelsea, for the marriage of Viscountess Helmsley and Mr. Hugh Owen. Lady Helmsley was attended by her children, the Hon. Mary Duncombe and Viscount Helmsley, and her nephew and nieces, Viscount Castlereagh and Lady Helen Vane Tempest, and the Misses Chaplin. Captain Owen acted as best man to his brother. Theresa, Countess of Shrewsbury, gave her daughter away.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN.

A remaining Sketch of Mr. Walter Paget, our Special Artist late with the army of General Sir Gerald Graham at Souakim, is presented on our front page. It is that of a scene which took place on April 15, after a reconnaissance conducted by Captain Briggs and Mr. Brewster, of the Intelligence Department, who had procured the assistance of a friendly native tribe. The "friendlies," knowing the position of Osman Digna's followers, assisted in the capture of some prisoners, including several women of the enemy's family, whom they mounted on a camel with a screen or curtain over the seat to protect them from observation; also flocks of sheep and goats, which were driven into the camp. We have engraved also a Sketch from the Nile; one by Captain W. W. Verner, of the Rifle Brigade, Deputy Assistant Adjutant-General at the camp at Tani, commanded by Major-General the Hon. J. C. Dormer, on May 1, which shows a large crocodile killed by a shot from a Martini-Henry rifle. His stomach contained the greater part of a donkey, which he had evidently bolted whole; along with the skull and jawbones of an ox, and a quantity of stones and gravel, swallowed apparently to assist digestion.

GENERAL F. D. MIDDLETON, C.B.

A Portrait of Major-General Frederick Middleton, C.B., Commanding the Militia Forces of the Dominion of Canada, who has displayed great ability and energy in his recent operations in the North-West Territory against the insurgent bands of French half-breeds and Indian tribes, is presented in this Number of our Journal. It is from a photograph by Mr. Topley, of Ottawa. General Middleton is an officer of distinguished merit, who was educated at the Royal Staff College, served in India during the Sepoy Mutiny War, and in the Maori War in New Zealand, was more recently Commandant of the Cadet College at Sandhurst. He was appointed, in July last year, to the command of the Colonial forces of Canada, amounting to 37,000 well-trained troops, whose organisation has been described in this Journal. The latest news from the North Saskatchewan seems to indicate that the rebellion is effectually subdued. Big Bear, the remaining hostile chief, has retired northward with a few desperate followers, and fifty of his captives have escaped in safety. General Middleton is in pursuit of Big Bear.

The annual show of the Bath and West of England Society and Southern Counties Association opened on Monday morning at Preston Park, Brighton. There was an extraordinary increase in the number of entries in the principal departments.

THE SILENT MEMBER.

DEFEAT OF THE GOVERNMENT.

"It is the unexpected that always happens!" Mr. Gladstone's second Administration, after triumphing over innumerable resolutions condemnatory of the Egyptian policies of the Government, was at the commencement of the week vanquished by the Opposition in the fight over the alcoholic clauses of Mr. Childers's unpalatable Budget. Perfectly resigned to their lot, resignation ensued. In the ordinary course of things, her Majesty calls upon the Party which brought about the defeat of the Government to furnish a fresh Ministry. Always notable as having the courage of his opinions, the Marquis of Salisbury is not likely to shrink from the task if he should be honoured by the Queen's commands.

The languor observable on the Ministerial side when the House of Commons reassembled after the Whitsuntide Recess augured badly for the Government in the momentous debate. Both on the Thursday and Friday of last week, the attendance of members was slack, a few votes in Supply only being passed on the first evening, and the House being counted out before the Princess Beatrice's dowry was reached on the 5th of June. In the Lords, the most interesting event on the latter day was Lord Garmoyle's entrance into political life, his Lordship taking the oath of allegiance as the heir of his late illustrious father, Earl Cairns; but it was also noticeable that Lord Salisbury was as busy writing on the front Opposition bench as though the great coming event had already cast its shadow before it.

In vain did Mr. Childers strive on the Friday (backed by the presence of the pallid Premier), to propitiate the House by hopeful reference to the possibility of only Nine Millions of the War-vote of Eleven Millions being required after all. In vain did the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his blandest tones state that he would abate the increased duty on spirits to a shilling a gallon, and continue the shilling a barrel on beer for a year only. Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Sir Richard Cross, and Mr. W. H. Smith looked as implacable as ever in the centre of the front Opposition bench. Lord Randolph Churchill in his coign of 'vantage irreconcilably curled the ends of his moustache. War to the knife was plainly intended, and was made clear by hostile interrogations.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach lost no time in running his colours up to the mast-head directly Mr. Childers on Monday had moved the second reading of his Budget Bill, as amended. The right hon. Baronet, who has clearly the will to fill the House with a fairly resonant voice, and who will probably succeed in time in doing so, with some trenchancy moved the following amendment:—

That this House regards the increase proposed by this Bill in the duties levied on beer and spirits as inequitable in the absence of a corresponding addition to the duties on wine, and declines to impose fresh taxation on real property until effect has been given to its resolution of April 17, 1884, and of March 28, 1884, by which it has acknowledged further measures of relief to be due to ratepayers in counties and boroughs in respect of local charges imposed on them for national services.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach had the temerity to allude to tea as an article that might bear additional taxation instead of beer and spirits. Energetically condemning this suggestion as impracticable, both Sir Charles Dilke and Mr. Gladstone criticised the right hon. baronet's speech with much vivacity. The President of the Board of Trade frankly said the "question cannot be treated as a mere change of Budget. It is a question of life and death." Immediately following Sir Stafford Northcote (who spoke as a past Chancellor of the Exchequer, be it remembered, and was sure there would be no difficulty in readjusting the Budget, albeit he did not countenance any fresh impost on tea), the Prime Minister spoke in his most dashing style. Mr. Gladstone, impressively premising that "it is simply for the Government a question of life and death," scouted, as aforesaid, the notion of alienating the tea-drinker, ironically referred to "the regular Opposition, the loyal Opposition, the national Opposition, the patriotic Opposition, the Constitutional Opposition," as refusing the Government the money needed, not because they really entertained compassion for the beer and spirit drinker, but because "the death duties of my right hon. friend have invaded the sanctuary of landed property." The Premier gallantly fought a losing battle. Extraordinary was the excitement. Lord Randolph Churchill frantically waved his hat, and the Parnellites flung taunts at the Treasury Bench, when it was seen that the Opposition "whips" had precedence at the table, and it was known the Government must be in a minority. It proved that Sir Michael Hicks-Beach had a majority of 12—264 against 252 votes—but the victory was secured by the alliance of the unstable Parnellite party with the Conservatives, by a few Liberal defections, and by the absence of numerous Ministerialists from the critical division. Mr. Gladstone philosophically bore the rebuff. As a necessary consequence of the defeat, he briefly moved the adjournment of the House in the small hours of Tuesday morning. Mr. Gladstone was rewarded by an enthusiastically loyal outburst of cheering from his followers when he re-entered the House on the Tuesday afternoon. It was known that the Ministry had resigned. But, in accordance with precedent, Mr. Gladstone simply said in the course of his short address that "the Cabinet assembled to-day and thought it their duty through me to submit a dutiful communication to her Majesty." The right hon. gentleman in answer to an inquiry on the part of Sir Stafford Northcote, added that, in the event of the Lords returning the Redistribution of Seats Bill on Friday (to which day both Houses stand adjourned), it would be advisable then to consider their Lordships' amendments.

At the annual meeting of the Geographical Society on Monday, the Marquis of Lorne was elected president for the ensuing year in the place of Lord Aberdare, who has resigned. At the dinner which took place in the evening at Willis's Rooms, Sir Peter Lumsden and Mr. Stanley made characteristic speeches.

Two fine rhododendron shows were opened on Monday—one that of Mr. Anthony Waterer, at the gardens of the Royal Botanic Society, Regent's Park; and the other that of Messrs. John Waterer and Son, at the gardens of Cadogan-place, Sloane-street: both will remain open during the present month.

The case of "Adams v. Coleridge" was again mentioned in the Appeal Court on Tuesday, when the Attorney-General stated that it had been agreed that no judgment should be given in the case, and that the action against Lord Coleridge should be stayed. Mr. Coleridge apologised and withdrew all imputations, and Lord Coleridge restored Miss Coleridge to her former position, and had agreed to settle on her £600 a year.

By a resolution of the Court of Fishmongers', the freedom of their ancient company has been offered to Prince Albert Victor of Wales, who has accepted the same. A gold casket to contain this document having been also voted, from the designs submitted to the Court that of Mr. J. W. Benson, of Ludgate-hill, has been selected. The casket, which is of a highly artistic, appropriate, and special character, will form a pleasing souvenir of the Prince's association with one of the principal of the civic companies.

THE PLAYHOUSES.

A very dull and, from all accounts, an equally disastrous theatrical season has been momentarily brightened by the arrival at the Gaiety of the now celebrated Jane Hading and an excellent company of French players. Mr. John Hollingshead, who for twelve consecutive seasons has brought over to this country so many admirable foreign artists, including the full company of the Comédie Française, has this year given the whole weight of responsibility to his able coadjutor Mr. M. L. Mayer, who, in addition to the operatic performances with Mdlle. Van Zandt at their head, has already introduced Jane Hading in the character of Marsa in "Le Prince Zilah" of Jules Claretie and promises eventually Sarah Bernhardt in Théodora. But it is not M. Mayer's plan to unduly encourage the star system. His theatrical planets are invariably surrounded by satellites of extraordinary power and brilliancy. Thus with Jane Hading come that admirable actor and old favourite at the Gymnase, M. Landrol, and M. St. Germain, one of the best eccentric comedians in France. By-and-by, in the company of Sarah Bernhardt, we shall see Marais, Marie Laurent, and the now celebrated Garnier, who has been offered an engagement at the Théâtre Français.

The new play, "Le Prince Zilah," founded on Jules Claretie's novel proved somewhat of a disappointment. We had heard much of this work in its dramatised form; its strange, but uninteresting, prologue; its bloodhounds, who bay behind the scenes and are supposed to tear the villain to death; its two strong and striking scenes connected with the wrecked life of the gipsy-bred Marsa, beloved by the Prince Zilah, but persecuted by a dishonouring scoundrel called Menko: but few who had not seen the play in Paris were prepared to find it, on the whole, so ineffective. The prologue, that gave so much offence to the critics in Paris, has been wisely suppressed, and we plunge at once into the purpose of the story; but, truth to tell, it is not a well-balanced work; the minor characters are tedious; and the great scene of the attack of the bloodhounds, intended, no doubt, to be very weird and terrible, appears, in English eyes, to be exceedingly trivial, if not comic. Of course, there is nothing particularly new in the story that M. Claretie has used both for novel and play. Women who are anxious to live down their past are perpetually threatened by villains who hold compromising letters, and happy lives are continually wrecked by the presence of some scoundrel, who, from jealousy or greed, desires a wretched form of revenge or retaliation. In real life it may be added that the victim is not necessarily a woman. Men suffer as much, if not more, from black-mailing women than women do from black-mailing men. Anyhow, this is one of the few motives that are the stock-in-trade of the dramatist and novelist as well. I am reminded that, long before M. Claretie's book appeared, Mr. A. W. Pinero used the same story in his play of "The Rector," at the Court Theatre—a play of considerable merit, but which failed in its object to please, owing to some defect in the method of setting forth the plot. It is quite certain that "Le Prince Zilah" cannot be quoted as a brilliant example of dramatic construction, by any means. It is saved alone by some very excellent acting. I should very much like to hear the opinion of M. Landrol on the art of Jane Hading, for it will be remembered that this faithful actor was attached to the Gymnase Théâtre all though the sad later career of Aimée Desclée. He has had opportunities of watching them both, and has, no doubt, frequently compared them. In the quieter and more reflective sides of their acting, they are to me very similar in style. Jane Hading has that strange power of attracting her audience to her by means of those waves of expression too often neglected on the stage. The fear of the actress is seldom still. It is an index to the mind, and is just as sensitive to every external and internal impression as a field of grass or corn that bends or sways to the slightest breath of wind. Jane Hading becomes the woman she personates, and a more beautiful example of her style could not be given than in the first act of the play, where the dejected and unsettled Marsa receives the love avowals of the passionate Prince. Her song, too, at the piano, where the sad woman breaks down over the recollection of some Hungarian air dear to her in old days, is a really delightful moment. But then, of course, Jane Hading is, or was, as accomplished a singer as an actress, and proceeded to comedy from comic opera. It is only in the stronger and more emotional scenes that the actress cannot conceal her effort to be natural. In striving after Nature and desiring effect she often proves artificial. Her powerful and passionate scenes do not ring quite true, and her evident admiration for the method of Sarah Bernhardt only intensifies the difficulty. But all that will come in time, and Jane Hading is distinctly one of the most interesting, and certainly the most promising, of the younger actresses of her time. Landrol gives a very fine performance of an old officer whose faith in the villain of the play is shaken by untoward circumstances, and who is compelled to be his executioner; but St. Germain was not seen at his best. He seems to trade upon his "throaty" manner, and to have become exceedingly mannered.

Mrs. Langtry, who was to have produced a new play by Mr. W. G. Wills next Saturday afternoon, has postponed it for further rehearsal—indeed, there is very little animation in the theatrical world, and all the managers appear to be shirking the summer and preparing for a more favourable autumn campaign. C. S.

An exhibition of industry and art, was held in the new schools at Upton, near Chester, lately built by Colonel and the Misses Humberston, the work, drawings, models, &c., were the production of the people of the village.

The tableaux which formed such a striking feature of the fancy-dress ball at the Institute of Painters in Water Colours were repeated with remarkable success before a large audience at the Kensington Townhall on Thursday, the 4th inst. The entertainment was for the benefit of the school of water-colour painting, founded by the Institute.

Mr. Norman Forbes's matinée will take place at the Prince's Theatre on Monday, June 22, when will be produced, for the first time in English, "Gringoire," an adaptation expressly written for him by Mr. W. G. Wills. The cast will consist of Messrs. Mansfield, Louther, Archer, and Norman Forbes, Miss Dorothy Dene and Miss Lee. Madame Antoinette Sterling, Miss Hope Glenn, and Mr. J. Robertson have kindly consented to sing on that occasion. Miss Maud White will play a solo on the pianoforte, and Messrs. Hermann Vezin and William Terriss will give recitations.

The Albert Palace at Battersea, which has been constructed to provide rational amusement and recreation for the public, was opened last Saturday by the Lord Mayor, who was accompanied by the Lady Mayoress and the Sheriffs. In spite of most unpropitious weather, there was a good attendance. In the afternoon a concert was given in the Connaught Hall, when an ode, written for the occasion, was performed by a large choir, assisted by artists. This concert is noticed in our Music column, and among the Art Notes is one referring to the pictures in this palace.

ADRIAN VIDAL.

BY W. E. NORRIS,

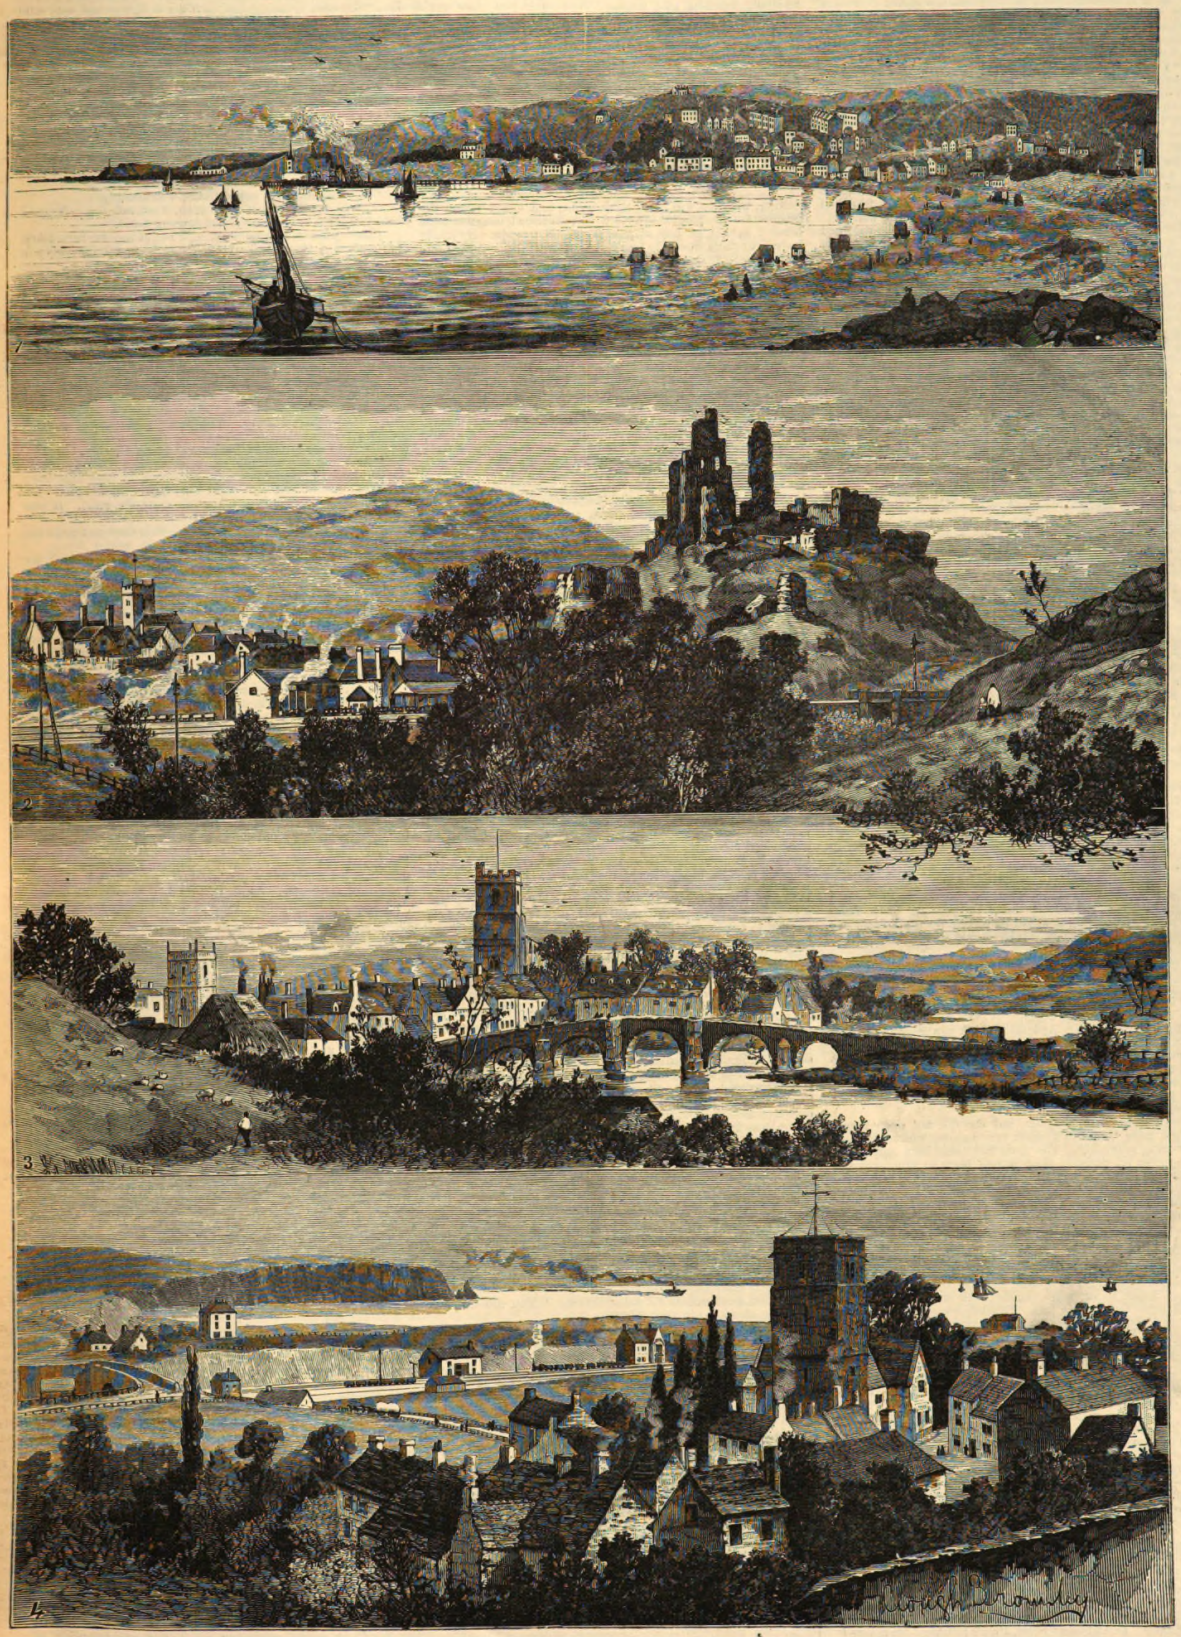
CHAPTER XL.

ADRIAN'S LAST ATTEMPT.

Adrian walked home in a white heat, and his anger was only to a small extent against Wilbraham. The man had insulted him grossly and stupidly, and he had done what he could to avenge the insult. If he had not exactly succeeded in washing it out in blood, that did not signify so very much, after all. What hurt him far more than anything that Wilbraham could say was the thought that Clare had complained of her lot to an outsider. Had he been less incensed, he would have known that to complain to an outsider was about the last thing that she was likely to do; but he had not all his wits about him, and he was under the impression that Wilbraham had given himself out as being in some sort Mrs. Vidal's spokesman, as well as her champion. That was the last straw! It was rather hard that, with the sense of his wrongs strong upon him, he should have to go straight to Clare and make a humiliating confession; but there was no help for it—the confession must be made. To confine himself to the bare announcement that he had been extravagant, and must retrench, would—though disagreeable enough—be plain sailing. Many a man is compelled to make such announcements to his wife; and she, if she be worthy of the name of wife, will be pretty sure to try and console him, instead of reproaching him. But Adrian rather doubted whether he would be able to stop there, and doubted still more whether anything would be gained by proceeding farther. He bitterly regretted now that he had put himself in the wrong by pretending to flirt with women whom he neither liked nor respected. If he accused Clare of having traduced him to a third person, she would have an answer ready to which it might not be easy to find a rejoinder; for the legal maxim of "the greater the truth, the greater the libel" is one which has never yet commended itself to feminine minds. On reaching Alexandra-gardens, he turned and walked back for some distance, and then turned again, debating with himself whether he should tell Clare of his encounter with Wilbraham or not; and when at length he entered his house he had reached no decision.



He had still several hours in which to cool down and consider himself; for he found Georgina in the drawing-room, and presently De Wynt, who had been asked to dine, came in. Unfortunately, however, the presence of De Wynt did not serve to sooth Adrian's irritated nerves. Why is it that, during the interval which separates betrothal from marriage, ninety-nine couples out of a hundred become a standing affliction to all who are forced to dwell under the same roof with them? Why are they for ever exchanging meaning glances? Why must they needs indulge in mute demonstrations which everybody in the room sees perfectly plainly, but which they absurdly assume to be visible only to themselves? What strong delusion possesses them that they seem to take a positive pride in conduct which they would ridicule and despise in anybody else? A happy thing it is for them that they speedily forget this period of insanity—forget it as we have all forgotten the time when we were red and squalling infants. But those who saw us as infants do not forget the circumstance. They may forget a good deal about us, but they never forget that; and never fail to remind us of it. Nor is the behaviour of engaged lovers ever forgotten by those unfortunates who have chanced to be shut up in the house with them for a few days. Let young lovers bear this truth in mind, and tremble.

The worst of it is that age would seem to be no safeguard against the above-mentioned malady. Georgina and De Wynt—neither of whom was in the first blush of youth—were quite as ridiculous as any boy and girl: and even Clare, heartily as she rejoiced in the engagement which she had done her best to bring about, was obliged to admit that they were not the best of company at this time. De Wynt was by far the greater offender of the two. Georgina, true to her principle of self-effacement, simply did what he told her, and appeared to delight in this unwonted attitude of compliance; but he—whether because he wished to indemnify himself for many years of sober common-sense, or because he really was not responsible for his actions—went on in a way which was found very trying by his future brother-in-law, and which did little credit to his reputation for tact.

"I say, Vidal, you're not really busy just now; what should you say to our giving ourselves a three or four days' holiday on the river?" he began, in a sort of "let's-all-be-happy-together" tone, as soon as he had taken his place at the dinner-table. "We would take it easy, you know, you and I pulling, and one of the ladies steering for us; and whenever we thought we had had enough work, we could stop a night at one of those jolly little riverside inns. Don't you think that's a first-rate idea?"

"I daresay it is," answered Adrian, shortly; "but unfortunately I couldn't manage to get away at present."

"Oh, bosh!" returned De Wynt; "you can if you choose. Mrs. Vidal, you get him to come. He won't refuse you."

OPENING OF THE WAREHAM AND SWANAGE RAILWAY.

Clare said, "I doubt whether either of you would be equal to the exertion of pulling up stream for several days. Besides, it might come on to rain."

But De Wynt was not to be discouraged. He now turned to Georgina, and, with one of those pregnant glances which have been alluded to above as characteristic of the betrothed lover, persisted: "We should all enjoy it. You would, wouldn't you? And so would Mrs. Vidal—and so would Vidal, really. They only want to be stirred up. Do use your eloquence upon them."

"I think it would be great fun," responded the submissive Georgina.

Thereupon Adrian lost patience and exclaimed, "It would indeed! We should be a gay and frolicsome party. Only, as I can't possibly go, I am afraid we shall have to content ourselves with keeping up our usual flow of uproarious jollity at home."

He knew perfectly well what De Wynt was driving at, and was not ungrateful to the little man, whose good intentions he recognised; but it was rather exasperating to be treated as though he and his wife were a couple of children who had had a tiff, and must be reconciled by older and wiser persons.

De Wynt was silenced for the time being; but he returned to the charge repeatedly in the course of the evening, employing all kinds of transparent stratagems to get Clare and Adrian to speak to one another, suggesting various absurd projects, and accepting the snubs which he thus brought down upon himself with the most inexorable good humour.

Towards eleven o'clock he rose to depart. Adrian, as in duty bound, begged him to stay a little longer and smoke a cigar, trusting that the invitation would not be accepted, yet experiencing a slight chill of disappointment when it was declined. Most of us, as we stand upon the dentist's doorstep, have just the shadow of a faint hope that he may not be at home; but he always is at home, and we should be justly indignant with him if he were not. By the time that Adrian had shut the front-door behind his guest he had overcome his momentary longing for a reprieve, and only wished to get through the coming bad quarter of an hour as speedily as might be. He walked back to the foot of the staircase and called to Clare, who was just preparing to ascend to her bedroom.

"Would you mind coming into the study for a few minutes?" he asked.

She looked a little startled, he thought; but she turned at once and came down. Presently she followed him into the little room, which was but partially lighted by the shaded lamp upon the writing-table, and silently awaited his pleasure. Neither of them sat down.

"I wanted to tell you," Adrian began, looking away from her as he spoke, "that I have got into difficulties. I have made much less this year than I expected to make; our expenses have been heavier than I thought they would be, and to-day I heard of the loss of some money which I had invested in the Anglo-Saxon. The upshot of it all is that we shall have to make a change in our manner of living."

He glanced quickly at Clare when he had made this brief statement; but she did not reply, nor did she seem to be in any way moved.

"I am very sorry about it," he went on, after a pause. "I have been unlucky; but I have been imprudent too, and I certainly owe you an apology. Perhaps I ought also to apologise for having written a stupid book which nobody will buy. I might have known that I am not the sort of writer to make money."

"It will be easy to economise," said Clare, quietly.

Adrian was not sure that he quite liked this indifference. "It will be necessary; I don't know about it's being easy," he observed. "We shall have to make sacrifices—to give up this house, for instance."

Then for the first time Clare exhibited some sign of interest. "Shall we go away from London?" she asked.

"Is that the only thing that you care about?" cried Adrian, irritably. "No; I don't suppose we shall leave London. I don't think it would be wise to do so; I don't see any reason for our doing so. Why should we?"

"I don't like London."

"Well," said Adrian, subduing his impatience, "that is a reason, no doubt. The only question is, would you be any happier in the country? You are not happy here; I am quite aware of that."

To this Clare made no reply.

"Yet you might be. At least, I think you might. To live always with a man whom you distrust and suspect—that is enough to make anyone unhappy. But is it so certain that you are right to distrust and suspect me? Just ask yourself the question. Why have we been strangers all this long, weary time? Has it been worth while? Has there been any real cause for it?"

Clare's lips were quivering; but she did not open them. Her eyes were cast down upon her fingers, which she was intertwining nervously. The time had been long and weary to her—more so, perhaps, than it had been to him; yet she could not say that she had had no cause to distrust him; and therefore it seemed best to say nothing.

"Let us go back to the beginning," resumed Adrian. "It all began—did it not?—with your dislike of Lady St. Austell. You saw that she was a flirt, and you couldn't trust me with her. You did not see that, besides being a flirt, she was a stout, middle-aged woman; though that might have reassured you, even if you could feel no confidence in me. And then, most unfortunately, you found her in the house. You wouldn't listen to my explanations; and it was hopeless to try and force them upon you. Besides, I confess that I was angry, as I really think that I had a right to be. But one can't go on being angry for ever—at least, I can't. The explanation was simple enough. Lady St. Austell came here, not for the pleasure of seeing me, but to scandalise Lord Blaise, who had taken upon himself to rebuke her; and when she came I could hardly send her away. That is the whole truth; I hope you believe it."

He waited for some time; but, as Clare still continued silent, he repeated, in a somewhat sharper tone, "Do you or do you not believe that I never cared a brass farthing for Lady St. Austell?"

Clare had turned very pale. She remembered the scene which she had witnessed in Kensington Gardens; of that, no explanation was possible. She could forgive her husband, but to tell a lie or to acquiesce in one was beyond her. "I want to believe you!" she exclaimed, spreading out her hands with a despairing gesture; "but I can't! Adrian, I would so much rather—so much, much rather that you told me the truth!"

"I have told you the truth," answered Adrian, coldly, "and you have refused to believe me. You need not be afraid that I shall make any more attempts. I have already acknowledged that I have been very much to blame in living too extravagantly. In addition to that, I have latterly—for reasons which you may or may not understand—gone more into society than a married man ought to do without his wife. Neither of these offences will be repeated, and I cannot accuse myself of having failed in my duty to you in any other respect. I have only one thing more to say. I must request that any future complaint which you may have to make of my conduct may be made to me, and not to Mr. Wilbraham, or to other persons of your acquaintance."

"I never complained to Mr. Wilbraham!" cried Clare, suddenly bursting into tears. "How could you—how could you think!"——

Adrian smiled coldly. "You doubted my word just now," he said. "Excuse me if I take the liberty of doubting yours. For such a very distrustful person, you seem to choose your confidants rather rashly, and I should recommend, both for my sake and your own, that in future you should trust nobody."

After this there was silence for a few minutes, broken only by Clare's stifled sobs, then Adrian held the door open for her, and she passed out without another word.

CHAPTER XLI.

THE RESULT OF AN ACCIDENT.

Adrian, when he was once more alone, and could review the incidents of the painful interview just described, congratulated himself in that he had at least kept his temper. He might have done more wisely to lose it. The impression which Clare carried away with her was that her husband cared very little whether their quarrel were made up or not. His language had been in some measure conciliatory, but it had not been in the least affectionate; and his object, Clare thought, had been rather to place her in the wrong than to convince her that he loved her still.

So far, he had been successful; for he had certainly made it appear as though she were in the wrong. Yet in his heart he must have known that it was not so. Before her eyes he had embraced Lady St. Austell, and to ask her after that to believe that he had never cared a brass farthing for the woman was to make too large a demand upon her credulity. If he had confessed, she could have forgiven him—not very easily, perhaps, since forgiveness of such injuries did not come easily to her; still, she could have forgiven him. But to make a fresh start upon the false assumption that she had been mistaken all along was neither possible nor desirable. The accusation which Adrian had brought against her of having denounced her fate to Mr. Wilbraham did not trouble her long, nor did she even feel much curiosity as to the source whence he had derived his information. At any other time she would have been more distressed by it; but now it seemed a little thing in comparison with the dreadful certainty which she felt that she and her husband could never again be to each other what they had once been.

She lay awake through the greater part of the night, turning it all over in her mind; and always the same conclusion stared her in the face—it would be better that they should part. The argument which has kept many a woman from leaving an unhappy home was not present in her case. She had no children; no one would suffer by her setting Adrian free to follow his own devices; she herself would be the happier in some ways for having done so, and it was beyond all question that he would be. For her own future she had a plan which, vague at first, developed gradually into a fixed purpose. Her experience at the Children's Hospital had shown her that she possessed some of the qualities of a good sick-nurse, and such technical training as she would need to enable her to adopt nursing as an occupation would, she thought, be acquired without difficulty. Sister Jane would doubtless be willing to give her information and assistance.

On the following morning Adrian went out early, leaving word that he would not be home again before dinner time, and Georgina also departed for Brighton, whither she had been summoned to receive the formal congratulations of her mother, and to be presented with certain articles of jewellery, "for which," as Mrs. Vidal the elder wrote, with the graciousness which distinguished her, "I have no further use." Clare, being thus left alone, had ample leisure for considering her scheme, and the more she thought of it the more advisable it seemed to her to put it into practice without delay. Everyone knows the value of an accomplished fact; and it seemed to her that if she were to pack up her clothes quietly, leave her home, and write to her husband to inform him of the step that she had taken, she would forestall a good deal of the opposition which was to be expected both from him and from her own family. The only point as to which she felt a little uncertain was whether Sister Jane would be able and disposed to give her shelter under such circumstances.

She was sitting in the dining-room, making a pretence of eating the luncheon for which she had no appetite and trying to make up her mind that she would go and consult her friend that afternoon, when, as if in answer to her half-formed intention, the following telegram from Sister Jane herself was delivered to her.

"Come to me here, at once, if you can. I want particularly to see you." The address given was that of the hospital served by the society to which Sister Jane belonged.

Clare was on her way in less than ten minutes. She was too much preoccupied with her own affairs to think of anything else during the greater part of the long drive, and it was only towards the end of it that she began to wonder why she had been so hastily summoned. The explanation which she received on reaching her destination mystified her completely.

"The poor woman will be very glad to hear that you have come," Sister Jane said. "She has been asking for you incessantly since the morning."

"What poor woman?" asked Clare. "You did not say anything about her in your telegram."

"Did I not? Her name is Susan Bowman. It is an accident case. She was run over in the street and brought in here a few days ago."

"I never heard of her that I can remember."

"No; she said you probably would not know her by name, although she knows you very well, and has something which she is anxious to tell you, Her great fear has been that you would arrive too late."

"Is she dying, then?" inquired Clare.

"Oh, yes," answered the other, in her quiet, placid way. "Nothing could be done for her. She has sustained internal injuries and has suffered a good deal of pain, poor thing; but that is over now. Indeed, I think mortification has set in. But you need not be afraid of seeing her," she added; "there is nothing to shock you."

"I should not be afraid in any case," returned Clare, who had her own reasons for wishing to show that she had no timid shrinking from unpleasant sights; "only I cannot imagine who she can be or why she wants to see me."

"Well, will you come and ask her?" said Sister Jane. And she led the way up the broad stone staircase, Clare following.

A woman with a deadly pale face and large black eyes, which opened slowly and fixed themselves with a steady lack-lustre gaze upon her visitor—a woman who must have been handsome a few days ago—— Perhaps the first apprehension which came into Clare's mind was not unnatural; for there is no denying that she was, as Adrian had asserted, very easily made suspicious. She was upon the point of saying that she would rather not be told anything that it might be better for her not to be told, when suddenly the name of Susan Bowman seemed to stir some faint reverberation in her memory.

"Have I not heard my mother speak of you?" she asked.

The woman made a sign of assent. "I told her a pack of lies," she said, bringing out the words slowly and with difficulty; "but that hasn't done her any harm, I suppose. And her Ladyship sent me away without a character."

"Don't trouble yourself about it," said Clare, gently.

Susan smiled. "That don't trouble me. But I 've got to die, they tell me, and I thought I 'd see you first and let you know of something that you 'll be pleased to hear. It wasn't worth taking so much trouble over a bit of work to unpick it all as soon as it was done; but I don't seem as if I could get out of the world comfortably any other way, somehow. It 's lucky for you that that 'bus-driver knocked me over." She paused for a moment, and then added, "It wasn't quite the fair thing to make you suffer, anyway; for you 've never done me a bad turn."

"Why should I?" asked Clare, wonderingly.

"Ah!—but I did you a bad turn, I can tell you. It was I sent you those two letters about your husband."

Clare's cheeks became pink. "I ought not to have taken any notice of them," she said. "And—and I dare say you meant them kindly."

"Not me!" returned the other, with the ghost of a laugh. "No; I didn't owe you any kindness, and that 's the truth. I had my own reasons—may be they were bad ones. You were ready enough to believe a lie, though."

"Was it a lie?" exclaimed Clare, eagerly. And then, "But it could not have been a lie. I saw"——

"You didn't see what you think you saw," interrupted Susan. "It wasn't her Ladyship whom you saw your husband kissing; it was me. And he kissed me because I made him, not because he wanted to, goodness knows! I tell you that now, in case I shouldn't have the strength to get through the whole story. But I 'll try. You 're a jealous sort of woman, aren't you?"

"Yes; I am afraid so," answered Clare, humbly.

"And you don't know much about men, that 's evident. It will make you pretty angry, I suppose, to hear that your husband was in love with somebody before he saw you. He was in love with me, and I was his mother's maid. If you don't like that, you must—lump it."

"But, indeed, I am not so foolish—that does not make me angry—I am sorry," stammered Clare.

"He thought it would make you angry, at all events; for he was frightened out of his life lest I should tell you of it. To the best of my belief, he hasn't been in love with anyone but you since his marriage; but I shouldn't advise you to go on sulking with him as I hear you 've been doing. He isn't the sort of man to make himself miserable for any woman's sake longer than he can help. I don't want to speak against him, though. I don't think he treated me well, that 's all."

"Did he—did he promise to marry you?" asked Clare, hesitatingly.

"Yes; he did. You may say that he was little more than a boy at the time, and that I was a fool for thinking the thing could come on again, after it had been put a stop to by his friends; but we most of us are fools—you in one way, and I in another, you see. My way was to take it into my head that I could learn to be a lady, and that a gentleman always kept his word. Well, if I had never been anything worse than a fool, I could die easier."

"I think I understand it all," said Clare. "You must not tire yourself with talking any more now. It was very good of you to send for me." And, stooping over the bed, she took the dying woman's hand and held it in a soft clasp.

But Susan's was a somewhat stubborn nature, and it is not likely that she felt any great affection for Mrs. Adrian Vidal. She drew her hand away, and answered: "I didn't send for you out of goodness. As for talking, I 'd as soon talk as not. You say you understand; but you must be cleverer than you look if you do. I don't understand it. I don't see why I plotted and planned to make him suffer. Where 's the good of revenge? After all, I don't care"——

Her voice died away, and she lay for some time with half-closed eyes, breathing heavily. Clare did not expect her to open her lips again; but by-and-by she resumed, speaking, as before, with a slow, laboured utterance, and pausing between each short sentence:—

"I swore I 'd punish him, and that wasn't a difficult thing to do. He hasn't much pluck. I scared him by threatening to go to you and tell you how he had behaved to me, and he didn't defy me, as any sensible man would have done. I knew he wouldn't. That was how I got him to meet me in Kensington Gardens. I dressed myself to look like her Ladyship, and I kept him talking till I saw you. Then I made him kiss me. He didn't half like it—though there was a time when he wouldn't have minded."

"It was rather cruel to me," Clare could not help saying.

"I didn't think about you; but I 've put it right now. There 's no harm done. Now you go home and make it up with him. There never was anything between him and her Ladyship—unless it was on her side—and he 's a good fellow by nature. He used me badly; but he 's a good fellow. You tell him I said so—tell him Susan said so."

Those were the last intelligible words that she spoke. She went on talking; but her mind had begun to wander; her voice became weaker and weaker, until it ceased altogether, and she sank into a sort of stupor.

Sister Jane, who had moved away at the beginning of the colloquy, returned now and bent down over the bed. "There is scarcely any pulse," she remarked, presently; "it will be all over soon." Then she looked up at Clare's face, which was scarcely less white than that of the dying woman. "Had you not better go away now?" she asked. "There is nothing more to wait for, and you look very tired."

Clare nodded and went, without saying anything. She passed down the stairs and out into the street, and walked away, hardly noticing whither she was going. All her wrongs, all her misfortunes had been imaginary, then! She could not yet rejoice at that thought; there was room for nothing in her heart but bitter humiliation and self-reproach. Adrian had never been false to her; all that he had told her had been true; what he had concealed he had hidden from her only because he knew her jealous nature, and believed that she would resent what assuredly she had no right to resent. No; there was nothing to rejoice over in that; and what was worst of all was that she feared she had worn out his love. Never, surely, would it be possible to him to think of her again as he had thought of her once. Even she herself, though she had loved him all through, felt that something had been lost since the happy days of their honeymoon—something that neither repentance nor forgiveness could ever quite restore to her.

And she was right. Something had indeed passed out of her life, and would not return to it, however intensely it might be longed for. It passes out of all lives and goes by various names; but most people call it Youth, which is perhaps as near an approach to a definition as can be reached.

THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

Major-General Sir Peter Lumsden, the Chief of the Commission for examining and settling the north-west frontier of Afghanistan, arrived in London at six o'clock last Saturday evening. He was met at Charing-cross station by a large number of friends, including Lord Chelmsford, Lord Strathnairn, Lord Napier of Magdala, Field-Marshal Sir Peter Grant, and other officers of distinction, and was loudly cheered on alighting from the train, and by a crowd outside the station.

Her Majesty the Queen last week honoured our Special Artist, Mr. William Simpson, with an express invitation to visit her at Balmoral Castle; and the Court Circular of Wednesday, July 3, contains the announcement that on that day "Mr. W. Simpson arrived, and in the evening had the honour of submitting to her Majesty's inspection drawings of various places on the line of the Russian and Afghan frontier, and also in Persia." We may here mention that Mr. Simpson, on his way home from Central Asia, having crossed the Black Sea to Odessa, came through Berlin, where her Imperial and Royal Highness, the Princess Imperial of Germany and Prussia (our Princess Royal), hearing that he was there, invited him to call upon her, and expressed her interest in the task in which he had been employed. A few days since, Mr. Simpson, by special invitation, went to Marlborough House and showed his Sketches to the Prince and Princess of Wales, and to Prince Albert Victor, Prince George, and the three young Princesses.

Two of the remaining Sketches drawn by Mr. Simpson during his sojourn at Bala Murghab, from December to the middle of February, are presented in this Number of our Journal. One is that of the old fort of Bala Murghab, which has been sufficiently described. The other shows an interesting scene in the dwelling of a Jamsheedie family at a village in that neighbourhood, where Surgeon C. W. Owen, the principal medical officer attached to the expedition of Sir Peter Lumsden, performed an operation for the relief of a distressed patient. Mr. Simpson, writing to us at that time, and describing the work of "the doctor in the Murghab valley," said of Surgeon Owen that "he has been doing much good among the native populations. I went the other day with Dr. Owen to a village in the neighbourhood to see him operate on a young woman, who had fallen some time ago into the fire and burnt the right side of her face. It was healed up, but the shrivelled skin had contracted and made the eye a hideous thing. The operation is one known as 'plastic,' the object being to take away the contracting power of the skin, so that the eye might be brought back to something like its original condition. For this purpose incisions were made above and below the eye, and the skin was separated; a portion of skin from the girl's arm was removed, and was placed on the space made by each incision; these I learn since have taken root, so that the wounds made will, when healed, be smooth and regular. A plan was adopted to prevent the eye from opening till the healing process is complete, and it is expected that it will then be restored to something like its former appearance. The operation was, of course, performed under chloroform. The girl did at times moan during the operation, and her female friends thought she was suffering; they called out her name soothingly, which was 'Gulsaman,' or 'Bosom Flower.' Afterwards, they were all astonished when the girl told them that she had never felt anything. This is the first time that such operations have been performed in this out-of-the-way region."

THE SWANAGE RAILWAY.

The opening, on the 20th ult., of the new short line of railway from Wareham to Swanage, on the Dorsetshire Coast, has brought within easy reach of London one of the most agreeable places of seaside recreation in the South of England. Swanage is situated in a little bay at the foot of the lofty chalk hills of the Purbeck district, which form cliffs, with intermixed strata of greensand, marble, shell, and rocks presenting an interesting geological study. The stone quarries are of considerable importance. The road from Wareham, eleven miles distant, passes by the ruins of Corfe Castle, and through a chasm in the hill-range. The railway, which is connected with the main line of the London and South-Western Company at Wareham, was designed by Messrs. Galbraith and Church, engineers to that company. Mr. Harold Jones has been the executive engineer on behalf of that firm. The contractors for the railway were Messrs. Curry and Reeves, of Westminster, at a cost of rather less than £77,000, not including rails and stations. There is a station at Corfe Castle, and one at Swanage, built by Messrs. Bull and Sons, of Southampton. The line goes through some deep cuttings, over two large iron viaducts, and at Corfe is carried over a bridge of four massive arches. The opening was celebrated at Swanage with due tokens of local festivity; and addresses were presented to Mr. Burt and Mr. J. C. Robinson, directors, congratulating them upon the accomplishment of the scheme.

IN THE ROW, HYDE PARK.

The pleasant afternoon lounge beneath the trees in the Park, where equestrians taking their mild exercise in Rotten Row, and family parties in the carriages driving round, afford an interesting spectacle to persons of their acquaintance, is an agreeable feature of London in June. Our Artist has studied the character and humours of this assembly of "people in society," and even the costume of the present season, with as much accuracy as could be expected; and the truthfulness of his representation, in all important particulars, will be generally perceived. The reader will not be in need of any verbal commentary to interpret the various moods and tempers, sociable or solitary, of the ladies and gentlemen here spending a leisure hour in a fashionable place of resort, where friendly greetings and easy conversation, if they are so disposed, may be enjoyed more conveniently than at night in the crowded drawing-rooms. The fresh air, the foliage, and the grassy spaces beyond, have a soothing effect upon nerves jaded with the pursuits of town life and with the keeping of late hours, to say nothing of political and social ambitions, and of personal or domestic cares.

The British Dairy Farmers' Association on the 4th inst. inaugurated its first conference out of London by a visit to Nantwich, Cheshire. Lord Vernon, president of the British Dairy Farmers' Association, occupied the chair.

A sewer burst close to Sloane-street, Chelsea, on Monday afternoon, and the water broke into the District Railway, which was flooded for some time near the station. It made way also into several houses in Lower Chelsea and in Lowndes-square. Much mischief was also done at Chelsea Barracks.

A Melbourne telegram states that the manager and accountant of the suburban branch of the National Bank of Australasia, upon entering the premises at ten o'clock on the morning of the 3rd inst., were attacked and overpowered by three masked men, who succeeded in making their escape after taking a sum of £1100.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

Paris, Tuesday, June 9.

The Brisson Cabinet is winning the confidence of the Opportunists and losing that of the Radicals. The anger of the latter is comprehensible, for, thinking to become the majority, thanks to the new Radical Cabinet, they find themselves once more in the minority. In the matter of the impeachment of the Ferry Ministry, the Cabinet took a conciliatory attitude, deprecated sterile recriminations and advocated union amongst Republicans. The debate on Thursday was nevertheless long and tumultuous. M. Ferry was accused of duplicity, roguery, lying, impudence, and treason. M. Delafosse showed that M. Ferry had begun the war with China without necessity, and that the peace signed with China to-day is less advantageous than the peace offered by China after Bac-Lé. The proposition of impeachment was rejected by 322 votes against 153. The new electoral law has been passed by the Chamber in conformity with the modifications introduced by the Senate. The new elections will therefore take place by the scrutin de liste; there will be one deputy for every 70,000 inhabitants; but in these 70,000, foreigners will not be allowed to count. The present Chamber has 557 members, the new Chamber will have 584. The Senate has 300 members; so that in a congress of the two Houses, it will not in future have great influence.

When first formulated, the idea of a grand Centenary Exhibition in 1889 was received in France with acclamation. It was indeed hinted that some Monarchical and Imperial Powers would look askance at the celebration of the centenary of a principle the triumph of which meant their downfall. On the other hand, 1789, regarded merely as the beginning of a new era of intellectual, moral and material emancipation, of liberty, is a date which will ever remain glorious in the history of civilisation; the appeal of France to other nations to take part in this exhibition was evidently disinterested; and so the adhesions and marks of sympathy were numerous. The project of an exhibition having been thus accepted, measures were taken for choosing a site and drawing up plans. Then suddenly, no more was heard about the matter. For many weeks the French press has remained silent, and in reality nothing has been done. The reason, it appears, is that a band of men, who make politics a pretext for speculation, have been endeavouring to monopolise the Universal Exhibition for their own exclusive advantage. At last a few of the independent newspapers—and, above all, Le Petit Journal, which has the colossal circulation of over 900,000 copies, and of course great influence—have begun to protest against this prolonged hesitation, and proposed the separation of the Exhibition from politics altogether. The non-political combination would be M. De Lesseps president of the centenary, the Minister of Commerce president of the committee, and M. Georges Berger commissioner-general. This plan satisfies the public; but its adoption would ruin the politico-financial syndicate in question; and so the intriguing continues, and the President of the Republic is getting dragged into the discussion.

The Clerical party has taken the laicisation of the Panthéon as a declaration of war on the part of the new Cabinet, and an active newspaper warfare is going on between the organs of the Republic and the organs of the Church. The Archbishop of Paris has written a very violent protestation against "this arbitrary act of force accomplished under pressure of the mob." The Archbishop abuses the Republic in very violent terms, and prophesies that the new régime, "which promised liberty for all, will see such excesses that its very name will become synonymous with tyranny and license." M. Goblet, the Minister of Public Worship, has replied, and called the Archbishop to order for his strong language and regrettable attitude, which, he says, is not likely "to pacify the relations between the State and the Church."

The Catholics, furious at having lost such a great convert as Victor Hugo—a loss which they attribute to the influence of the Freemasons—have insinuated in some of their journals that Victor Hugo did ask to see a priest before he died, but that his family prevented him. In the Rappel M. Lockroy and the Drs. See and Vulpian formally deny this statement.—The last number of the Revue félibrienne contains an article proving that Gordon, the hero of Khartoum, comes of a family of French origin established centuries ago at Quercy. The elder branch became extinct in 1606 in the person of Antoine De Gourdon, Marquis De Cenevières. Certain collateral branches still exist, but most of them have become merged in the houses of Fontanges, Durfort-Boissière, and Crussol D'Uzès.—At the sale of M. Gréau's very important collection of antique bronzes, the British Museum bought a Livia with the attributes of Juno for 12,000 francs; the Louvre, and the Museum of Lyons also bought largely. The highest prices were paid by M. Basilewsky—27,500 francs for a bust of Alexander found at Pompeii, and 38,000 francs for a goddess found at Athens. A Gaulish wild-boar, a fine bronze "described by the poet Archias in the time of Cicero," says the catalogue, was bought by the Louvre for 14,000 francs.—Zola's new novel is to be called L'Œuvre: it will be a study of the artistic world, a contrast of the painters of the old school and of the new, with details of studio life, Hôtel Drouot, art exhibitions, &c.—M. Jules Ferry has returned to Paris, where, according to some, he will henceforward occupy the position of a second Emile Ollivier.

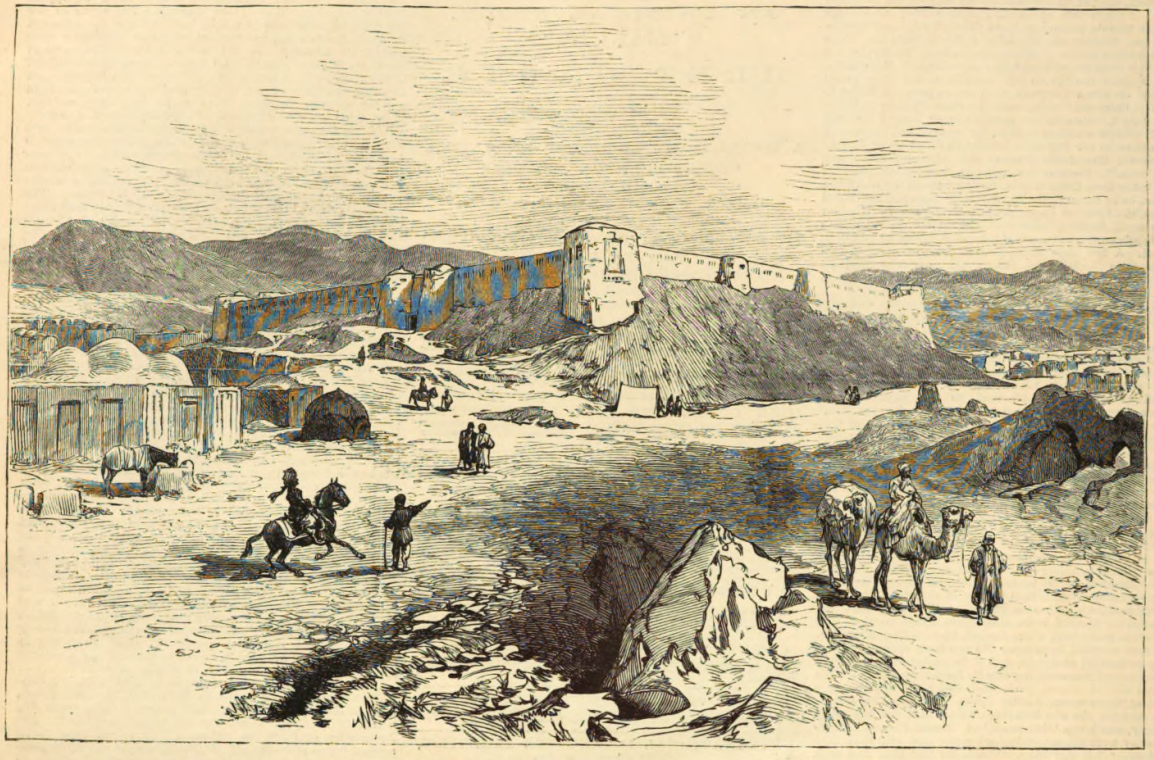
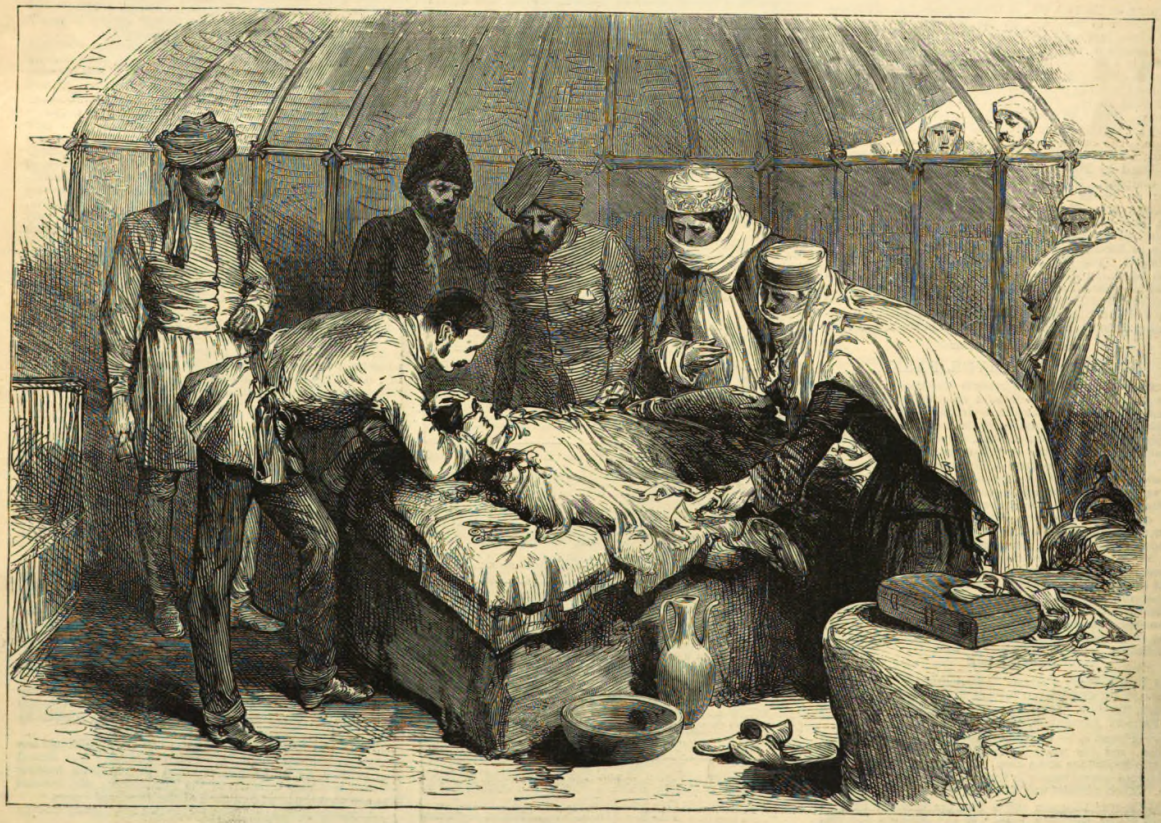
King Humbert has decided to bestow a Royal gift on Naples. In the façade of the Royal Palace in the Piazza Plebiscito there are eight niches intended for statues the emptiness of which has always been an eyesore. The King has given orders to eight Neapolitan sculptors to execute statues for these niches, the subjects being the chief founders of dynasties and rulers of South Italy—an historical series.



The Emperor William drove out last Saturday for the first time since his recent illness, and was greeted most enthusiastically at every point. His Majesty was in an open carriage and looked remarkably well. The Crown Princess, her daughters, Princesses Victoria, Sophia, and Margaret, and Prince William, went to Berlin on Saturday to attend the marriage of Princess Elizabeth Radziwill, the daughter of the Emperor's aide-de-camp, to Count Potocki. Among the numerous handsome presents to the bride were two given by the Emperor. The Prince of Hohenzollern was buried on Saturday at Sigmaringen, the funeral being attended by the Crown Prince and numerous other distinguished persons.

Daniel Murphy, a Roman Catholic merchant of San Francisco, who was a munificent subscriber to Catholic charities, died on the 3rd inst. He was created a Marquis by the Pope, in recognition of his benevolent gifts.



From Durban we learn that the Transvaal Volksraad has passed a resolution disqualifying all the persons who signed the petition for annexation to Great Britain from holding office or becoming members of the Legislature. Mr. Joubert has accepted the chief command of the Transvaal forces.

THE LATE QUEEN EMMA OF THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

THE LATE QUEEN EMMA.

The death, on April 25, at Honolulu, of Emma Kaleleonalani, Queen Dowager of Hawaii or the Sandwich Islands, has occasioned much regret. This lady, who had received an English education, visited Europe nearly twenty years ago, leaving her home in May, 1865, and returning in October, 1866; she made many friends in England, one among them being Queen Victoria, with whom she has often since corresponded. She was born in January, 1836, the daughter of Naea, a chief of high rank, her mother being Fanny Young Kekelaokalani, niece to King Kamehameha I. She was brought up in the house of Dr. T. C. B. Rooke, an English physician, who had married her aunt, Grace Kamaikui Young, sister to Fanny Young Kekelaokalani. Dr. Rooke was a native of Hertfordshire, well connected, having two brothers in the Indian Army; he had studied for the medical profession in London, and went out to the Sandwich Islands in 1830; there he married, and resided till his death, in 1858. The future Queen received instruction in her girlhood from Mr. and Mrs. Cooke, directors of the Royal School for children of native chiefs, and from a private governess, Mrs. Von Pfister, a German lady. In 1856, she was married to the late King Kamehameha IV. (Alexander Liholiho), and as Queen Consort, till the lamented death of her husband, in 1863, shared all his plans and efforts to promote the welfare of the people. They had one child, a little boy, who was taken from them by a short illness at four years of age, and whose death was soon followed by that of his father.

The funeral, of which we give some Illustrations, was attended by many of the chief personages at Honolulu, and by a large assemblage of the people. The coffin lay in state, covered with a purple pall richly embroidered, in a room of the late Queen's house, which is in Nuuanu-street, and the garden-front of which is shown in one of our Views. Young women or girls, prostrate or kneeling on the ground outside the house, uttered wailing cries of lamentation, as prescribed by native custom. Within the house, or in the verandah, were the friends of the deceased, including Princess Liliuokalani, Princess Likelike, Governor Dominis, and several officers of the King's Staff and Household. At eight o'clock in the evening, the coffin was placed on the hearse, and was conducted by a torchlight procession, with a military escort, to Kawaiahao church, where the clergy performed the funeral service. The figures of attendants, shown in our correspondent's sketches, are represented as holding the ceremonial "kahilis," which are maces surmounted with a splendid arrangement of plumes, black, white, crimson, or yellow, made of the precious dyed feathers of a famous Hawaiian bird which has become extinct. The hearse or bier was drawn all the way by members of the Poola Society; and the effect of this gorgeous plumage under the flashing torchlight was very beautiful. A Portrait of the late Queen Emma is included among our Illustrations.

HAYSMAN'S INTERNATIONAL COLLEGE.

The International College, for which a building is now being erected adjacent to the Finchley-road station, in the parish of Hampstead, is intended to become the central institution for the extension of "Haysman's System of International Education (founded 1862) to Daily Pupils, Daily Boarders, and Weekly Boarders" from all parts of London. Mr. James Haysman, the inventor of this system, was born in 1839, apprenticed to the scholastic profession in 1852, and was a successful student at St. Mark's College during 1858 and 1859. In 1864 he built the East London College, which, with its branches at Hackney, Bow, and Poplar, was speedily filled. In 1866 he sought for premises in Paris, with the view of starting his International scheme, and in 1867 the Anglo-French College, at Burgess-hill, Finchley-road, London, was founded. The special feature of Mr. Haysman's system of education is that the pupils can, at any time, entirely at the discretion of their parents, go from England to France or Germany, and enter with special advantages into old-established French and German schools, which have been adapted, by Mr. Haysman's long connection with them, to the proper dieting, care, and education of English boys. It is an important feature of the scheme that never more than ten per cent, and often not more than six per cent, of the pupils at these foreign schools are English, thus avoiding the possibility of an English colony being, so to speak, established at each school, to the detriment of the study and practice of the foreign language. We are informed that hitherto this scheme has met with great success, many thousands of English youths having been benefited by it. Mr. Haysman has sons of his own, and he hopes that, in the immediate future, their experience of the enlargement of the scheme to daily pupils, on the foundation that he has already laid, may result in its rapid and beneficial development. The system appears to be well planned in all its details, and especially suitable for that large part of the middle-class whose sons must hope to gain their livelihood in mercantile business, and in other pursuits, where a practical acquaintance with Continental languages is absolutely necessary for success.

The buildings now being erected are from the designs of Mr. Banister Fletcher, F.R.I.B.A., 29, New Bridge-street, Ludgate-circus. The builders are Messrs. Aldridge and Jenvey, of Cork-street, Camberwell.

The Cambridge Mathematical Tripos List will be published in the Senate-House this day (Saturday).

The Town Council of Edinburgh, at a meeting held on Tuesday, resolved to confer upon the Earl of Aberdeen the freedom of the city.

In appreciation of his services in connection with the Corrupt Practices and Reform Bills, the dignity of a Privy Councillor has been conferred on Sir H. James, Attorney-General.

The Queen has approved of the appointment of General Lord Wolseley, at present in command of her Majesty's forces in Egypt, to be one of the Knights of the Order of St. Patrick, in the room of the late Lord O'Hagan.

In London last week 2409 births and 1521 deaths were registered. Allowing for increase of population, the births were 236, and the deaths 1, below the average numbers in the corresponding weeks of the last ten years.

Sir Frederick Bramwell, President of the Institution of Civil Engineers, and Lady Leonora Bramwell, gave a conversazione on the 5th inst. at the International Inventions Exhibition, which was attended by a brilliant company.

Thirteen vessels forming part of the Evolutionary Fleet sailed on Tuesday for Bantry Bay, under the command of Admiral Sir G. Phipps Hornby. They are to be joined by a number of other vessels, comprising every variety of which the British Navy is composed.

On the occasion of the celebration of the silver jubilee of Monsignor Goddard, Roman Catholic priest at Chiselhurst, a touching letter was read from the ex-Empress Eugénie, in which, after referring to the fact that the little Church of St. Mary contains the remains of those dear to her, she says, "I am left alone, the sole remnant of a shipwreck, which proves how fragile and vain are the grandeurs of this world."

OBITUARY.

SIR ROBERT HAY, BART.

Sir Robert Hay, eighth Baronet of Smithfield and Hagstoun, died on the 30th ult., at Lyons, France, aged sixty. He was the third but eldest surviving son of Sir Adam Hay, the seventh Baronet, and succeeded to the title on the death of his father, Jan. 18, 1867. Sir Robert was born May 8, 1825, and married, Aug. 3, 1853, Sally, daughter of Mr. Alexander Duncan, of Providence, Rhode Island, North America, and by her leaves four sons and two daughters. The deceased Baronet was a Deputy Lieutenant for the county of Peebles, and was formerly Major in the Midlothian Rifle Volunteers. He is succeeded by his eldest son and heir, now Sir John Adam Hay, the ninth Baronet, Major 3rd Volunteer Battalion Royal Scots Lothian Regiment, formerly Lieutenant in the Scots Guards, who married, in 1881, Miss Anne Salisbury Mary Meliora, daughter of Sir Robert John Milliken Napier, eighth Baronet of Napier, and has a son and heir, Duncan Edwin, born in 1882.

SIR JULIUS BENEDICT.

Sir Julius Benedict died on the 5th inst., after a long illness, from which, however, he appeared to be recovering a few days before his death, having been out for a drive on the Wednesday previous. He was born at Stuttgart in 1804, and, after studying under Hummel at Weimar, he became, when little more than sixteen years old, a pupil in pianoforte playing and composition of Weber. Benedict was early known as a skilful pianist and a successful composer. When quite young he produced stage works in Germany and Italy. In 1835 he came to London, and here his chief career has been passed. Several English operas were produced by him. "The Gipsy's Warning," "The Brides of Venice," "The Crusaders," and "The Lily of Killarney," have all been successful, especially the last. In 1850 Benedict went with Jenny Lind to America, and directed the concerts given by her there. In 1871 he received the honour of knighthood. Besides his operas, he has produced some very fine cantatas and a grand oratorio, "St. Peter," brought out at the Birmingham Festival of 1870. In addition to these works, a large quantity of pianoforte and vocal music remains to attest the versatility and activity of the deceased composer. Benedict also acted for many years as conductor of the Norwich Festivals and of various operatic and concert performances; and as a pianoforte accompanist he was especially eminent. Besides his professional attainments, Sir Julius Benedict was a man of large and varied acquirements — a most genial and intelligent companion.

SIR WILLIAM MUIR MUIR.

Surgeon-General Sir William Muir Muir, K.C.B., Officer of the Legion of Honour, Honorary Physician to the Queen, and Director-General of the Army Medical Department, died at his residence, Oak Lodge, Blackheath Park, on the 2nd inst., aged sixty-six. Sir William was born in 1819, took his degree of M.D. in 1840, and became Assistant Surgeon in the Army in 1842. He served twenty-four years in foreign service—in the Crimea, Turkey, the Mauritius, India, China, and North America—and became Surgeon-General in 1873, in which year he was nominated a Knight Commander of the Bath. He married, in 1875, Rachel Stanley, daughter of the Rev. George Heaton.

MR. CHARLES FIESCHIE HENEAGE.

Mr. Charles Fieschie Heneage, Gentleman Usher of her Majesty's Privy Chamber, died on the 1st inst., aged eighty. He was eldest son of the late Mr. Thomas Fieschie Heneage, by the Hon. Arabella Pelham, his wife, daughter of the first Lord Yarborough, and married, in 1827, the Hon. Louisa Elizabeth Graves, daughter of the second Lord Graves; by her, who died 1868, he leaves two sons and two daughters.

The twenty-second annual Metropolitan Horse Show has been held this week at the Agricultural Hall, Islington. The entries outnumbered those of any previous exhibition.

Sir Peter Lumsden arrived in London last Saturday evening, and was met at Charing-cross station by a large and distinguished company, who welcomed him with enthusiastic cheers. He afterwards attended the State dinner given by the Secretary for India.

There was a large and distinguished company present on Thursday week at the usual Fourth of June Celebration at Eton College. After the orations Dr. Hornby entertained the visitors at luncheon. In the afternoon a cricket-match was played, and in the evening the procession of boats took place.

There were ten runners for the Oaks Stakes at Epsom, Archer bringing in first Lord Cadogan's Lonely, Lord Zetland's St. Helena being second, and Lord Rosebery's Cipollina third. Mr. R. Peck's Philosophy won the Acorn Stakes.

In the absence of the Lord Mayor, Mr. Samuel Morley, M.P., presided at a public meeting held at the Mansion House on the 5th inst., in aid of a fund for completing a new wing now being added to the Royal Hospital for Chest Diseases in the City-road, with a view of providing seventy additional beds in that institution.

The Friday evening's discourse at the Royal Institution on the 5th inst., the last of the season, was given by Professor Dewar. The subject title as announced was "Liquid air, and the zero of absolute temperature." In the course of the lecture a considerable range of experiments were shown, and the climax of the discourse was the production of liquid air.

The Hon. J. Russell Lowell, lately American Minister, left London on Sunday evening, a large number of friends assembling at Euston Station to bid him adieu. After visiting the Duke of Westminster at Eaton Hall, Cheshire, he sailed from Liverpool for Boston on Wednesday.—At a banquet given on the 3rd inst. at the Mansion House to her Majesty's Judges, Mr. Phelps, the new American Minister, made his first public appearance in this country. He acknowledged the welcome he had received in England, and spoke of the sympathy and fraternity that existed between the people of the United States and the English as largely resulting from the great intercourse between the two peoples. Speaking as a lawyer, he said in hundreds of courts, and among thousands of lawyers and Judges who never saw and never will see the faces of the English Judges, their names to-day are household words, and their decisions are the subject of constant study and of constant instruction. In no one thing are the British people to be more largely congratulated than on their judiciary. Never did the judgments of the courts command higher regard and more complete consideration than they do to-day. It is the justice done in the land that makes your commerce possible; it is that justice which has built up British liberties.

CITY ECHOES.

Wednesday, June 10.

The Ministerial crisis has had a disturbing effect upon all business. In the Stock Markets a severe fall has been general. The Money Market cannot, however, be made perceptibly firmer, apparently, as the rate of discount is still under 1 per cent per annum. Agricultural interests have, however, benefited by a copious fall of rain after a week of great heat. A return of hot weather would make vegetation grow apace, and thus would there be promise of all agricultural interests making further progress this year. Mercantile and manufacturing business does not, however, improve, if we may base a general conclusion upon the figures just published as to our foreign and colonial trade so far this year.

The Eastern and Eastern Extension Telegraph Companies are doing well in connection with the causes for anxiety as to our affairs in Egypt and India. So far this year—that is, to the end of May—the Eastern Company have received £28,045 more than for the corresponding period of last year; and the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company £21,568 more. This is a gain of about 10 per cent, and the shares of the respective companies have correspondingly risen. Eastern shares have within the past few weeks gone up from 10 to 11¾, and Extension shares from 11½ to 12¾.

The holders of the Costa Rica bonds have accepted terms of settlement. A new 5 per cent bond is to be created, and to be exchanged for the present bonds in the proportion of £50 of the new bonds for each £100 of old bonds. Arrear coupons are to be exchanged for shares in a company which is designed to construct an important railway in Costa Rica. The interest of the new bonds is to be secured on the customs revenue, but as such revenue is, up to Jan. 1, 1888, assigned to the liquidation of the internal debt, the Railway Company are to pay interest up to that date.

Hudson's Bay shareholders are to receive no dividend in respect of the year just closed, a result mainly due, no doubt, to the extraordinarily severe fall in the prices realised for furs at the recent sales. The report will be issued almost at once.

The Canadian Government have just converted a 5 per cent loan of several millions into 4 per cent bonds, thus effecting a very substantial further saving in debt charge.

The South Australian loan of £1,560,400 has been placed at £100 6s. and upwards per cent.

Owing to falling off of water revenue, due it may be supposed to the fresh basis of calculation arising from recent litigation, the Southwark and Vauxhall Water Company's dividend for the past half-year is to be at the rate of 7 per cent per annum, as compared with 8 and 8½ for some time past.

The directors of the Darlington Steel and Iron Company, Limited, have made their report for the past year. It is not bad in its way; but there is still no dividend for the ordinary shareholder. This company was established in 1872, and underwent reconstruction in 1882.

For the past half-year the dividend of the Bank of British North America is to be 6 per cent per annum, a rate which the company has maintained since 1881.

The Suez Canal dividend of 62·25 francs per share of 500 francs, is in addition to the 5 per cent interest paid by coupon. For 1883 the excess was 63·65 francs.

BENEVOLENT OBJECTS.

Princess Louise will lay the foundation-stone of the new out-patient department of the Victoria Hospital for Sick Children on Tuesday, the 23rd inst.

An anonymous donor has given £10,000 to the Hull General Infirmary, and £5000 each to the two orphan homes in that borough.

The summer fête at the Little Boys' Home at Farningham was celebrated very successfully last Saturday, in spite of the wet weather which prevailed throughout the morning.

An amateur dramatic performance, in aid of the funds of the Hospital for Epilepsy and Paralysis, will be given this (Saturday) evening at St. George's Hall, Langham-place.

The Lord Mayor on Wednesday presided at a meeting held at the Mansion House on behalf of the Mary Wardell Convalescent Home for Scarlet Fever, of which the Princess of Wales is patroness.

The committee of the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours have consented, on the invitation of the Lady Mayoress, to give a representation of "The Masque of Painters" at the Mansion House on June 25, in aid of the Royal Hospital for Children and Women in the Waterloo-bridge-road.

On Thursday and Friday a sale of work from the Gentlewomen's Self-Help Institute was held at No. 23, Rutland-gate, by permission of Lord and Lady Egerton of Tatton. The work consists of fancy and useful articles, and also of clothing for the poor, all being the work of necessitous ladies, and sold for their benefit.

Baroness Burdett-Coutts on the 4th inst. opened a bazaar at the Cutlers' Hall, Sheffield, in aid of the funds of the Jessop's Hospital for Women. The hospital, which cost upwards of £30,000, was presented to the town by Mr. Jessop, steel manufacturer. To meet the demands upon it, all the wards were recently opened, and to cover the increased cost the bazaar was held.

The celebration of the fifty-eighth anniversary festival of the Licensed Victuallers' Asylum took place at the Crystal Palace on Tuesday evening. Mr. H. A. Simonds, chairman of the Country Brewers' Society, took the chair, and was supported by about 600 gentlemen, the galleries being filled by ladies. The secretary announced subscriptions amounting to £4500, more than one fourth of which had been collected by the chairman and his friends.

A meeting to take steps for raising £100,000 for the enlargement of the Hospital for Women, Soho-square, was held last Saturday afternoon in Grosvenor House, the Duke of Westminster presiding. The meeting was addressed by the Earl of Aberdeen, the Bishop of Derry, Dr. Protheroe Smith, and others; and a resolution to promote the appeal was unanimously adopted.

A ballad concert, under the patronage of the Duchess of Edinburgh, Princess Louise, and others, is announced for the 16th inst. at Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, in aid of the funds of the Society (of 28, Finsbury-circus) for providing Artificial Limbs and Surgical Appliances to Poor Cripples. Madame Patey, Signor Foli, and several other well-known artistes are engaged, and Mr. Sidney Naylor will conduct.

"The Conversion of England," an historical drama, describing the mission of St. Augustine of Canterbury to Ethelbert, King of Kent, and the conversion of the Anglo-Saxons to Christianity, will be enacted at St. Peter's Schools, Vauxhall, on Thursday evening, July 2, and Friday evening, July 3. The characters will be represented by divers persons connected with the church, supported by a chorus of the St. Peter's choir. Tickets of admission to be obtained of Miss Herbert, the Parsonage, Vauxhall, S.E. Prices on Friday, 5s.; on Thursday, 2s. 6d. The profits will be given to the parochial charities.

MUSIC.

FRENCH OPERA AT THE GAIETY THEATRE.

The season of French performances under the direction of Mr. M. L. Mayer opened last Saturday evening with M. Delibes' "Lakmé," a work that was originally produced at the Paris Opéra Comique in 1883, when the title-character was sustained by Mdlle. Van Zandt, as it is in the present series of London representations. The composer of "Lakmé" has recently acquired celebrity by several works, this being the most important of them.

The scene of the opera is laid in one of the English possessions in India, the action taking place in our own times. Lakmé is a beautiful young girl, daughter of Nilakantha, a Brahminical priest, the grounds of whose temple are entered by an inquisitive group of English, comprising two officers, Gérald and Frédéric, Ellen, the daughter, and Rose, the niece of the Governor (the young ladies being respectively engaged to the young officers), and Mrs. Bentson, the gouvernante. Gérald remains alone in the gardens sketching, and encounters Lakmé, an instantaneous and mutual passion ensuing. His sacrilegious intrusion and Lakmé's love become known to Nilakantha, who vows revenge, and, finding an opportunity when Gérald is detached from his friends, the priest stabs the young officer, whom he leaves for dead. The wounded man is secretly succoured by Lakmé, who has him conveyed to a retreat in the recesses of a forest, where she watches his recovery, endeavouring to convert him to her faith and to secure her union with him. During her temporary absence, Frédéric succeeds in tracing his friend, whom he rouses to a sense of duty both as an engaged lover and an officer who is due with his regiment in an impending engagement with rebels. Lakmé, in despair, suddenly snatches and swallows a leaf from a poison tree, and speedily expires, her lover being safe from her father's vengeance, having drunk with her from the sacred cup. There is not much incident in the plot, which we have given from the original book. In Saturday's representation the characters of the English ladies, and a quintet in which they are concerned, in the first act, were omitted.

M. Delibes' music, without possessing very special dramatic power, has touches of a distinctive individuality, and a French tone, that are welcome in days when there is so little distinguishing nationality in music. In the first act, the Brahminical choral music, Lakmé's characteristic Prayer, a graceful duet for her and her attendant, Mallika, a beautiful air, "Fantasies aux divins mensonges," for Gérald, and a fine duet for him and Lakmé, are notable features. The second act contains some bright choral and ballet music in the opening market-scene, followed by some expressive stanzas addressed by Nilakantha to Lakmé, and her delivery of the "Légende de la fille de Paria," an elaborate scena, with many florid bravura passages; a fine love-duet for her and Gérald being an important feature of this portion of the opera. The third act opens with a "Berceuse," sung by Lakmé while watching over the wounded Gérald. This simple piece is followed by more important music for the two, the final duet for them, in which her despairing love and his vacillating character are well expressed, being one of the important numbers of the work. In the orchestral features of his score, M. Delibes manifests much skill in the command over varied and characteristic effects. The performance of Mdlle. Van Zandt as Lakmé was of transcendent excellence, both vocally and dramatically. Her voice is at once brilliant and sympathetic in quality. She commands an exceptionally high compass, and executes bravura passages with refined skill. Her success was very great. Mdlle. Hamann was thoroughly efficient as Mallika, and MM. Dupuy and Carroul were eminently successful, respectively, as Gérald and Nilakantha. The former gentleman has a resonant tenor voice, which he uses with judgment and taste, both in expressive and declamatory passages; the representative of Nilakantha possessing an excellent baritone voice, which told with great effect in all his music, especially in the stanzas addressed to Lakmé, which were very finely delivered. M. Soulacroix (formerly of the Royal Italian Opera) sang and acted well as Frédéric. A fine orchestra—comprising many of our best instrumentalists—and an efficient chorus (from the Brussels Opera) are associated in the performance of "Lakmé," which was skilfully conducted by Signor Bevignani. The composer was called forward at the close of the opera.

Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir gave the first of two concerts at St. James's Hall, on Thursday week, when he resumed the office of conductor, which he had temporarily resigned to Mr. Randegger after the dissolution of the society in 1880. Its reorganisation soon followed, and the institution is now apparently in a condition of as great efficiency as at any past period. Its rendering of unaccompanied part-music at last week's concert was in every respect admirable. Vocal solos were contributed by Miss Perugini and Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. John Dunn contributed some skilful violin playing.

The opening of the Albert Palace, Battersea Park, on Saturday last, included musical performances, among which was that of a new "Dedication Ode," the words (appropriate to the occasion) by Mr. W. A. Barrett, the music composed by Mr. A. J. Caldicott. The score is for soprano and baritone solo, chorus, and orchestra. There is some very effective writing in the several movements of which the ode consists; and a good climax is obtained in the final chorus, closing with the chorale "Gotha," composed by the late Prince Consort, and introduced by special permission of her Majesty. The soloists in Saturday's performance of the cantata were Madame Valleria and Mr. Thorndike, and it was directed by the composer, who is appointed conductor to the institution.

Messrs. John Broadwood and Sons, the eminent pianoforte makers, have issued a very interesting pamphlet in reference to their exhibits at the International Inventions Exhibition. It contains much important information as to the progressive improvements in the art (for it is more an art than a manufacture) of constructing pianofortes, in which Messrs. Broadwood have been eminent for more than a century. Instruments of various kinds and dates are exhibited by Messrs. Broadwood, besides other interesting objects, among them being the letter of Beethoven, dated Feb. 3, 1818, conveying his enthusiastic thanks to the firm for their present to him of a grand pianoforte of their make.

A pianoforte recital was given in the music-room of the International Inventions Exhibition last week, when the excellence of the "Sostenente" pianos of Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons was manifested by performances given by Signor Bisaccia.

The celebrated Strauss band, from Vienna, is continuing its performances at South Kensington. It is in its spirited execution of bright dance music that this orchestra is heard to most advantage. In order to give Herr Strauss the opportunity of playing some of the finer portions of his répertoire less suited to open-air performance, the band played on Tuesday in the Royal Albert Hall instead of in the gardens.

Mr. Herbert Reeves, son of our great tenor and himself a vocalist of high accomplishments, gave his first concert at the Crystal Palace last Monday afternoon, when his own refined singing and that of his father were features in a long programme to which several other eminent artists, vocal and instrumental, contributed. The Crystal Palace band, conducted by Mr. Manns, performed orchestral pieces, and recitations were given by Mr. Henry Irving, Mr. W. Terriss, and Mr. J. L. Toole.

The Richter concerts are within two of the close of the eleventh season. The seventh performance of the series took place at St. James's Hall last Monday evening, when the programme included two novelties, as far as these concerts concerned. The first was an overture to "Hyperion," by Mr. E. D'Albert, in which there is some effective orchestral writing; this, and the general style, being strongly reflective of the influence of Wagner. The concert ended with Berlioz's "Symphonie Funèbre et Triomphale," which had before been given at a Crystal Palace Concert. The performance of these and of more familiar works at Monday's concert was of the usual excellence.

The American concert given at St. James's Hall on Tuesday night calls for but little comment beyond recording the excellent purpose for which it was given—the bringing of aid to the relief fund for sick and wounded soldiers in the Soudan. Mdlle. Van Zandt came from the Gaiety Theatre after her performance as Lakmé, and, in the costume of that character, sang the "Shadow Song" from "Dinorah" with brilliant effect. Miss Griswold, Madame A. Sterling, and several other vocalists (some amateurs), contributed to a long programme, which also included pianoforte performances by Lady Randolph Churchill, a violin solo by Miss N. Carpenter, and recitations by Miss A. Detchon. A new song, "Longing for Home," composed especially for the occasion by Sir A. Sullivan, was sung, with much effect, by Madame Sterling.

A big list of works was presented at the thirty-seventh performance of new compositions by the Musical Artists' Society, at Willis's Rooms, last Saturday evening.

Of the Balfe memorial concert at the Royal Albert Hall we must speak next week.

Miss Margaret Wild displayed special merit as a pianiste at the concert given by her last week at Prince's Hall. Miss Skinner (violinist) co-operated in the concert, and Miss C. Elliot contributed vocal pieces.

Madame Jenny Viard-Louis will give her fourth concert of the third series of Beethoven's works at Prince's Hall next Tuesday afternoon.

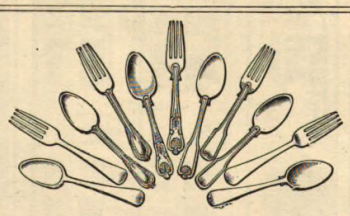
Madame Frickenhaus and Herr Josef Ludwig gave one of their chamber concerts at Prince's Hall, on Thursday; and Signor and Signora Samuelli gave a concert in the evening at Steinway Hall.

Colonel Henry Mapleson gave an invitation concert at St. James's Hall on Friday evening, June 12. Many distinguished artistes were announced to appear. During the evening a brief address was to be delivered by Dr. Carter Moffat on his invention the "ammoniaphone," for improving the tone and extending the range of the human voice.

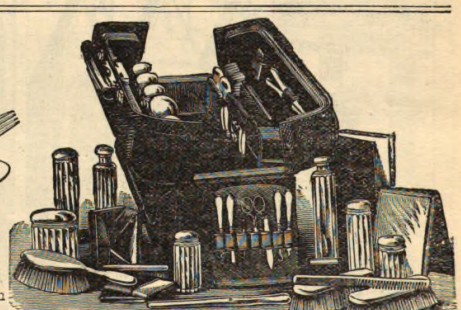
Covent-Garden Theatre is to be opened for Italian Opera on Tuesday next—the performances taking place each Tuesday and Saturday during the series. Madame Adelina Patti will be the principal attraction on each occasion.

Mr. W. H. Cummings has been appointed conductor of the Sacred Harmonic Society.

The honour of knighthood was conferred last Saturday on Dr. C. A. Cameron, Superintendent Medical Officer of Health for Dublin, in recognition of his distinguished services in the cause of sanitation. Dr. Cameron is president of the Royal College of Surgeons, Ireland, and vice-president of the Chemical Institute of Great Britain.



THE WINNER OF THE DERBY.



Melton, who won the "blue ribbon" after one of the closest and most exciting finishes ever seen, is the property of Lord Hastings, by whom he was bred at Melton Constable. He is by Master Kildare from Violet Melrose; and it may be noted that his sire, who is an Irish horse, earned his chief reputation at Epsom, where he beat a field of twenty-seven for the City and Suburban with 9 st. 2 lb. on his back. His dam was of no repute on the turf, and he is her first foal. Melton is a bright bay colt, standing about 15 hands 2½ in., which is rather below the average height of a Derby winner. As we were watching him being saddled for the all-important race of last Wednesday week, a young lady standing near us exclaimed, "What a dear little horse!" and really, her description was by no means inapt. Without possessing very much bone or power, he is a wonderfully elegant colt, full of quality: in fact, a perfect little gentleman all over; and his action, when fairly extended, is very taking, as he bounds along in light, corky style, and covers an immense amount of ground at each stride. No horse could well have a more creditable record, as his six essays have only resulted in one defeat, and, on that occasion, the verdict against him was but a head. He made his first appearance as a two-year-old in the New Stakes at Ascot. After this excellent beginning, he was made a very strong favourite for the July Stakes at Newmarket, in which, however, he sustained his solitary reverse, and just succumbed to Luminary, after an unusually long and punishing struggle. Soon after this he went amiss, and it was more than three months before he ran again. As a natural consequence, he was not much fancied for the Middle Park Plate, and his easy victory, under the full penalty of 7 lb. was specially meritorious. A fortnight later the Criterion Stakes proved a very easy task for him, as there was very little form amongst his seven opponents, and he retired into winter quarters with a great reputation, and was almost as good a favourite as Paradox for the great race at Epsom. He would doubtless have been even more fancied but for the fact that one of his fore-legs has never been perfectly sound, and it was the opinion of a great many people well qualified to judge of such a matter that he would never stand training. Matthew Dawson, however, always asserted that he should be able to give the colt a thorough preparation for the Derby. Melton naturally required very delicate and careful treatment, whilst Paradox did so well throughout the winter, and won such an extraordinary trial in the spring, that the Kingsclere champion ousted the Newmarket horse from his position at the head of the Derby quotations. The First and Second Spring Meetings at Newmarket, however, completely altered the tone of the betting again. The head victory of Paradox in the Two Thousand was gained in very slovenly fashion; whilst Melton carried off the Payne Stakes in gallant style, beating Kingswood, Lonely, and Present Times, without the semblance of an effort. Public opinion, therefore, veered completely round again, and, at the start for the Derby, 15 to 8 was the best offer against Melton, the comparatively long odds of 6 to 1 being easily obtainable about Paradox. The start was a remarkably good one; but the favourite began slowly, and they had gone fully a mile before he showed prominently in the race. A quarter of a mile from home, the struggle was reduced to a match between Paradox and Melton; and the former held such a nice lead, and was going so well, that it did not look as though he would ever be caught. From the distance, however, Melton made up his ground in remarkable fashion, and, drawing level about eighty yards from the winning-post, had an advantage of fully a neck in another couple of strides. Then Paradox came again, and the pair ran a desperate race home, the favourite winning by a short head, though the second was in front again immediately they had passed the judge's box. This was Archer's fourth Derby, the great jockey having previously won on Silvio, Bend Or, and Ioquois. Melton is the first horse that has ever secured the Middle Park Plate and the Derby; and he is now being backed at 2 to 1 for the St. Leger, in which race Paradox is not engaged.

THE DERBY OF 1791.

Our Engraving is copied from an aquatint by J. W. Edy, in the British Museum. This was published in 1792 by J. Harris, of Sweeting's-alley, and Broad-street. It was drawn after the picture by J. N. Sartorius, representing the race at Epsom for the Derby Sweepstakes on June 9, 1791. The inscription underneath the print states that the race was one of three-year old colts, carrying eight stone three pounds weight, and the winner was the Duke of Bedford's brown colt Eager (own brother to Fidget, son of Florizel and a Matchem mare). Nine out of the thirty-two subscribers ran horses, and eight at least of those horses were run by members of the Jockey Club; for the Prince of Wales ran two candidates (St. David by Saltram, and a colt by Highflyer), Lord Foley ran Vermin, Lord Egremont ran Proteus (as the colt by Mercury was called), Mr. Vernon ran a colt by Garrick, Sir Charles Bunbury ran Playfellow, Lord Grosvenor ran Gumcistus, and the Duke of Bedford won with Eager. The Duke of Bedford also won the Derby of 1789, with Skyscraper; and that of 1797, with a nameless colt, the son of Fidget and of a "Sister to Pharamond." This Duke, who died in 1802, was a crack gentleman-jockey, and figures in anecdotes of the Turf.

"A very 'chatty and witty' sort of book. . . . The 'Foreign Resident' 'knows a deal' and knows how to tell it. Everybody in London or out of London will rush for this book to see what is going on everywhere, to see what is said about themselves, and what is said about their friends, acquaintances, and 'people they have met.'"—Punch.

WANDA. By OUIDA. New Popular Edition. Post 8vo, illustrated boards, 2s.

"It is really exhilarating to come across a book like 'Lady Lovelace,' the workmanship is at once swift, decisive, and masterly. The novel is full of good things. It must be read to be appreciated."—Academy.

UNCLE JACK, and Other Stories. By WALTER BESANT, Author of "All Sorts and Conditions of Men," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.
"Without at all depreciating the originality and power of 'All Sorts and Conditions of Men,' or the finished skill of 'Dorothy Forster,' it may be said that 'Uncle Jack' shows that light touch, that ingenious contrivance, and that sparkle and vivacity which from the first animated the works of 'Bean and Rice.'"—Athenæum.

THE POETS' BEASTS. By PHIL ROBINSON, Author of "The Poet's Birds," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 7s. 6d.

NEW ARABIAN NIGHTS. By R. LOUIS STEVENSON. Post 8vo, illustrated boards, 2s.; crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.
"Exceedingly good and original; worthy of Poe or Balzac, or of the authors of the 'Thousand and One' themselves, and with not a little of the imaginative force of these masters."—Pall Mall.

A REGULAR PICKLE, by H. W. NESFIELD, is "as smart and brisk as it is possible to be."—Whitehall Review.
GEORGE REDWAY, York-street, Covent-garden.

A REGULAR PICKLE. By HENRY W. NESFIELD. "The only possible theory to explain the production of such a curious history is a desire upon the part of the author to show how innately depraved it is possible for a human being to be. Such studies may have some moral value, but it is difficult to discuss it."—Society.
GEORGE REDWAY, York-street, Covent-garden.

A REGULAR PICKLE. By HENRY W. NESFIELD. "It is a recognised fact that on taking up a book written by him, the reader is in for a delightful hour, during which his risible and humorous faculties will be pleasantly stimulated."—Whitehall Review.

EPPS'S COCOA. GRATEFUL—COMFORTING.
"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected Cocoa, Mr. Epps has provided our breakfast tables with a delicately-flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. Hundreds of subtle maladies are floating around us ready to attack wherever there is a weak point. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.

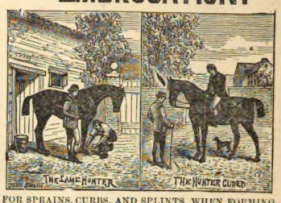
VALUABLE DISCOVERY for the HAIR. If your hair is turning grey, or white, or falling off, use "The Mexican Hair Renewer," for it will positively restore in every case Grey or White Hair to its original colour, without leaving the disagreeable smell of most "Restorers." It makes the hair charmingly beautiful, as well as promoting the growth of the hair on bald spots, where the glands are not decayed. "The Mexican Hair Renewer" is sold by Chemists and Perfumers everywhere, at 3s. 6d. per Bottle.

FLORILINE. For the Teeth and Breath. Is the best Liquid Dentifrice in the world; it thoroughly cleanses partially-decayed teeth from all parasites or living "animalculæ," leaving them pearly white, imparting a delightful fragrance to the breath. The Fragrant Floriline removes instantly all odours arising from a foul mouth or tobacco smoke; being partly composed of honey, soda, and extracts of sweet herbs and plants, it is perfectly delicious to the taste, and as harmless as sherry. Sold by Chemists and Perfumers everywhere, at 2s. 6d. per Bottle.



DINNEFORD'S FLUID MAGNESIA. The best remedy for Acidity of the Stomach, Heartburn, Headache, Gout, and Indigestion, and safest aperient for delicate constitutions, ladies, and children. Of all Chemists.

Newest Invention.—Greatest Novelty.
THE Y&N PATENT DIAGONAL SEAM CORSET.
Patented in England and on the Continent. Will not split in the seams nor tear in the Fabric. Exquisite Model. Perfect Comfort. Guaranteed Wear.
Le Follet says:—"A novel invention in Corsets, admirably calculated to prevent the very disagreeable occurrence of split seams. The cut is very good and becoming, and may be adapted to any figure with advantage."
The Queen says:—"These Corsets are a new departure. The material is cut on the cross, and the component parts being also arranged diagonally, the seams have no strain. They are admirably moulded, exquisitely neat and strong, and the workmanship all that could be desired."
Beware of worthless imitations. Every Y & N Corset is stamped, "Y and N Patent Diagonal Seam Corset, No. 116," in oval.

FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.
A few drops of the FRAGRANT FLORILINE on a wet tooth-brush produces a delightful foam, which cleanses the Teeth from all impurities, strengthens and hardens the gums, prevents tartar, and arrests the progress of decay. It gives to the teeth a peculiar and beautiful whiteness, and imparts a delightful fragrance to the breath. It removes all unpleasant odour arising from decayed teeth, a disordered stomach, or tobacco smoke. The FRAGRANT FLORILINE is purely vegetable, and equally adapted to old and young.
The FRAGRANT FLORILINE should be used in all cases of bad breath, and particularly by gentlemen after smoking. The Florline combines, in a concentrated form, the most desirable, cleansing, and astringent properties. At the same time it contains nothing which can possibly injure the most sensitive and delicate organisation.
It beautifies the teeth and gums.
It arrests the decay of the teeth.
It is as a detergent after smoking.
It renders the gums hard and healthy.
It neutralises the offensive secretions of the mouth.
It imparts to the breath a fragrance purely aromatic and pleasant.
Put up in large bottles (only one size) and in elegant toilet-case, complete, at 2s. 6d. Sold by all Chemists and Perfumers.
Wholesale by the ANGLO-AMERICAN DRUG COMPANY, Limited, Farringdon-road, London.

FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.
Sweet as the ambrosial air,
With its perfume rich and rare;
Sweet as violets at the morn,
Which the emerald meads adorn;
Sweet as roseburds bursting forth
From the richly-laden earth,
Is the "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

The teeth it makes a pearly white,
So pure and lovely to be sight;
The gums assume a rosy hue,
The breath is sweet as violets blue;
While scented as the flowers of May,
Which cast their sweetness from each spray,
Is the "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

Sure, some fairy with its hand
Cast around its mystic wand,
And produced from fairy's bower
Scented perfumes from each flower:
For in this liquid gem we trace—
All that can beauty add and grace—
Such is the "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

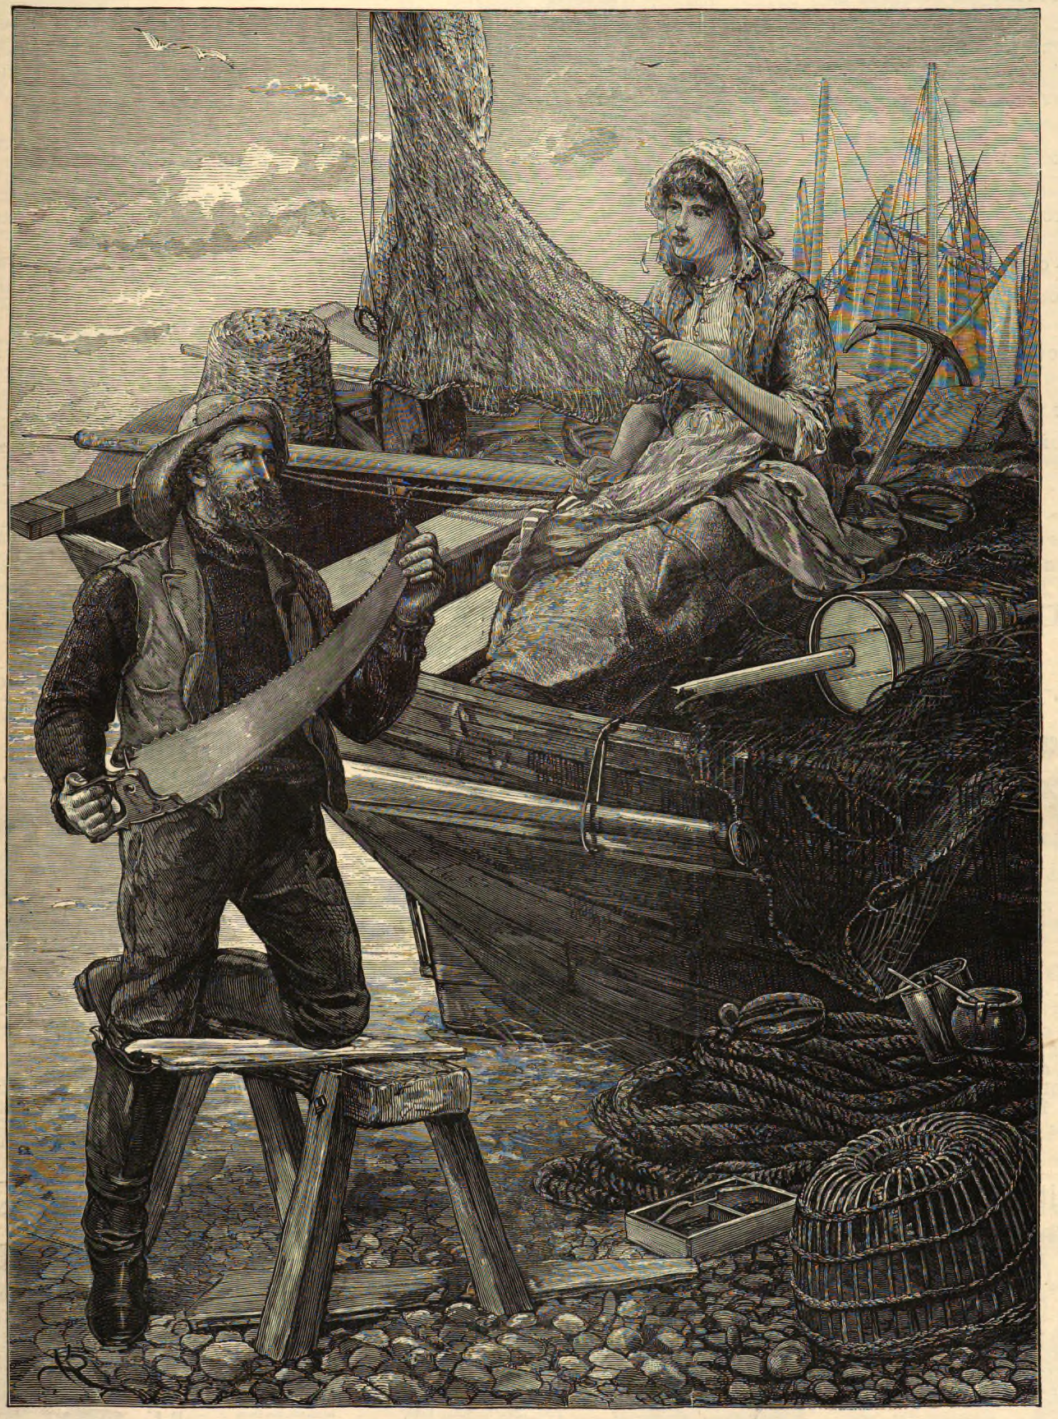
FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.
Is the best liquid dentifrice in the world; it thoroughly cleanses partially decayed teeth from all parasites or living "animalculæ," leaving them pearly white, imparting a delightful fragrance to the breath. Price 2s. 6d. per Bottle. The Fragrant Florline removes instantly all odours arising from a foul stomach or tobacco smoke.
For children and adults whose teeth show marks of decay its advantages are paramount. The "Florline" should be thoroughly brushed into all the cavities; no one need fear using it too often or too much at a time. Among the ingredients being soda, honey, spirits of wine, borax, and extracts from sweet herbs and plants, it forms not only the very best dentifrice for cleansing ever discovered, but one that is perfectly delicious to the taste and as harmless as sherry. The taste is so pleasing that, instead of taking up the toothbrush with dislike, as is often the case, children will on no account omit to use the "Florline" regularly each morning, if only left to their own choice. Children cannot be taught the use of the toothbrush too young; early neglect invariably produces premature decay of the teeth. "Florline" is sold by all Chemists and Perfumers throughout the world, at 2s. 6d. per Bottle.

FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.
If teeth are white and beautiful,
It keeps them so intact;
If they're discoloured in the least,
It brings their whiteness back;
And by its use what good effects
Are daily to be seen;
Thus hence it is that general praise
Greets "FRAGRANT FLORILINE!"

One trial proves conclusive quite,
That by its constant use
The very best effects arise
That science can produce,
It is the task of every one,
An all-absorbing theme;
Whilst general now becomes the use
Of "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

It makes the breath as sweet as flowers
The teeth a pearly white;
The gums it hardens, and it gives
Sensations of delight.
All vile secretions it removes,
However long they've been;
The enamel, too, it will preserve,
The "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.
It may or may not be generally known that microscopical examinations have proved that animal or vegetable parasites gather, unobserved by the naked eye, upon the teeth and gums of at least nine persons in every ten; any individual may easily satisfy himself in this matter by placing a powerful microscope over a partially-decayed tooth, when the living animalculæ will be found to resemble a partially-decayed cheese more than anything else we can compare it to. We may also state that the FRAGRANT FLORILINE is the only remedy yet discovered able perfectly to free the teeth and gums from these pests without the slightest injury to the teeth or the most tender gums.
Read this.—From the "Weekly Times," March 26, 1871.—"There are so many toilet articles which obtain all their celebrity from being constantly and extensively advertised that it makes it necessary when anything new and good is introduced to the public that special attention should be called to it. The most insignificant and erective toilet article for cleansing and beautifying the teeth that we in a long experience have used is the new Fragrant Florline. It is quite a pleasure to use it, and its properties of imparting a fragrance to the breath and giving a pearly whiteness to the teeth make it still more valuable. Of all the numerous nostrums for cleaning the teeth which from time to time have been fashionable and popular, nothing to be compared with the Florline has hitherto been produced, whether considered as a beautifier or a valuable cleanser and preserver of the teeth and gums."
From the "Young Ladies' Journal":—"An agreeable dentifrice is always a luxury. As one of the most agreeable may be reckoned Florline. It cleanses the teeth and imparts a pearl colour to the breath. It has been analyzed by several eminent professors of chemistry, and they concur in their testimony to its meritorious. We are frequently asked to recommend a dentifrice to our readers; therefore we cannot do better than advise them to try the Fragrant Florline."



FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.
I have heard a strange statement, dear Fanny, to-day,
That the reason that teeth do decay
Is traced to some objects that form in the gums,
And eat them in time quite away.
Animalcules, they say, are engendered—that is,
If the mouth is not who-lesome and clean;
And I also have heard to preserve them the best
Is the fragrant, the sweet "FLORILINE!"

Oh, yes; it is true that secretions will cause
Living objects to form on your teeth,
And certainly and steadily do they gnaw on
In cavities made underneath;
But a certain preservative has now been found
To keep your mouth wholesome and clean;
And you're perfectly right, for your teeth to preserve,
There's nothing like sweet "FLORILINE!"

'Tis nice and refreshing, and pleasant to use,
And no danger its use can attend;
For clever physicians and dentists as well
Their uniform praises now lend.
They say it's the best preparation that's known,
And evident proofs have they seen,
That nothing can equal the virtues that dwell
In the fragrant, the sweet "FLORILINE!"

FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.
The "Christian World" of March 17, 1871, says, with respect to Florline:—"Florline bids fair to bec me a household word in England, and one of peculiarly pleasant meaning. It would be difficult to conceive a more efficacious and agreeable preparation for the teeth. Those who once begin to use it will certainly never willingly give it up."
"I consider 'Fragrant Florline' is, without exception, as excellent preparation for the teeth and gums."

PETER ROBINSON, OXFORD-ST.

"LITTLE GOODS, LITTLE CARE."

The truth of this meek proverb has not generally commended itself to an anxious and often covetous world. Many people would be happy to believe it, if they could; and some might find this easier than to contrive a safe way of increasing their store of "goods." To the poet, and even to the artist in a poetical or philosophical mood, this picture of a virtuous and affectionate couple, whose only apparent wealth is a boat with some nets and fishing-gear, a set of carpenter's tools, their wearing apparel, and the wife's needle and thread and cooking utensils, may be quite satisfactory. It is very certain that, taking a wide view of the condition of mankind, not only among European nations but in Asia, Africa, and North and South America and in the isles of the Pacific, this is a stock of domestic properties much above the average standard. But we doubt whether it is always accompanied by entire freedom from care for the needs of the daily livelihood. There was Enoch Arden, to be sure, a brave and skilful fisherman, who could also handle the saw, the axe, the hammer, and augur, as we read in Tennyson's poem:—

> He purchased his own boat, and made a home
> For Annie, neat and nest-like, half-way up
> The narrow street that clambered toward the mill.

Seven happy years "of health and competence," with successful toil on the sea and trade on shore in the fish of his own catching, allowed him to support his wife and two children. But at last, by an accident which disabled him for a time, poverty crept into the humble home; and he was obliged to go for a sailor, to earn a needful sum of money. We know what came of it; a very sorrowful story. Let us hope that more solid prosperity may reward the industry and thrift of this fine fellow, and of his gentle partner, who sits in the boat mending his nets. We should be glad to hear that he was the owner of several boats; also of a comfortable cottage, or a house with room for six children; with plenty of good furniture, and with two or three hundred pounds laid by in the bank. His cares would not be thereby increased, but lightened; and it would be far better for the wife, and for the coming boys and girls. A boat may go to the bottom of the sea; and so may a man, unhappily, leaving wife and children to starve, as many poor people on the east coast, from the Humber to Hartlepool, know too well. From a sentimental point of view, "Little Goods" may appeal to sympathetic approbation; but we should like to see the little become a good deal more.

DEER-SHOOTING ON A LAKE.

The State of New York, though we are apt to think of that name chiefly in connection with the greatest commercial seaport and city of the American Republic, is a country of large extent, not very much less than that of England (without Wales), and of most diversified aspects, containing rivers, lakes, mountains or hill-ranges, and woodlands, the variety of scenery in which is surpassed by few countries of equal size. The banks of the noble Hudson river, with the Katskills, are known to thousands of travellers from Europe; the State, at its north-western boundary, reaches the Falls of Niagara, includes the southern shores of Lakes Erie and Ontario, and part of the St. Lawrence, and on its north-east side, bordering on Vermont, possesses a beautiful chain of lakes, those of Champlain and George, overlooked by the "Green Mountains" and the Adirondacs. The forests on the shores of some of these sequestered lakes abound with game for the sportsman's rifle; deer being of course the most desirable, though bears, wolves, raccoons, wild cats, and other destructive quadrupeds, may be freely killed. It is in the summer, in this highland region, that the deer become an object of pursuit; and they are frequently shot as they come down to drink of the water of a lake. Our Illustration represents such an exploit performed from a boat lying close to the woodland shore, in a scene of great natural beauty, which is easily accessible to the wearied man of business, when he gets a brief holiday from his counting-house and from Wall-street; as the Londoner seeks his recreation, if he can afford the cost, in the Scottish Highlands or in Norway. Deer-stalking, however, is not practised in North America with the same degree of scientific method and laborious exertion as on the mountains and moors of North Britain.

"OUT OF HIS DEPTH."

Here is another fisherman of our seacoast, whose face has not such an intellectual expression as that of the happy husband in "Little Goods, Little Care." He, too, like Enoch Arden, is accustomed to carry his fish through the village for sale, though we do not see that he possesses a cart and a white horse. So many dozen mackerel, or the number of fine soles, or whatever he may have had of "ocean-spoil," in his osier basket, ought to have enriched his pocket with a certain amount of shillings and pence. But he is, unfortunately, no scholar; for in his boyhood the village school did not teach arithmetic beyond a little counting up, adding, and subtracting; and the reduction of pence to shillings, with the incidental allowance of two fish for three-halfpence, makes a problem harder for him than setting his nets at night on the famous ground between the rocks, where the tide-current flows swiftly into the bay. Every man, if he takes enough pains to learn, can become very clever in his own way; but ciphering was never in this man's way, and it is a pity that he has not a clever wife, such as the pleasant young woman sitting in the boat, in Mr. Davidson Knowles's picture, who could put his calculations right in a moment. It is too late, perhaps, for him to think of that, and he stands here in perplexity, mentally quite "out of his depth." There is one resource for an unmarried man in this plight; but we do not at all recommend it; he may turn in at the Blue Anchor, and try the effect of a pint of beer, with a screw of "bacy," to assist the working of an untutored brain. He will then find, after muddling his mind a little more, that he has really not got so much money as he ought to have; and there can be no question in general, that any man attempting by this process to recover his understanding, whenever he happens to be a little bit "out of his depth," is likely to be "bound in shallows," as Shakspeare says, for "all the voyage of his life." It is the way to have "Little Goods," but, in the long run, not to have "Little Care."

The Royal Dublin Society have resolved to hold an International Exhibition of Arts and Industries on a very extensive scale, at Balls Bridge, in 1887.

Mr. Alfred Waterhouse, architect, has been elected a Royal Academician; and Mr. Henry Moore, painter, Mr. E. Burne Jones, painter, and Mr. J. W. Waterhouse, painter, have been chosen Associates.

The sale of the collection of pictures, sculpture, decorative furniture, porcelain, old French tapestry, plate, jewels, &c., formed by the late Mr. Christopher Becket Denison, commenced last Saturday at the rooms of Messrs. Christie, Manson, and Woods. The catalogue comprises 3354 lots, the dispersal of which will occupy twenty-two days, commencing with Dutch and Flemish pictures, and ending with Chippendale furniture, statuary, and the fine Florentine Pietre-Dure Mosaic table from the Hamilton Palace collection.

CHESS.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

All communications relating to this department should be addressed to the Chess Editor.

E L G (Blackwater).—If you place a White Knight on K square, which was omitted in the description, the solution is then effected by 1. R to K 3rd, P to K 5th; 2. Q to K B 2nd, B takes P (at any one move); 3. Q to Q 8th interposing and mating.

W B (Stratford).—Why send a diagram without the name of the author or the conditions of mate appearing on it? If it becomes detached from the letter, it is lost to the world for ever.

COLUMBUS.—Too elementary for our readers; and, besides, three checks in a three-move problem are two too many.

A S (Manchester).—Please accept our thanks for your game, which shall appear next week. Due acknowledgment or your courtesy was crowded out last week.

C W (Thorpe).—Except in the case of a two-move problem, a full solution should be sent. We have no objection to post-cards, properly addressed.

F MARSHALL.—Yours is a very remarkable analysis of No. 2149, but who is your authority for stating that a Knight moving discovering check is a "violation of modern rules"?

J K (South Hampstead).—See the note below. You were correct in substituting the B B for the B P.

W R C (Lee).—We do not understand your question, "Is a Knight allowed to move over his own piece?" The Knight may be played to any vacant square within the scope of his peculiar line of movement.

D A (Dublin).—The problem marked J is good, and we have no recollection of having examined it before. The one marked F was set aside because of the capture on the first move of the solution and subsequent lack of point. J is marked for insertion if you have no objection.

CORRECT SOLUTIONS OF PROBLEMS Nos. 2138, 2139, and 2140 received from J S Logan (Blackheath, Notts); of No. 2146 from E J Winter Wood, F E Gibbins (Tiffin), Rev. PROBLEM No. 2149.—It is only proper to mention that in the diagram of this problem a Black Pawn is substituted for a Black Bishop in error. 8. B to Q 2nd	K Kt to K 2nd
9. K Kt to K 2nd	B to Q 2nd
10. B takes Kt	P takes B

Kt takes B looks tempting, but the move in the text was best, as it gave Black a fine centre of Pawns.

11. Kt to K 4th
12. Q takes B	B takes B (ch)
13. Kt takes Q	Q takes Q (ch)
14. Kt takes Q	P to Q B 4th

To force exchanges, as Black was threatening P to Q B 4th and then P to Q 5th.

15. K to B 2nd Castles (K)

A weak move, which was the cause of all White's subsequent troubles. He should have castled at once.

14.	Kt to K B 4th
15. K to B 2nd	Castles (K)

Taking prompt advantage of his opponent's error.

17. P to K R 4th	Kt to Q B 3rd
18. P to Q R 3rd

Kt to K B 3rd would probably have been better. Black's move of Kt to Kt 5th might have been then parried.

21. K R to K sq	B to Q B 3rd

23. P takes P	R to B 7th
24. Kt to K B sq	Q R to K B sq
25. Kt to K B 4th	P to Q 5th

26. Kt to K 3rd.

R to K 2nd would have been no better, as Black would have taken the Kt with the Queen's Rook, and mated in a few more moves.

26.	P takes Kt
28. P takes R.

Black mates in three moves.

A material increase in the numerical and playing strength of the Newcross Chess Club has been effected by the accession of many members of the Greenwich Club, recently dissolved. The latter was a fighting club, and we shall trust that "in its ashes live its wonted fire," so that we may next season hear of its influence upon the club with which it has now linked its fortunes.

In our issue of the 23rd ult. we raised a question relating to the priority of publication of a problem by Dr. Bayer (No. 2148), and one by Mr. Loyd, which we knew had been published as far back as the year 1859. We have since heard from the Rev. W. Wayte that Dr. Bayer's problem was published, under the motto "Ultima Thule" in the Chessplayers' Chronicle for 1874, p. 25. The resemblance of one problem to the other, in conception and construction, has been noticed by many of our solvers, and the coincidence is the more extraordinary because both problems emanate from two composers of marked originality.

We are indebted to the courtesy of the honorary secretary of the Irish Chess Association, Mr. T. B. Rowland, for the constitution and programme of that society, adopted at a general meeting of the members held on April 6 last. The Irish Chess Association is a federation of clubs and individuals, and its object is the promotion of the theory and practice of chess in all its branches. The subscription is five shillings per annum, and the meetings are to be held annually in Dublin and one of the large provincial towns alternately. The first meeting is fixed to take place in Dublin in October next, ending with the distribution of prizes and a banquet. Prizes, the value of which will depend on the amount of subscriptions received, will be for:—1. A tournament open to residents of Great Britain and Ireland. 2. A tournament open to residents of Ireland only. 3. Tournament open to clubs federated with the association. 4. A handicap tourney. 5. Problem solution tourney. 6. Blindfold play between eminent specialists and members of the association. 7. Telegraphic matches between the Associations and the great towns. 8. Other matches and competitions to be fixed by the council. Chessplayers desirous of becoming members of the I.C.A. should address the hon. sec. and treasurer, Mr T. B. Rowland, Victoria-terrace, Clontarf, Dublin.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated Feb. 24, 1882) of Lady Alicia Conroy, late of Arborfield, Berks, who died on Jan. 21 last, was proved on the 8th ult. by Sir John Conroy, Bart., the son, the sole executor, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £19,000. The testatrix devises and bequeaths all the real and personal estate to which she shall be entitled at the time of her decease to her said son, absolutely. The deceased was the daughter of Lawrence, second Earl Rosse.

The will (dated Aug. 12, 1881) of General Richard Parker, Colonel 5th (Princess Charlotte of Wales's) Dragoon Guards, late of Castle Malwood, Lyndhurst, in the county of Southampton, who died on March 15 last, was proved on the 22nd ult. by Sir William Parker, Bart., the nephew, and Nathaniel Barnardiston, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £11,000. The testator, among other legacies, bequeaths £2000 to his nephew Major Bevil Granville. The residue of his personal estate he leaves, upon trust, to pay the income to his sister, Mrs. Ann Granville, for life, and then, subject to a further trust for accumulation, to the younger sons of the said Sir William Parker, as he shall appoint.

The will (dated Dec. 5, 1881) of Sir Harry Smith Parkes, G.C.M.G., K.C.B., her Majesty's Ambassador at Pekin, who died on March 22 last, was proved on the 21st ult. by Sir Thomas Douglas Forsyth, C.B., K.C.S.I., and Hall Rokeby Price, two of the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £8000. The testator bequeaths legacies to relatives and others; and the residue of his real and personal estate he leaves, upon trust, for all his children, in equal shares.

The will (dated April 1, 1885) of Colonel Francis Octavius Montgomery, formerly of the North Down Militia, but late of the Army and Navy Club, Pall-mall, and of Folkestone, who died on April 19 last, was proved on the 15th ult. by Edward Parker Wolstenholme and Nathaniel Tertius Lawrence, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £161,000. The testator bequeaths £5000 each, free of duty, to his great-nephews, William Edward, Robert Arthur, Percy Hugh Seymour, Francis Henry, and George Fitzmaurice, the sons of his nephew, Hugh Montgomery, and two or three other legacies. The residue of his real and personal estate he settles to go with the Grey Abbey estates, in the county of Down, Ireland, but so that his said great-nephew William Edward Montgomery, or other the person entitled in expectancy on the death of his nephew, the said Hugh Montgomery, shall take the first life interest, as though his said nephew were dead.

The will (dated June 19, 1873), with a codicil (dated May 22, 1878), of Mr. Robert Edmund Oliver, late of Sholebrook Lodge, Whittlebury, Northamptonshire, who died on March 12 last, was proved on the 8th ult. by Abraham John Robarts, John Locke Stratton, and Henry Philip Markham, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £88,000. The testator bequeaths liberal legacies to his executors, servants, and others; and the residue of the personalty and all his freehold, copyhold, and leasehold property he leaves, upon trust, for his brother, Richard Silver, for life. At his brother's death he gives £500 to the Hon. Ismay Mary Helen Augusta Fitzroy, the eldest daughter of his late friend, Charles, Lord Southampton; and the ultimate residue of all his property to the Hon. Edward Algernon Fitzroy, the second son of the said Lord Southampton.

The will (dated Sept. 9, 1882) of Mr. Peter Atrell, late of No. 24, Tredegar-square, Mile-end, who died on April 30 last, was proved on the 20th ult. by John Joseph Hickmott, jun., and George James Wagstaff, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £80,000. The testator bequeaths £500 each to the London Hospital, Whitechapel; the City of London Hospital for Diseases of the Chest, Victoria Park; and the East London Hospital at Shadwell for Children;—£300 each to the Asylum for Fatherless Children, Reedham; the Merchant Seamen's Orphan Asylum, Snaresbrook; the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, Old Kent-road; St. Mark's Hospital for Fistula, City-road; and the Blind School, St. George's-fields, Southwark;—£250 to the Poplar Hospital, East India-road, Poplar; £200 to the Royal Hospital for Incurables, West-hill, Putney; £150 to the Stepney Relief Society; £50 to the Mile-end Philanthropic Society; and £25 to the Horn of Plenty Philanthropic Society, Globe-road, Mile-end. He gives numerous freehold and leasehold houses and other property, upon trust, for his sister Mrs. Adelaide Hocken, for life, or until she shall marry again, and then for her children, Florence Nightingale and Thomas Hocken; a gift of similar properties, upon trust, for his sister Mrs. Adelaide Hickmott, for life, and then for her children; various properties to his nephew, William Arment; and many other legacies. The residue of his real and personal estate is left upon trusts for accumulation; at the expiration of seven years he leaves one fourth of such part as may by law be bequeathed for charitable purposes to such of the said charitable institutions as his executors in their discretion may think fit; one third of the remainder to his sister Mrs. Hocken, and her said two children, in equal shares; one third to his sister Mrs. Hickmott, and one third to his nephew, William Arment.

The will (dated May 20, 1883) of his Excellency Mariano Balcarce, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the Argentine Republic in France and Belgium, late of No. 5, Rue de Berlin, Paris, who died on Feb. 20 last, was proved in London on the 6th ult. by Madame Josefa de Gutierrez de Estrada, the daughter and sole executrix, the value of the personal estate in England amounting to over £34,000. The testator appoints his said daughter the sole and only universal heiress of all the property he shall possess at the time of his death.

The will (dated Oct. 5, 1883) of General John Edmonstoune Landers, Bengal Establishment, late of No. 7, Bryanston-street, Portman-square, who died on April 6 last, was proved on the 5th ult. by Mrs. Mary Elizabeth Cordelia Landers, the widow and sole executrix, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £15,000. The testator bequeaths £1000 each to his sister, Mrs. Corbett; his nephew, John Edmonstoune Landers; his niece, Mrs. Henrietta Morrison; and to his cousin, Mrs. Frances Magdaline Stewart; and legacies to domestic servants. The residue of his real and personal estate he gives to his wife, absolutely.

A sale of the inmates' work, for their own benefit, will be held at the Royal Hospital for Incurables, West-hill, Putney-heath, next Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday.

The Archbishop of Canterbury presided on the 3rd inst. at the 184th annual meeting of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, and, in opening the proceedings, asked if, in the sight of all the great peoples and tribes and churches that were forming under our very eyes like crystals in some chemical fluid, there could be in the present day any duty more incumbent upon Christian people than to support the missionary societies? While the Church people raised £500,000 a year for foreign missions, the Nonconformists raised £550,000; and he hoped that in the present year the Church of England would clear this additional £50,000.

ART NOTES.

Sir Edward Lee, the manager of the Albert Palace, Battersea Park (which is now open), may be congratulated on the collection of pictures he has succeeded in bringing together. It not unfrequently happens that in exhibitions of this nature we find little more than the abortive efforts of unknown artists to obtain notoriety through the more recognised channels, or, on the other hand, the sweepings of the studios of painters already before the public. There is little or nothing at the Albert Palace to suggest that recourse has been had to either expedient in order to cover the walls of one of the best-lighted picture galleries in London or the suburbs. It is no reproach to the manager or to the artists that some of the works exhibited have already appeared (under less favourable conditions) at the Royal Academy and elsewhere, but these form the exception amongst the 500 specimens here brought together. Amongst the most attractive pictures may be mentioned, as a capital figure-piece, Mr. John Burr's "Resting" (32); Mr. James Peel's "Snowdon" (106), a glossy but forcibly painted landscape; Mr. Henry Moore's "Deep Water" (111), a small but eminently characteristic work, and his larger work, "Calm Before Storm" (142); Mr. G. A. Storey's "Kitty" (101), a carefully finished head of a young girl; Mr. Edwin Douglas's "Muffins" (129), which for harmony of colour was one of the most promising works in the Academy last year; Mr. Arthur Stock's "Unknown Species" (181); two capital Cornish sea-pieces, "Keynance Cove," by Mr. Edmund Gill (239), and "The Gurnard's Head," by Mr. J. G. Naish (180); a delicate single figure of a girl, "Sea Dreams," by Mr. Blair Leighton; and "Shylock" (288), by Mr. William Weekes—a raven standing on a bill of exchange, the very type of the usurer. Amongst the foreign schools, those of Munich and Düsseldorf are well represented; and there is one work, by the American artist, Mr. J. Maclure Hamilton, entitled "The Last Appeal" (165)—a dog seated on a table before the scientist—which is already known by engraving, but which is infinitely better in its original state. It deserves to find a place in the board-room of the Anti-Vivisection Society, except that there it would, perhaps, only appeal to those who were already convinced. Not the least admirable part of the picture is the drawing of the professor's hand, placed upon the table, speaking the man's character even more truthfully than his concealed face could have done. It should be added that this exhibition is in connection with an art union, according to the terms of which 20 per cent of the amount received from the sale of season tickets to the Albert Palace will be set apart for the purchase of pictures. If the quality be maintained at the level of the first year, this ought to induce many who live far away from Battersea to associate themselves with the work, in the hope of reaping personal advantage to themselves. Should, however, the generous offer of the committee of management fail to meet with any general response from the richer quarters of the town, that body deserves, at all events, the thanks of all who care for the improvement of popular taste, for having endeavoured—and so far with success—to give the inhabitants of the southern suburbs the enjoyment of really good pictures, and of perhaps the most satisfactory collection ever exhibited on the south side of London.

At Messrs. Dickenson's Gallery (114, New Bond-street) there is now on view a collection of the works of Mr. Frank Miles, which give a very fair idea of the artist's versatility. The most important work is a large study of falling water, seething amid black rocks, whilst above a thin watery mist is floating upwards through the trees and bushes. There is more strength as well as imaginative power in this work than in the garden scene of Bingham Abbey, of which the rich colouring does not supply the want of a central interest. In his other landscapes, Mr. Miles seems to have allowed himself to be influenced by Mr. Whistler, and of these the sketch off Beachy Head, in spite of its dull-coloured sea, is the best. There are two important figure-pieces, "Sea Dreams," a seated figure of a girl in white against a pink background, listening to the "murmur of the shell"; and "Sweet Doing Nothing," a girl in blue reflected in a looking-glass, which unfortunately suggests too vividly the idea of the two-headed Nightingale suffering from the miseries of a bifrontal headache or the perplexities of a Dual Control. There are, however, numerous other works, especially portraits, in Mr. Miles' slighter, and we cannot help saying it, happier style, which must ensure to both the painter and his models the success of this exhibition.

Messrs. Cassell and Co. are well advised, both in their own interest and in that of art, in allowing the public to judge of the standard of work requisite for illustrated publications. It is scarcely possible, in cases where many thousands of copies have to be struck off a single block, to retain the delicacy which may have distinguished the original drawing; whilst at the same time the engraver, on wood or metal, may not always have been successful in seizing the artist's inner thoughts. The collection of works now on view at La Belle Sauvage, Ludgate-hill, includes originals of the principal pictures which have appeared in the Magazine of Art and in other works issued by the firm during the past year. The great majority of them are in black and white, and are therefore chiefly noticeable for their drawing; but there are a few distinctive coloured works, such as Mr. A. F. Grace's reproductions after Turner (54) and Mason (57), and Mr. Birket Foster's "Hospenthal" (19), which are especially noteworthy. These, however, form the exceptions, and the bulk of the work is wholly confined to black and white. Among the products of this style there is much to commend in Mr. Fred Barnard's series of illustrations to Dickens, and Mr. Boot's series of views of the Thames from its source, and in Mr. A. W. Henley's delightful sketches of the New Forest and other familiar spots in England. Amongst figure-subjects we must mention Miss Alice Havers' "Off to School" (209); Mr. G. L. Seymour's "Her Ladyship" (255), and still more especially his "Violet" (208), one of the most attractive works in the exhibition; Mr. M. L. Gow's "Reverie" (210) and "Child's Legacy" (171); and Mr. W. J. Hennessy's "Bunyan in Prison" (168). Mr. G. L. Seymour also illustrates the course of the Thames with no small skill and feeling, and Mr. Blair Leighton contributes at least half a dozen excellently composed genre subjects—simple yet effective—while in Mr. Percy Tarrant he finds a valuable coadjutor.

Messrs. Graves (Pall-mall) are now publishing an excellent engraving of Mr. W. P. Frith's picture of "The Private View," exhibited at the Royal Academy three years ago. Perhaps less popular, both in subject and treatment, to the "Derby Day" and "The Railway Station," this work cannot fail to have attractions for those who desire to possess lifelike portraits of celebrities of the day, grouped together under natural conditions; for in composition, the "Private View at the Royal Academy" is quite on a level with the best of Mr. Frith's work. Opinions may differ as to the taste which accords equal prominence to mere butterflies of fashion and to men of real importance; but as it is by no means improbable that the former can claim a wider circle of acquaintance, Mr. Frith may not have been altogether ill-inspired in according them a position in his picture which they can never expect to occupy elsewhere. The portraits of Mr. Millais, Lady Burdett-Coutts, Sir Henry Thompson, and Mr. Robert Browning are amongst the most successful; whilst the softening influences of art may be traced in the little group of statesmen where Mr. Gladstone and Sir Stafford Northcote are warmly shaking hands, and whilst Mr. Bright and Sir William Harcourt are smilingly looking down on this pleasant episode, and Lord Beaconsfield, from his canvas by Millais, surveys the scene with an air of amused cynicism. The engraving and picture are on view together at Messrs. Graves'; and the respective merits of the two works can be better appreciated when seen together than by any attempt at verbal description.

Mr. Thomas Woolner, R.A., has completed, for the Government of New South Wales, five bronze portrait busts of eminent English Statesmen, Lord Palmerston, Earl Russell, the Earl of Derby, Lord Beaconsfield, and Mr. Gladstone. Sir Henry Parkes, when in office, during a visit to England, commissioned Mr. Woolner to execute these busts, which are to be placed in the Executive Council Chamber in Sydney.

A GERMAN PRAYER PROCESSION.

Special prayers for seasonable weather to bless the labours of the husbandman are not unknown in the practice of the English Church. In the Roman Catholic parts of South Germany, and in the Austrian provinces, a parish priest will, upon occasion, lead his rustic congregation, preceded by the cross-bearer, to chant this pious service in the open harvest-fields. Our Artist, Mr. Schönberg, himself an Austrian, has represented the scene with much truth of expression; but in that climate, unlike ours, it is more often the want of rain than its untimely excess, that has to be deprecated. The drooping barley, the rye, the wheat, or any other cereal crop which is suffering from a continued drought, may soon be revived by gentle showers; and there is less danger than in our country of its being spoilt in the reaping-time by many days of wet. "Old men and maidens," mothers and children, but not all the "young men" of the parish, follow with trustful docility their ecclesiastical guide and teacher in this venerable religious ceremonial. They are little disposed to philosophical or scientific inquiry concerning the uniform operation of physical causes in the perturbations of the atmosphere. Every country, almost every district, is supposed to have its own particular sky, as meteorology is still an imperfect science; and few even of the wisest can yet conceive that the "partial evil" of a local drought, or of a local excessive rain, may be a necessary incident of some "universal good"—of the restoration it may be, of a general balance of atmospheric forces, a more equable distribution of the common bounty of Heaven, to vast continents and quarters of the globe.

After a successful run of a month, the East London Industrial Exhibition was closed on the 4th inst., the prizes, amounting to £300, being distributed by the Marquis and Marchioness of Ripon.

The Bishops of Lichfield and Bedford, who were requested by the Bishop of Tasmania to select a successor to the Very Rev. Dr. Bromby, as Dean of St. David's Cathedral, Hobart Town, have appointed the Rev. Charles L. Dundas, late Fellow of Jesus College, Oxford, to the post. Mr. Dundas has accepted the appointment.

WHAT EVERYBODY SHOULD READ.—How important it is to every individual to have at hand some simple, effective, and palatable remedy, such as ENO'S FRUIT SALT, to check disease at the onset! For this is the time. With very little trouble you can change the course of the trickling mountain stream, but not the rolling river. It will defy all your tiny efforts. I feel I cannot sufficiently impress this important information upon all Householders, or Ship Captains, or Europeans generally, who are visiting or residing in any hot or foreign climate. Whenever a change is contemplated likely to disturb the conditions of health, let ENO'S FRUIT SALT be your companion, for under any circumstances its use is beneficial, and never can do harm. When you feel out of sorts, yet unable to say why, frequently without any warning you are suddenly seized with lassitude, disinclination for bodily or mental exertion, loss of appetite, sickness, pain in the forehead, dull aching of back and limbs, coldness of the surface, and often shivering, &c., then your whole body is out of order, the spirit of danger has been kindled, but you do not know where it may end; it is a real necessity to have a simple remedy at hand, that will answer the very best end, with a positive assurance of doing good in every case, and in no case any harm. The Pilot can so steer and direct as to bring the ship into safety, but he cannot quell the raging storm. The common idea when not feeling well is—"I will wait and see; perhaps I shall be better to-morrow"; whereas, had a supply of ENO'S FRUIT SALT been at hand, and use made of it at the onset, all calamitous results might have been avoided. What dashes to the earth so many hopes, breaks so many sweet alliances, blasts so many auspicious enterprises, as untimely death!

"I have used my FRUIT SALT freely in my last attack of fever, and I have every reason to say it saved my life."—J. C. Eno, Hatcham Fruit Salt Works, S.E.

HOT WEATHER.—HOW to INVIGORATE the NERVOUS SYSTEM by NATURAL MEANS.—MENTAL PROSTRATION.—"Having suffered much from headache and mental prostration, I was induced to try ENO'S FRUIT SALT, the effects of which have been most satisfactory, resulting in invigorating my entire nervous system, and removing the frequent headache to which I was subject. You are at liberty to make any use you think proper of this testimonial, as I consider ENO'S FRUIT SALT an indispensable adjunct to the household.—TRUTH, Sigdon-road, Dalston, E."

THE SECRET OF SUCCESS.—"A new invention is brought before the public, and commands success. A score of abominable imitations are immediately introduced by the unscrupulous, who, in copying the original closely enough to deceive the public, and yet not so exactly as to infringe upon legal rights, exercise an ingenuity that, employed in an original channel, could not fail to secure reputation and profit."—ADAMS.

CAUTION.—Examine each Bottle, and see that the Capsule is marked ENO'S FRUIT SALT. Without it, you have been imposed on by a worthless imitation. Sold by all Chemists.

REDUCED FACSIMILE OF AMMONIAPHONE.

DR. CARTER MOFFAT'S AMMONIAPHONE

Is used and approved of by the ROYAL FAMILY OF GREAT BRITAIN, by the Elite of the haute ton,
And of the MEDICAL, MUSICAL, and DRAMATIC PROFESSIONS. Price 21s., post-free.

From James McNAUGHT, Esq., Conductor of Psalmody, U.P. Church, Wigton, N.B., Agnes-crescent, Wigton, N.B.

"At the first meeting of our choir I introduced the Ammoniaphone, and having used it myself, I asked the ladies to use it, which they did. They afterwards sang a piece, and I was much surprised and very much pleased at the increased volume and sweetness of sound. The ladies say they sang much easier. I use it regularly myself. It only requires to be known to be used by all singers and public speakers."

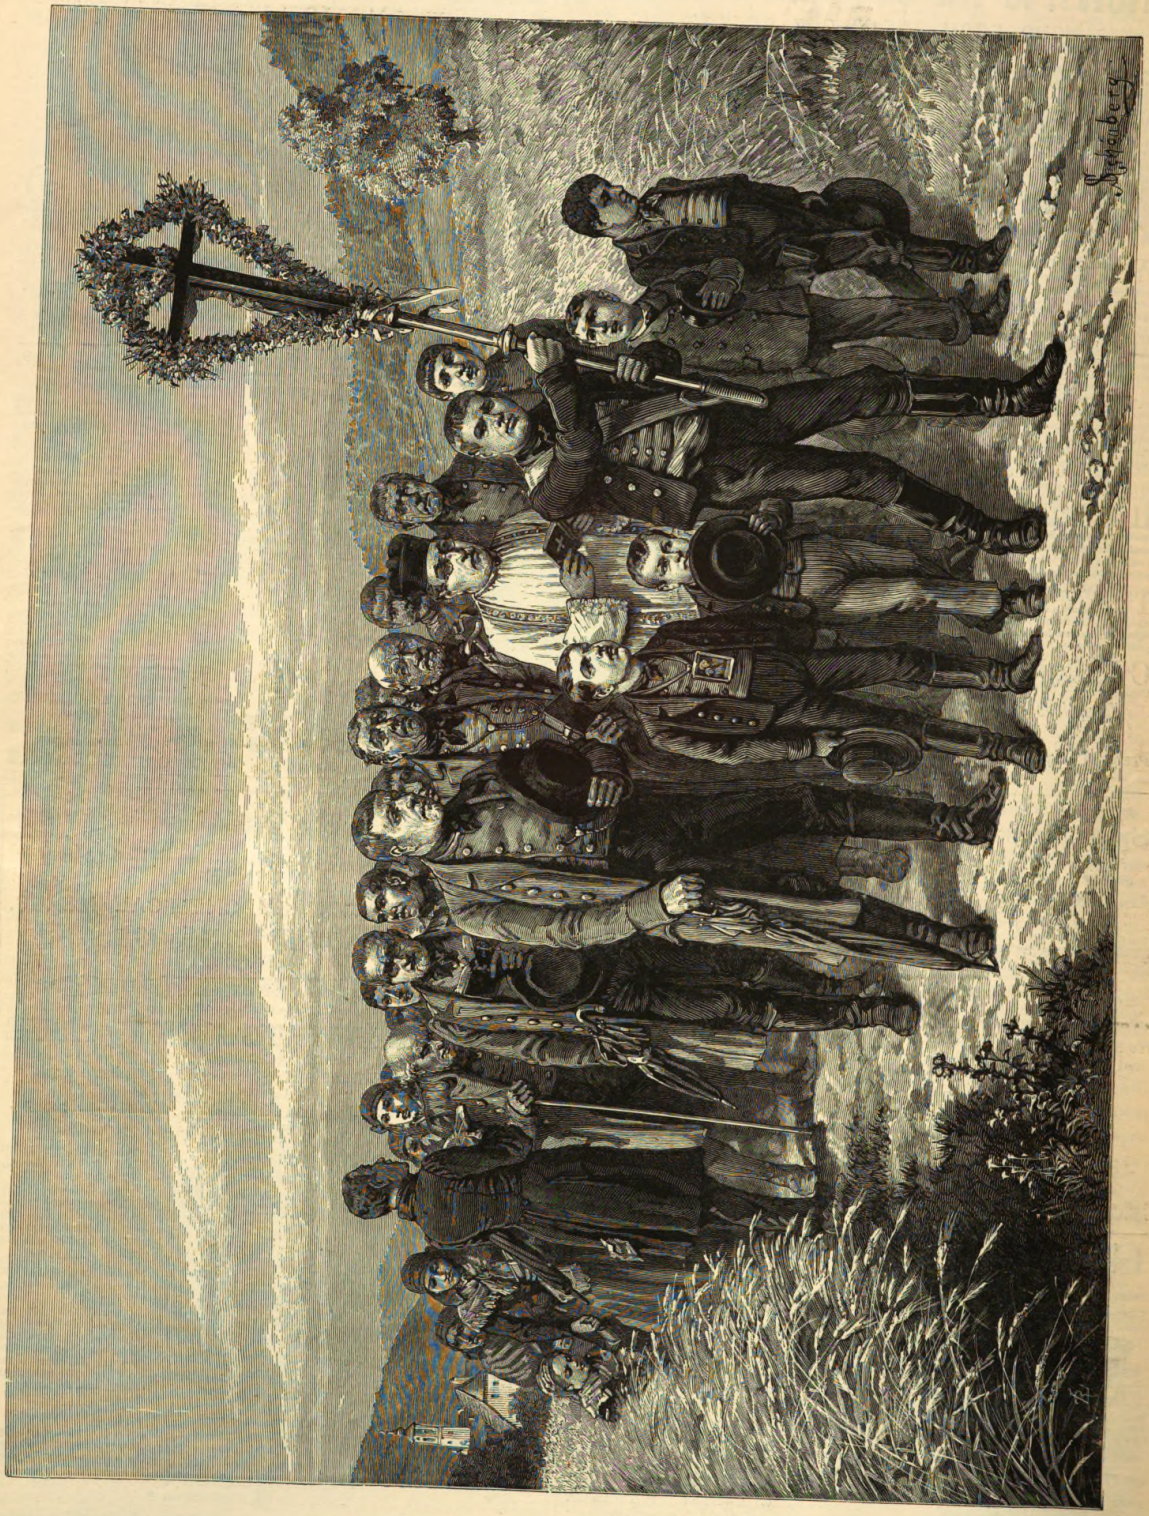
"I have pleasure in stating that I have given your Ammoniaphone a thorough trial on myself and pupils, and am perfectly satisfied with the result."

From Mrs. PALMER, Home Leigh, Lower Camden, Chiselhurst.

"Mrs. Palmer will feel obliged if Dr. Moffat will send her an 'Ammoniaphone.' She has been strongly advised to get one by Dr. Ashe, as she has a delicate throat, which often prevents her singing."



"WE PRAISE THEE, O LORD."

DR. CARTER MOFFAT'S AMMONIAPHONE should be used in all church and chapel choirs, and by all persons who have to use their voices professionally, or who desire to greatly improve their speaking or singing tones, producing a rich, powerful, melodious voice of extraordinary ringing clearness and range. A poor, weak voice becomes rich and massive, while

"Those sing who never sang before,

DR. CARTER MOFFAT'S AMMONIAPHONE (Harness' Patent) will be sent free by post to any part of the United Kingdom on receipt of P.O.O. or Cheque (crossed "London and County Bank") for 21s., and payable to C. B. HARNESS,

BALLOONING IN BECHUANALAND.

OUR NOTE-BOOK

Ascot Week opened with one of those notable ceremonies which the Prince and Princess of Wales perform to perfection. The Prince and the Royal party, en route to Berkhampstead, halted at Virginia Water Station on Monday afternoon, in order that his Royal Highness might open the magnificent new Palace of Health close by—the Holloway Sanatorium. This superb red-brick building, constructed in the Early English Renaissance style after the design of the architect, Mr. W. H. Crossland, has cost, with the finely-wooded estate on which it is erected, about £300,000. The beauty of the interior decoration surpasses expectation, the dwelling-rooms being adorned with charming taste, and the Chapel, Recreation Hall, and Refectory being radiantly magnificent. It was in the handsome Recreation Hall, brightened by a brilliant company of guests, that the Prince received the address from Mr. Martin-Holloway, and, in declaring the Holloway Sanatorium open, aptly said: — "Nobody possessed of great wealth could have employed it for a more excellent object—namely, to relieve those of our fellow creatures who demand our assistance and our charity in order to alleviate their suffering." His Royal Highness had reason to express himself pleased with the admirable inaugural arrangements, which should be placed to the credit of Mr. A. J. R. Trendell, whose well-written report clearly explains the scope of this palatial asylum for the deranged.

Sorrow and joy were most intricately mingled in the home-coming of the Duchess of Connaught. The delight of seeing her children again, and the warm welcome of an affectionate family circle, were tempered by the sudden death of her father, Prince Frederic Charles of Prussia; and the coincidence of her happiness and grief will awaken for her the heartfelt sympathy of all who know her, either personally or only by repute, as a good daughter, wife, and mother.

This week the world of fashion has been all agog about the races at "Royal" Ascot, so called for many sufficient reasons; especially because Ascot Heath, whereon the races are run, and where there was racing as early as 1727, is so near to the Royal residence at Windsor; because the kennel of the Royal Buckhounds found an excellent site there; because, in consequence of convenient proximity, it has always been the favourite race-ground of Royalty, since "Farmer George" and Charlotte, his wife, with the "First Gentleman" and their other children, would stroll affably about among the tents and booths; and because two Dukes of Cumberland, the "Culloden" Duke (who was Ranger of Windsor Great Park and bred King Herod and Eclipse), and the "foolish boy who disgraces the title" (brother to George the Third, which "foolish boy" won a Gold Cup at Ascot in 1772 by "walking over" with his mare, Maria), did their best to promote the meeting. It was not until 1785, however, that "Farmer George" himself gave the Royal Plate of 100 gs. "for hunters"; and it was not until 1807 that the Gold Cup, which is the glory of Ascot, became an institution. In 1843 began the Royal Hunt Cup, which produces "the prettiest race of the year"; and in 1865 the Alexandra Plate, which is one of few "long" races (three miles) remaining for the "laudator temporis acti" to rejoice in. The chief features of Ascot, however, are of course the display of millinery and the procession (on the Tuesday and the Thursday) in state or semi-state, when the Master of the Buckhounds, with his "couples" round his neck and a flower in his button-hole, rides slowly up the course at the head of the line of carriages. Nevertheless, there is always good racing at Ascot: the New Stakes generally bringing out some "crack" two-year-old, and the Gold Cup being remarkable for the number of dead-heats it has produced, between Brighton and Epsom in 1808, between Camarine and Rowton in 1832, between Buckstone and Tim Whiffler in 1863, and between Ely and General Peel in 1865, and for the number of "foreigners" that have won it—namely, Gladiateur (1866), Mortemer (1871), Henry (1872), Boiard (1874), Verneuil (1878), and Foxhall (1882).

Girton and Newnham have given a new interest to the Cambridge Tripos. We look with something better than curiosity to see how the severe reasoning of the mathematics will agree with the British feminine constitution, and what "sweet girl-graduate" may bid fair to become a Mrs. Somerville. This year we find two ladies, Miss Rickett and Miss Hewett, of Newnham, who have attained to the standard of "wrangler"; and, though that may seem an ominous term to apply to the sex, it is better than "knagger," which has been suggested by the cynics; and the day may come when the place of "senior wrangler" (which has nothing to do with age, and therefore need not be dreadful for its suggestion of a disagreeable inference) will be virtually assigned to a candidate in petticoats, and Man will begin, with shame, to take a lower seat.

The Greeks are a people who love to be sans gêne even in their Parliament, which is now in session, and has been so for the last three weeks. Deputies sit with their hats on, as with us, hang their greatcoats over the backs of their seats, and sip their lemonade perpetually. The buffet, which consists merely of a supply of cold water and lemons, is behind the Presidential tribune, and if a speaker pauses to take breath, or to pick up the thread of his discourse, there is a general rush to light cigarettes at the President's taper. When the King is present, the cigarettes and lemonade are less en évidence, but the members yield their places to officials, and there is a sprinkling of ladies and of men who take a merely theoretic interest in politics.

The Queen always keeps her eye on the Female School of Art, and has ordered a fan, designed and painted on silk by Miss Alice Elfrida Manby, as one of her special wedding presents to Princess Beatrice on her marriage.

The sabre just presented by the Czar to General Komaroff is a chef d'œuvre, like some old and much admired French ones. The blade, of finest Damascus steel, bears the inscription "Pour la bravoure," and the handle and scabbard are of gold thickly set with brilliants.

People who have slaughtered other people are very appropriately presented with swords of honour; and therefore General Komaroff deservedly receives a sword, for, in the words of Homer, he precipitated many brave souls into Hades. But whom did Sir Peter Lumsden slay? His object was thought to be a peaceful solution of a difficult question, and his complaint was supposed to be that the Russians used physical force unwarrantably. By all means let Sir Peter have presents and honours; but why give him a sword, rather than an olive-branch or the "Turnerelli wreath," if that is still to be had? A sword is the very last thing to give a pacific envoy and commissioner. It really looks as if the worthy myriads who are so anxious to present Sir Peter with a weapon must be spiritually akin to the proverbial Irishman who invites his neighbours significantly "just to thread on the tail of his coat" as he trails it before them.

We are so accustomed to regard a piano as a somewhat massive piece of furniture that it is almost startling to see, in the musical department of the Inventions Exhibition, one of Messrs. Brinsmead's pianos quite complete as a skeleton, minus the case. Close by stands a very handsome case of wood into which it can easily be screwed; but, for all harmonious and professional purposes, the instrument is perfect without it. One might almost call it the disembodied spirit of a piano, and the music it discourses is almost seraphically sweet in tone.

A fair and high-born English bride went to the altar last week in a simple muslin dress, a tulle veil, and a few real flowers, without a single jewel. Her bridesmaids were dressed in equally simple materials, and carried single stems of tall white lilies instead of the usual elaborate bouquets. May they succeed in setting a new fashion, and inaugurating a style of wedding garment which is more suitable than costly, and elegant rather than elaborate!

In these days, when the masses are taking an interest in pictures and art generally, such as does great credit to the educational system of the country, it seems a pity that the national collections or any of them should be jeopardised or neglected. Yet, one of the trustees of the National Portrait Gallery, Mr. A. J. B. Beresford-Hope, admits that the unique and priceless gems of art are carelessly housed in wooden sheds which are food for fire, and therefore in continual danger. The world's stock of paintings by old masters is necessarily limited, and though occasionally some wealthy iconoclast purchases a treasure, and by having it restored or by keeping it in a damp unsuitable atmosphere destroys its value, when the country becomes possessed of one it is in duty bound to preserve it. Says Mr. Beresford-Hope, "it is a platitude to say that England is a country of anomalies"; but it is worth saying, nevertheless, and worth impressing on those who have the power to abate the grievance, that, if a picture is worth acquiring at a big price, with the money of the people, it is equally worth taking proper care of.

The love of an earnest author for every line he writes is on a par with that which a parent feels for his children; and theatrical managers and editors of newspapers know full well the reproaches they have to encounter when they delete a scrap of dialogue from a play or a line from a paragraph. But if a story which is going the rounds concerning M. Reyer, author of the new opera "Sigurd," can be taken as typical, then musical composers are even more devoted to their work than the journalist or the dramatist. A critic, having been invited to hear the rehearsal of the opera, wrote M. Reyer a congratulatory letter, but he mentioned that, in his opinion, the wind instruments were somewhat overpowering in certain passages. The composer wrote back a long explanatory letter, but finished by saying that he had decided to defer to the critic's judgment; and, as he thought the wind instruments unduly preponderant, that he should leave out the part for—the flute.

At the early age of forty-two Madame Adelina Patti has already commenced to write her "reminiscences," and they will be published shortly in an American magazine. Although certain journals have hinted that this season in London will be the Diva's last, we have her authority to deny this most emphatically. And why should she retire when her voice is as pure and fresh as it was fifteen years ago?—more, its commercial value is higher than ever, commanding for one evening a sum which would keep half a dozen families in comparative comfort for a year. Madame Patti caught cold in her head on Sunday, before she left her Welsh home, and the first performance of Italian Opera, fixed for Tuesday, had to be postponed. As she has been personally acquainted with every crowned head in Europe, and all the men of light and leading all over the world, and, moreover, is a lady of keen perception, her reminiscences and impressions are sure to be interesting.

That ball and dinner giving is no criterion of sociable and hospitable feeling is proved by the promptness with which invitations are cancelled on the morrow of a political crisis. The consequence on trade is that dresses are countermanded and workwomen thrown out of employment; the "bitter cry" becomes intensified; and the philosopher reflects on "what great effects from little causes spring."

THE SILENT MEMBER.

"Audacity, Audacity, and always Audacity!" Danton's famous oratorical prescription has once again proved triumphant. It seemed to be generally agreed in Club-land in the middle of the week that the vivacious and dashing young leader of the omniscient "Fourth Party" had had his way, and that, yielding to the pressure put upon him by this lively section of the Conservative front rank, the Marquis of Salisbury had, after a long interview, offered Lord Randolph Churchill a Cabinet post, promised Sir Michael Hicks-Beach the leadership of the House of Commons, and conciliated Sir Stafford Northcote with a dignified office in the Ministry and elevation to the Peerage. Report has it that other ex-Ministers are to accompany the right hon. Baronet to the House of Lords. Mr. Gladstone, too, has been graciously offered an Earldom "in recognition of his services to his Sovereign and his country"; but it is semi-officially intimated that, "while gratefully appreciating her Majesty's intention," Mr. Gladstone "has asked to be allowed to forego the high honour which Her Majesty was ready to confer upon him." It is safe to predict the right hon. gentleman will find some of his late colleagues and supporters less coy of entering the Upper House.

The plain record of the Ministerial crisis is as brief—acceptably brief—as a speech by the Prince of Wales. On the Friday of last week—June the Twelfth, the day the Marquis of Salisbury arrived at Balmoral in obedience to the Queen's commands—the Lords and Commons reassembled. Earl Granville informed their Lordships, and Mr. Gladstone made known to hon. members, that the Government had tendered their resignation, which was accepted on the 11th inst., her Majesty having in the meantime summoned Lord Salisbury to Scotland. On Monday, the public learnt from the circular issued by the Court that "the Marquis of Salisbury had an audience of the Queen previous to leaving Balmoral, and has accepted office." Naturally tired by the double railway journey, the noble Marquis rested at Hatfield on Sunday. He returned to his town house in Arlington-street on Monday, and had interviews with several leading Conservatives. But an unexpected difference that arose in the Commons the same day threatened to interrupt the delicate work of Cabinet-making. The Lords met but to part again, on the motion of Lord Cranbrook. The independent spirits of the Conservative party in the Commons, however, found excuse for debate and division. Mr. Gladstone, having stated that he had received "authentic information" that the Marquis of Salisbury had undertaken to form a Government, proposed a fresh adjournment to Friday. Then arose the difference of opinion with respect to the Redistribution Bill. The authority of Sir Stafford Northcote was directly disregarded not only by Sir H. Drummond-Wolff and Lord Randolph Churchill, but also by Sir M. Hicks-Beach. But their effort to stay, on a technical point, the consideration of the Lords' amendments to the measure was ineffectual. The motion to postpone the discussion was defeated by 333 to 35 votes. With one or two exceptions of little import, the amendments were then agreed to. On the motion of Mr. Gladstone, Princess Beatrice's Annuity Bill was passed; and the House adjourned to Friday—Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues looking immensely relieved at the forthcoming freedom from the cares of office. It is expected that the Marquis of Salisbury will on Friday be in a position to announce, from the place lately occupied by Earl Granville, that he has formed a Ministry.

BALLOONING IN BECHUANALAND.

The expedition commanded by Major-General Sir Charles Warren, R.E., Special Commissioner for the settlement of the Bechuana country, on the western frontier of the Transvaal, was furnished with a balloon to be used for military reconnoitring service. An experimental ascent was prepared by the officers in charge of the apparatus when the General's head-quarters were at Mafeking, in Montsioa's country, in the month of April; and our Special Artist, Mr. Julius M. Price, one of the troopers of "Methuen's Horse" forming an escort to the party of Royal Engineers, has contributed several Sketches of this proceeding. The balloon arrived at the native village of Mafeking in a waggon, from which it was removed and unpacked, and was carefully inflated with gas by the apparatus brought from Woolwich Arsenal. The network bag was drawn over it when partly inflated; the car was attached by ropes, and the General was one of the first to make an ascent to the height allowed by the rope. The native Barolongs, men, women, and children, nearly all the population of Mafeking, watched this marvellous operation with the greatest possible astonishment, which was increased by a subsequent performance, when the balloon rose free in mid-air, hovering over the village. Finally, however, upon the occasion of a sudden descent, the balloon sustained injuries which made it necessary to stop the series of experiments; and the last scene delineated by our Artist is when it was packed up and carried away, with something of the sadness of a funeral procession. Its practical utility, in assisting the conduct of a campaign in the field, would no doubt have been proved in South Africa as it was in the Eastern Soudan.

BENEVOLENT OBJECTS.

Mr. Hollams presided on the 10th inst. over the twenty-fifth anniversary dinner of the Solicitors' Benevolent Association, which was held at the Star and Garter Hotel, Richmond; the subscriptions and donations amounting to £2178.

On the same day, the thirteenth annual festival of the Poplar Hospital for Accidents took place at the Holborn Restaurant—Mr. J. P. Currie, Governor of the Bank of England, in the chair; subscriptions to the amount of £1450 being announced.

The forty-eighth anniversary festival of the Coffee and Eating-House Keepers' Association was held on the 11th inst. at the Freemasons' Tavern—Mr. J. T. Peacock in the chair; the secretary announcing a list of donations and subscriptions amounting to nearly £300, including a donation of fifty guineas from the chairman.

The Duke of Edinburgh presided at the annual dinner of the Royal Albert Orphan Asylum, held at the Cannon-street Hotel, on the 12th inst., subscriptions being announced amounting to £1570, including £100 from the Queen.

About two hundred gentlemen were present on Monday evening at the anniversary dinner of the Printers' Corporation, held at the Albion Tavern, Aldersgate-street, under the presidency of the Lord Mayor. The subscriptions amounted to £1018, in addition to a special gift of £500 from the Pardoe-Killingback Pension Fund, which had been raised by subscription principally from the printing machine managers.

The fifty-third anniversary festival of the United Law Clerks' Society was held at the Freemasons' Tavern on Tuesday night—Mr. Justice Wills in the chair; the donations amounting to between £300 and £400.

The festival dinner of the friends and supporters of the London Fever Hospital, Liverpool-road, will be held next Tuesday—the Lord Mayor, M.P., in the chair.

THE MAGAZINES.

The interest of the Cornhill this month is almost entirely divided between its two serial fictions. "Court Royal" cannot be taken very seriously. Incidents and dialogue are alike fantastically overdone; and the personages are gross exaggerations of types exceptional at the best. But it is full of vigour and go: and the reader who will resign himself to the author's humour may make sure of plenty of entertainment. "Rainbow Gold" continually gains in mechanical cleverness: the scenes are wonderfully wrought; but there is a continual suggestion of ropes and pulleys. "Next-of-Kin Agencies" is an entertaining account of the agent's calling, seasoned with anecdotes illustrative of its picturesque side.

Besides the continuation of Mrs. Ritchie's graceful and pathetic "Mrs. Dymond," Macmillan has three articles of unusual merit—a picturesque account of a voyage up the La Plata from Monte Video to Paraguay, with interesting remarks on the prospects of the country; a notice, by "M. E. W.," of "Marius the Epicurean," as refined in style as the book itself, and much more healthy in sentiment; and a review by Mr. W. T. Arnold of Mommsen's great but imperfect volume on the administration of the Roman Empire. Mrs. Molesworth's ghost story is much too long. Professor C. H. Pearson gives some useful information on the advantages of Australia as a residence for persons with small fixed incomes.

The chief contribution to the English Illustrated Magazine is a delightful paper, delightfully illustrated, by Miss Dorothy Tennant, on the manners and customs of the London ragamuffin. Mabel Collins's paper on the New Forest is also accompanied by charming illustrations. "A Family Affair" continues attractive, and "In the Lion's Den," by Mr. Baring-Gould, promises to be a very pretty story.

Blackwood has one contribution of great importance, Hobart Pasha's letter suggesting methods of defence against torpedoes, the danger from which he considers greatly exaggerated. Both the novels, "The Waters of Hercules" and "Fortune's Wheel," are full of exciting interest, and the latter has brilliant social portraiture also. The letters describing the Russian military manœuvres of last year, and the route home from them, are lively and graphic. The hopeless attempt to prove that Shakspeare's sonnets were inspired by Dante is resumed without even the redeeming quality of perverted ingenuity. The height of absurdity as well as paradox is surely reached when Shakspeare's pretty conceit on the harpsichord is traced to Dante's rapt vision of the glories of Paradise.

There is nothing remarkable in Longmans' except the continuation of Mr. Stevenson's "Prince Otto," which is becoming more definite in plot and promises powerful interest.

The Fortnightly Review contains several valuable articles, among which we cannot reckon Sir Julian Goldsmid's attempt to rehabilitate Ismail Pasha, or Mr. Marindin's optimistic view of Eton in 1885. But Dr. Morell Mackenzie's remarks on the growth of specialism in medicine, Professor Gardiner's account of the new light thrown by archæological discovery on the beliefs of the Greeks respecting the future world, and Mr. Sutherland Edwards's picture of the decay of opera from the dearth of great singers, all make substantial contributions to knowledge. Professor Vinogradoff's essay on Oxford and Cambridge contains little novelty; but at least assures us that intellectual foreigners see our Universities much as we see them; and it is amusing to find the Parnellite party twitted by a more advanced Nationalist with conspiring to extinguish Irish nationality by substituting a Secretary of State for the Lord Lieutenant. Mr. F. Marshall labours to prove that Paris is a delightful residence for English people who will learn the language and accommodate themselves to the ways of the natives; but his own figures seem to show that it is a very expensive one.

The Nineteenth Century has no remarkable article, but many sensible ones—among which may be especially noted Captain Verney's appeal for a reform of the Indian Army, getting rid of the present almost incredible confusion and complication; Lord Bramwell's reply to Archdeacon Farrar on the drink question; and Mr. Jephson's argument, enforced by the proceedings of the Irish Parliament in 1782, that there is no medium between complete union and complete separation. Lady Archibald Campbell illustrates Fletcher's "Faithfull Shepherdesse" very agreeably, and Mr. Sully partially explains the notorious tendency of genius to insanity.

The Contemporary Review has a powerful exposition of the needs of the Volunteer Force, by Mr. Howard Vincent; and a very timely and sensible appeal by Mr. Dillwyn in favour of the common-sense reform of allowing Acts of Parliament to be taken up in any session at the stage which they may have reached in the proceeding. Professor Parker expounds the pedigree of the higher animals with exceeding clearness; Dr. Hatch makes a strong point of Canon Liddon's omission to allude to the Ignatian epistles when arguing for the apostolic succession of bishops; Sir Rowland Blennerhassett proposes to provide funds for making Irish tenants into landlords by a reimposition of the house tax; and Mr. Glennie contends that Shakspeare has been calumniated in the matter of inclosures, the town clerk of Stratford having had an unfortunate trick of writing "I" when he meant to write "he." Internal evidence certainly seems in favour of this, at first sight, startling suggestion.

With the exception of Mr. Armstrong's review of the Academy and Salon, and Mr. Courthope's acute but unsympathetic discussion of Coleridge and Keats, the articles in the National Review are mainly political. They do not individually seem very practical, and taken together increase the general impression of the difficulty which, in spite of unexampled opportunities, the Conservatives feel in suiting themselves with a policy.

"At the Red Glove," one of the best contemporary serial stories, attains a satisfactory conclusion in Harper's Magazine, which has also excellently illustrated articles treating of the cattle ranches of the Far West; of the picturesque city and tableland of Bogota, of the manœuvres of the German troops, and of the personages and incidents of East Tennessee at the end of last century. An essay on Mr. Watts's art, prompted by the exhibition of his pictures, shows fine appreciation of his poetical charm. The Century's histories of the civil war relate this month to Jackson's wonderful campaigns in the Shenandoah and the battle of Gaines's Mill, the first in the Chickahominy campaign. Three splendid portraits of the three Herschels are briefly but effectively illustrated by the text of Professor Holden, and capital pictures accompany the papers on grizzly bears, on orchids, and on the New Orleans exhibition. One difficulty with Mrs. Howell's "Silas Lapham" is to conceive how anybody could care for either of the young ladies. The "Prophet of the Great Smoky Mountains" is ably continued in the Atlantic Monthly. The chief of the miscellaneous articles is a valuable and discriminating criticism on Mrs. Oliphant, by Miss H. W. Preston.

"Mitre Court," Mrs. Riddell's serial in Temple Bar, is one of the most lively stories now publishing, full of variety and excitement, and rich in well-defined character. "A Girton Girl" has fewer literary pretensions, but is still very good. "The Varnishing Ticket," the tale of a "broken-hearted artist," is a very pathetic story. "The Russian Armament" has nothing to do with recent politics, but is a clever evisceration of the memoirs of Sir James Bland Burges.

With the exception of Miss O'Hanlon's spirited novel, the articles in the Gentleman's Magazine are scientific or literary. Mr. Grant Allen traces up the origin of life to chlorophyll, Mr. Baring-Gould gives a brief account of the Erckmann-Chatrian pair, Dr. O'Leary criticizes the revised version of the Old Testament with favour, and Mr. Atwell obliges us with some select thoughts of the Swiss moralist, Petit Senn. "A Strange Voyage" and "Babylon" continue to amuse the readers of Belgravia, the minor contributions are of little mark. Time has a somewhat remarkable study of Mr. Gladstone, by Mr. T. P. O'Connor, who has evidently been a close observer of the Premier. There is much poetical power in Miss E. Nesbit's poem "The Dead to the Living"; and Mr. Purves's criticism on Mr. Thomas Hardy's rustics is much to the point. London Society, considerably improved of late, has interesting papers on "Curiosities of the Cardinalate," "Oxford Memories," and "The Family of an Afghan Prince in Exile."

The Art Journal has for frontispiece a line engraving after A. C. Gow, A.R.A., called "Requisitioned," which, as an engraving, is extremely poor and weak. Mr. Joseph Hatton continues to gossip about "London Clubland," and Mr. F. G. Stephens contributes an interesting paper on Hammersmith and Chiswick. Notes on the exhibitions and other articles help to make up an agreeable Number.

The Magazine of Art for June (Cassell and Co.) is remarkable for an interesting article, well illustrated, on Handel and his portraits. The other contents of the Number, literary and pictorial, are varied and good.

Besides the Magazine of Art, the principal serials of the enterprising firm of Messrs. Cassell, Petter, Galpin, and Co., are—Egypt: Descriptive, Historical, and Picturesque, Illustrated Book of Pigeons, Picturesque Canada, Cassell's Magazine, The Quiver (containing an article on the Revised Version of the Old Testament, by the Dean of Canterbury, one of the revisers), Cassell's Saturday Journal, Greater London, Royal Shakspere, Familiar Wild Flowers, Book of Health, Old and New London, Illustrated Universal History, Popular Gardening, Picturesque Europe, Picturesque America, Life and Words of Christ, Little Folks' Magazine, Popular Educator, and Our Own Country.

We have further to acknowledge the receipt of Moniteur de la Mode, World of Fashion, La Saison, Le Follet, Gazette of Fashion, The Red Dragon, The Scottish Geographical Magazine, London Society, The Argosy, The Month, Good Words, The Army and Navy Magazine, Household Words, Eastward Ho! The Antiquarian, Chambers's Journal, All the Year Round, Merry England, Irish Monthly, Leisure Hour, Book Lore, United Service Magazine, Fores's Sporting Notes and Sketches, The Theatre, St. Nicholas, Harper's Young People, Illustrated Science Monthly, Technical Journal, Baptist Magazine, Aunt Judy's Magazine, Christian Treasury, Sunday Talk, Babyhood, and The Rosebud.

Sixty head mistresses of high and intermediate schools, representing upwards of 12,000 pupils, assembled at the Grey Coat Hospital, Westminster, on Friday and Saturday last week, on the occasion of the annual conference of the Association of Endowed and Proprietary Schools. Many subjects of importance connected with teaching were discussed.

THE ROYAL HUNT CUP, ASCOT RACES.
SHIELD REPRESENTING "THE MARCH OF THE AMAZONS."

THE ROYAL HUNT CUP, ASCOT.

The piece of plate representing "the Royal Hunt Cup" at Ascot Races this year is not a cup, but a silver shield, manufactured by Messrs. Hancocks and Co., of Bruton-street, which is a good work of art. It was designed and modelled by a well-known sculptor, Mr. C. B. Birch, A.R.A.; the design represents, in the centre, the head of Hippolyta, the Queen of the Amazons; and, round this, some equestrian groups of those female warriors passing in procession before their Queen. The arms or weapons carried by the Amazons are represented on the border. The shield, which consists of 600 ounces of silver, with its surface partly oxydised, is thirty-two inches in diameter, and is mounted on a black ebony plinth; its cost is £500. It will be a handsome ornament in the house of the winner of the "Royal Hunt Cup."

THE HOLLOWAY SANATORIUM.

On Monday the Prince of Wales, accompanied by the Princess of Wales and their three daughters, and by the Duke of Cambridge, opened this noble institution, at St. Anne's-heath, close to the Virginia Water railway station. It is an asylum for patients of the middle classes of both sexes, afflicted with mental disorders, but is intended to be, in its ordinary management, to a considerable degree self-supporting, a moderate charge being made for the reception of inmates whose families can afford to pay. The munificent founder, the late Mr. Thomas Holloway, bestowed more than a million sterling upon the erection and permanent endowment of the Sanatorium and of the Holloway College for Women, which stands at a short distance, at Mount Lee, and which has been described and illustrated in this Journal. His noble designs have been carried out by the trustees of his fund, Mr. George Martin-Holloway, his brother-in-law, and Mr. Henry Driver-Holloway. The buildings for the two institutions are planned and completed in every detail with the minutest care and forethought, and with the finest taste for beauty and pleasantness. The architect is Mr. W. H. Crossland, who designed the Townhall at Rochdale. All the features of structure and decoration in the Sanatorium, from the tower, like the famous belfry of Ypres, to the kitchen, from the recreation or lecture hall to the garden and shrubbery, are on a grand scale, and devised with the kind purpose of affording weary if not worn-out brain-workers an opportunity of recovering their faculties. Red brick with stone dressing for the exterior and grey marble for the interior of the large hall, the refectory, and other chief apartments, were not considered to afford sufficient variety, so the stone surfaces have been enriched with colour and plentiful gilding. In one part the interior decorations are of the grotesque character often associated with Gothic architecture. The great lecture-hall is very richly gilt, and is adorned with portraits of distinguished persons. The refectory, also richly decorated, is made additionally beautiful and interesting by a series of pastoral fancy groups after Watteau, forming a frieze, above which are smaller groups in lunettes. Throughout the building the idea of variety, of the importance of placing objects of interest before a dimmed but not inferior intelligence, is never lost sight of. There are no blank walls; but the whole, even of the entrance-hall and staircase, except the marble top of the balustrade, is covered with gilding or bright colour. Every apartment has its own bright, cheerful, artistic treatment; so that the Sanatorium must rank amongst the public buildings of the country famous for their decorations. The rooms, great and small, are exquisitely furnished. Much of the art work has been executed by students of the National Art-Training School, under the direction of Mr. Poynter. The institution and the surrounding grounds include some forty acres, the building containing about 600 rooms, disposed on four floors, and capable of accommodating about 250 patients. The expense hitherto incurred is about £300,000. Dr. Sutherland Rees Philipps is appointed Medical Superintendent.

The opening ceremony was in the large hall, which is to be used for concerts and other entertainments. The Royal party having taken their places on the platform, Mr. Martin-Holloway delivered a brief address, explaining that all the internal arrangements of the Sanatorium are planned for maintaining general health, for isolating special cases of disease, for enabling the attendants to live unobtrusively close to their patients, and for giving the patients an idea of freedom combined with active surveillance. The Prince of Wales briefly replied; and the guests dispersed to enjoy the hospitality of their host in dining-rooms and tents. The arrangements, which were in charge of Mr. Trendell, were perfectly successful. The Sanatorium is ready for immediate occupation; and we believe that some patients were in the establishment this week. It is available only for curable cases of insanity; and the fees paid by patients will depend upon the amount of accommodation they require. Applications for half the possible number of admissions have been already accepted, and by the end of the year it is expected that the Sanatorium will be full.

Oxford Commemoration festivities have been held this week.

Her Majesty's armoured barbette-ship Benbow was launched from the yard of the Thames Iron Works and Shipbuilding Company at Blackwall on Monday, the christening ceremony being performed by Mrs. Gladstone.

A fire broke out last Wednesday morning in one of the haberdashery shops at Mr. Whiteley's, in Westbourne-grove, Bayswater. The outbreak occurred in the portion of the premises replacing that destroyed by fire nearly three years ago. About one fifth of the Westbourne-grove premises have now been burnt out. The building is insured, but not the stock or fixtures.

The Marquis of Lorne opened on the 11th inst. the summer exhibition of the Yorkshire Fine Art and Industrial Institution, York, at which Princess Louise is an exhibitor. There was a distinguished company present, including the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress, Sir Frederick Milner, M.P., and the members of the City Corporation. Subsequently Lord Lorne was entertained by the Lord Mayor to luncheon.

1. Entrance-hall for patients. 2. Turkish-bath rooms. 3. Chapel. 4. Recreation-hall. 5. Patients' villa. 6. Dr. Phillips's house. 7. One of the sitting-rooms.

THE HOLLOWAY SANATORIUM, VIRGINIA WATER.

DRAWN BY F. BARNARD.

Great was his astonishment when Clare suddenly fell on her knees, crying—"Oh, Adrian, do you think you will ever be able to forgive me!"

ADRIAN VIDAL.

"THE LAND WHERE ALL THINGS ARE FORGOTTEN."

Adrian had left his house in the morning without any more distinct idea of how he was going to spend the day than that he did not mean to spend it at home. There were a good many things which it behoved him to do—amongst others, it might be well that he should begin getting in his tradesmen's bills and forming some estimate of what he owed—but he did not feel equal to undertaking disagreeable duties, and in the end he sauntered down to his club and tried to read the papers. Whilst he was thus occupied, a note, addressed in Heriot's shaky handwriting, was brought to him.

"Dear Adrian (it ran),—If you will look in to-day or to-morrow, and rather to-day than to-morrow, I shall think it kind of you. I have been very bad this last week—about as bad as I could be—and I don't want to miss the chance of seeing you, now that I have a respite.

"Yours always, W. H."

Adrian's conscience pricked him when he read this appeal. He had made only one effort to see Heriot since the latter's return to England, and on that occasion his friend had been too ill to receive him. Since then he had found one excuse after another for shirking the interrogatories which he was sure awaited him in Brook-street. He had never until now felt that his breach with Clare was likely to prove a final one, and so long as it remained unhealed the less that was said about it the better. But he could not refuse to visit the sick when directly begged to do so; nor, indeed, did his reason for absenting himself any longer exist. He could relate the plain facts now, and really it did not appear to him that he was open to the rebuke of any candid man. Such sins as he had committed he had confessed and asked pardon for. Heriot would hardly suggest that he should acknowledge himself guilty where he had been innocent, or that he should tamely submit to be disbelieved when he had pledged his word to the truth of a statement.

But he forgot all about his wrongs and his rights the moment that he entered the bed-room where Heriot lay extended upon a sofa. When a man has been dying for a number of years, the end generally comes as a shock to those who have watched him; and the first sight of his friend's face sent the blood back to Adrian's heart. Nor was he able to conceal his dismay; for Heriot said at once, with a faint smile,

"I have pretty nearly come to the last words of the last chapter, you see."

"My dear old chap, I won't have you talk like that!" exclaimed Adrian, recovering himself. "You've had a bad bout of it, that's all."

But Heriot, still smiling, shook his head. "No; I have had my last bout but one. I don't want to brag; but I think I may say that I have fought Death as long as any man could be expected to fight. Now he has got me down, and I am only waiting for the coup de grâce. The doctor told me plainly, the other day, that I had not the strength to rally from another attack."

"How can he possibly tell?"

"Perhaps he can't; but I can. I know when I am beaten; and, to tell you the truth, I am not very sorry to be near the finish. I have been through a good deal of suffering, as you know; but I am not sure whether intense weakness is not worse. And I have no fear of death. Death, after all, is a release. Nobody knows what it is; but I suppose it must, at all events, be that. Isn't it curious to think how very little speculation there has been upon the subject? The whole army of humanity marching steadily on towards the same goal, and not one individual having the slightest idea whither he is bound—or caring much!"

"But we have some idea, surely," objected Adrian, who was himself orthodox after a somewhat unthinking fashion, and had never doubted but that his friend was equally sound.

"You mean that most of us believe in the immortality of the soul, and that you and I are Christians. But Christianity tells us nothing about a future state of existence; for I should think there are very few people who can accept the Apocalypse as a literal description of it, or would like the prospect if they could. For the rest, we have one branch of the Church believing in Paradise and Purgatory, while another declares them to be fond things, vainly invented, and sends mankind direct to Heaven or Hell, with perhaps just the shadow of a mental reservation as regards the latter. All these are only names; we can't conceive the meaning of them any more than we can comprehend infinity."

"I suppose that is why speculation has always been felt to be useless."

"Perhaps so. Still it seems strange that the mystery of our fate should weigh so little upon us. When I look back upon my life, it appears to have been quite short—only a few years—and now eternity is close upon me. What is going to be done with me, I wonder?"

"I know one thing, Heriot," said the younger man, warmly; "if ever mortal deserved Heaven, you do!"

But Heriot was not listening to him. "'The land where all things are forgotten,'" he murmured, dreamily—"the man who said that was in no hurry to go there. But I don't know—it has a restful sound."

"Not to me!" exclaimed Adrian. "To me it sounds like a cry of despair. You can't wish to forget everything and everybody; that would be tantamount to losing your identity altogether; it is another word for annihilation. You can't wish for that."

"I wish for rest, I think. A long, long sleep—I believe that is what I should like, if I could choose. The fact of the matter is that I am tired out. Adrian, old fellow, we have always been good friends, haven't we?"

"Always, dear old man," answered Adrian, getting up and seating himself nearer to the sofa on which Heriot was lying. "And now we have to bid one another good-bye. As I tell you, I don't know what is going to become of me, or whether I shall be able to remember you in 'the land where all things are forgotten'; but I shouldn't like to be forgotten at once by you—or by your wife."

"You know you won't be forgotten."

"Well, not literally, I hope. And perhaps you will feel glad to have granted the last favour that I shall ask of you."

"Heriot," said Adrian, "if there is any possible return that I can make for all the kindnesses that you have done me ever since I first knew you, tell me of it. The more difficult it is, the better I shall be pleased."

"It's a little difficult—not very," answered Heriot, smiling. "I only want you two to be friends again."

Adrian groaned. "I am afraid you have asked for an impossibility," he said. "I came here to-day thinking that you meant to lecture me, and I was prepared to defend myself; but I won't say all that I intended to say. I will only tell you that I have tried to make friends, and that I have utterly failed. She never had much confidence in me, and now she tells me plainly that she has none, and declines to believe my word. Don't let us speak about it any more."

"Come, Adrian, you can't suppose that I shall accept that as an answer. Tell me what you were going to say, if I had lectured you. Tell me the whole history, will you? I don't believe I have ever understood all the ins and outs of this matter. I am going to die, you know, so I can't betray your secrets; and you used to think me a pretty good hand at giving you advice in difficulties."

Adrian was not altogether unwilling to comply with this request. He said, despondently, "Talking about it won't make it any better;" but probably that statement did not quite accurately express his belief. He gave a very fair account of his married life, concealing none of its events, and not endeavouring to make out a better case for himself than the circumstances warranted.

"You see," he said, in conclusion, "it's hopeless. Do you remember that evening when you came down to my lodgings at Polruth and warned me that Clare was a woman who could be easily made unhappy and who could not easily forgive? You might have gone farther, and said that there wasn't a chance of her being happy with me and that she couldn't possibly forgive. She would, if she could; I don't doubt that. Last night she told me that she wanted to believe me—only she couldn't. It has been so from the first. It isn't in her power to trust me when appearances are against me; and so I don't see how we can ever be friends. We shall not quarrel again, though, if that is any consolation."

Heriot, who, during Adrian's narration, had been lying back with closed eyes and had made no remark, remained silent a little longer. "Are you quite sure that you have told me everything?" he asked, by-and-by.

"Everything, upon my honour. You, at all events, will believe me when I say that."

"You must remember that you have given Clare's faith in you some rather severe trials. How would you have liked it if she had received a letter from some man—let us say from Wilbraham, though that is scarcely putting it strongly enough—and had torn it to pieces before your eyes, sooner than let you read it? What would you have thought if you had found her in Wilbraham's house? Supposing she had refused to enter into any explanations, but had simply said, 'I am innocent, and you ought never to have doubted me'? Supposing you had had the extraordinary magnanimity to promise that you would say no more about it, only stipulating that she should cease to receive Wilbraham, and supposing that she had gone on receiving him in spite of you?"

"Really, Heriot, the cases are not parallel."

"Of course they are not—from a conventional point of view; but I want you to realise her point of view; and I think, after all that has passed, you can hardly blame her for being a little more incredulous than you would like her to be. And if she is, never mind. You have only to speak to her in a certain way, and she will believe a contradiction in terms. Now, you know that as well as I do, don't you?"

"I am not sure," said Adrian, dubiously.

"Oh yes, you are. Believe me, it isn't worth while to stand on your dignity with a person whom you care for. What you gain by it doesn't make up, by a very long way, for what you lose. And please to observe that I practise what I preach. I may have thought it a little unfriendly of you to stay away from me all these weeks; I may have been fully entitled to say to myself that you might go to the deuce for me. But you see I didn't want to die without saying good-bye to you; and so I put my pride in my pocket. Shall I part with the last shred of pride that remains to me, and make a confession to you which I have never made to any other living being? Will you laugh at me if I do?"

"It would puzzle you to say anything that would make me feel inclined to laugh just now," replied Adrian, drearily.

"Well, I don't know why I shouldn't carry my secret to my grave with me, except that I have a foolish feeling that I should like Clare to hear of it after I am gone. It is only that, if I had been a man who could think of marriage, I should have asked her to marry me years ago. There! Don't make any remark about it, please. It is permitted to every man to dream—especially when his dream is beyond the remotest possibility of realisation. You won't mind; nor, I hope, will she. And perhaps you will both understand better now why I wish so much that you should be happy together again, as you used to be."

"Ah, Heriot, you would have made her happier than I ever can!"

"Don't talk nonsense. There is only one person in the world who can make her happy, and that is yourself. Resign yourself to the fact that there is to be an end to your troubles; and in the meantime oblige me by looking a little less dismal."

Adrian shook his head. "I can't help it. You can't expect me to look cheerful when you tell me that I am going to lose my best friend."

"It will be time enough to moan when you have lost him."

"I have completely failed in my trade, too."

"Excuse me; you have done no such thing. You have had a slight check, which will make you more careful in future—nothing worse than that."

"Besides, I am in a mess about money. I shall have to start again as a much poorer man than I expected to be."

"I don't think you need let that worry you much."

Adrian shrugged his shoulders. It was all very well for a rich man to make light of the ills of poverty; but he knew that they were real enough, though they might not be so great as the other misfortunes which he had to face.

"And now," said Heriot, after an interval of silence, "I must send you away. I am beginning to feel tired, and I shall have to stop talking. I want you and Clare to come and see me to-morrow afternoon, if you will. You can tell her all that I have said to you—except, of course, the one thing which she must not be told so long as I am alive—and as soon as you come in, I shall know by your faces whether the bad days are over or not."

"I will bring her," answered Adrian, getting up and taking Heriot's hand. "And I promise you," he added, "that, if it depends upon me to put an end to the bad days, they shall be put an end to."

"Thank you. I don't doubt you, and I have no fear. Till to-morrow, then."

CHAPTER XLIII.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

Adrian's heart was heavy as he walked away. He knew very well what it was that he had promised; he meant to keep his promise, and believed that the result would be much what Heriot had predicted; yet he could not look forward to the future with any feeling of hope or joy. It was probably true that if he spoke to Clare, as Heriot had said, "in a certain way," she would cease to doubt him; but it seemed to him that it was not so much his pride as his self-respect that he was asked to sacrifice, and he could not think that Clare's love for him was capable of resuscitation by such means. The dead past could not, perhaps, be resuscitated by any means—certainly not by the kind of reconciliation which he foresaw. Still, it would please Heriot—poor old Heriot, who was neither poor nor old in the sense given to those words by the dictionary, but who, now that his life was near an end, could look back upon a greater measure of suffering than most old men look back upon, and whose lack of the good things of this world had been equal to that of many a so-called pauper. The tears came into Adrian's eyes when he thought of the man's quiet heroism and of the romance which had been so long and so successfully concealed. His impressionable nature had been profoundly moved by that revelation; he had at once realised how many hundreds of stabs Heriot must have received and submitted to with a smiling face; he pitied him with a pity which may have been more intense than the case called for. For, indeed, it is no such easy matter to distinguish between what is real and what is imaginary in this world of shadows; and the happiness that comes from dreams is at least as real, while it lasts, as any other kind of happiness. It is certain that Heriot would not at any time have consented to part with his dream. But Adrian was not cold-blooded enough to take comfort from analysis of emotion. He could only see the pathetic aspect of his friend's life. Never once had he heard Heriot utter a complaint of pain, physical or mental; he had borne everything with the same unfaltering patience—a patience sublime and possibly self-sufficing, but which had met with very little recognition, and could now meet with no reward—unless it might be "in the land where all things are forgotten."

Those words kept on ringing in Adrian's ears. To him, in the fulness of youth and health, they were terrible words. He could not conceive of a state of mind in which perfect rest should seem to be the chief good. He endeavoured to imagine what the probable awakening of the spirit, set free from the body, would be, and found, of course, that there is nothing upon which to base even the shade of probability. Who has not, at one time or another, striven with aching eyes to see through the impenetrable darkness which hangs over the grave? Who has not learnt that such strivings are vain? "They that have done good shall go into life everlasting, and they that have done evil into everlasting fire," say the orthodox, and are content with that; "Death is at least the end of pain," say the heterodox, and seek to know no more; while those who halt between two opinions—are they not the majority?—can only turn away with a sigh and try to think about something else.

The latter course was undoubtedly that which Adrian would adopt in due time; but just now it was a little beyond his reach. He could not acquiesce quietly in anything that was sad or painful or incomprehensible; he must either put it out of his mind or it must be explained for him. His was one of those natures which demand consolation, and which, fortunately, are ever ready to accept it, so long as it presents itself in an attractive form. The grey towers of Westminster Abbey and the bell tolling for afternoon service struck him as a sort of response to his unspoken appeal. He had intended to take the underground railway at St. James's Park and make his way home; but now he thought he would turn aside into the old Abbey, where so many generations of worshippers have found comfort for their souls, and see whether the influence of the place would not do for him what it had done for them.

He entered at the moment when the organ was pealing out the opening voluntary. The procession of clergy and choristers was passing into the choir, and he, following in their wake, slipped into a vacant stall. The congregation was not a numerous one, consisting only of some half-dozen persons scattered among the stalls and of a rather larger number assembled in the transept. Adrian did not notice them. Already he was beginning to find what he had come to seek. His senses were soothed and his nerves quieted by the gloom and coolness, by the shafts of coloured light that streamed through the stained windows, by the thick London atmosphere which penetrated into the building and lent additional height and space to the pillars and arches and the vaulted roof. He felt the charm of the clear, sweet singing, and of the dignity and refinement which seem to raise the Anglican cathedral service to a somewhat higher religious plane than can be reached by the ceremonies of the older Catholic communion, with its strange mixture of grandeur and tawdriness, and its still stranger insensibility to bathos.

Adrian, however, was not occupied in drawing comparisons; nor, if the truth must be told, was he saying his prayers, as he knelt there, his elbows on the huge, musty-smelling volume which lay open before him. His wandering thoughts—led thither, perhaps, by the familiar chants and cadences—had drifted away to his school-days; to those old days when everything had been so plain and simple, and when the broad black and white which distinguished right from wrong, and truth from falsehood, had been obscured by no perplexing intermediate tints. "After all," he reflected, "one must go back to that: blind faith or no faith at all." In that solemn, ancient cathedral the faith to which it owed its existence, the faith of childhood, the faith of the saints and martyrs, was less difficult to lay hold of, and the Heaven of the Revelations, which Heriot had said that no man could desire to accept literally, did not seem a mere allegorical vision.

And when Adrian had mechanically risen to his feet and had looked up the anthem, what was it that they began to sing? "Behold, I show you a mystery. In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye. . . . The trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed."

Great is the power of words: upon Adrian it was somewhat greater than upon the ordinary run of mortals. Those magnificent rolling sentences, wedded to music not less magnificent, lifted him out of himself; he seemed to see the gates of Heaven open and time lost in eternity, and could understand that of such a man as Heriot it might well be said Mors janua vitæ. Logic was not his strong point; he had not that fatal precision of ideas which is such a sad curb upon the imagination of those who possess it. In compensation he often reached the truth at a bound, and, having done so, never cared to cast a backward glance upon the maze through which others had laboriously threaded their way to the same point. There was no valid reason why his doubts and perplexities should have been dissipated by the repetition of phrases which he must have heard a hundred times before; but they were so dissipated, and that was all that he asked for.

When he sank upon his knees again he could look out on the present and the future with an altered gaze. The littlenesses and pettinesses of life had shrunk almost to the point of disappearance, and he marvelled that he had allowed them to loom so gigantic before him as to shut out all view of the hereafter. It will be understood that the power of seeing things in their actual proportions was denied to him; he had always to look through a telescope or a microscope, or a diminishing-glass. But perhaps that is no such uncommon case; and at all events he had now reached the happy conclusion that his long quarrel with Clare was but a molehill which his folly and hers had exaggerated into a mountain. He thought that if she were beside him at that moment it might be swept away almost without any need for speech. Then he started violently; for his eyes, roaming idly this way and that, had fallen upon the north transept, where, with her chin upon her folded hands and a stray sunbeam lighting up her golden hair, Clare herself was kneeling.

It was evident that she was unaware of her husband's vicinity. Her head was slightly thrown back; her eyes had a rapt unconsciousness; her face wore a look of pain and humiliation. She might have passed for some suppliant sinner, asking of Heaven the pardon which it was vain to expect from man. But it was not in that way that Adrian interpreted her attitude and expression. He saw that she was suffering; he thought he knew why she was suffering, and he longed to step softly across the intervening space and whisper to her that she need be unhappy no more.

Since that was impracticable, he waited until the service was over, and then, following her as she passed out, touched her lightly on the elbow.

When she turned and recognised her husband, a rush of colour came into her cheeks, then ebbed away, leaving her paler than she had been before. "I—I did not know you were here," she said, in a bewildered, hesitating way. "I was on my way back from the hospital, and I thought I should like to come in for the service. You said you would not be home before dinner-time."

"Are you apologising for going to church on a week-day?" asked Adrian, smiling. "I believe there is no law against that; but if there is, I am as guilty as you."

He supposed that it was of the Children's Hospital that she spoke, and set down her agitation to surprise at seeing him. "Shall we go home together?" he asked, presently.

"Yes, if you like, answered Clare; and then, with a sort of gasp—"Adrian, I must say something to you."

"But not now—not now," he returned, hastily. "I, too, have something to say as soon as we get home; I can't speak about it in the street."

He called a hansom, helped her into it, and sat down beside her. Not another word passed between them from that moment until they reached their own door; but Adrian's hand sought Clare's, and though she did not return the pressure which he gave to her fingers, she allowed him to kept possession of them, and that was perhaps as much as he had any right to expect.

When at length they were within their own four walls, Adrian drew Clare after him into the drawing-room and stood, holding both her hands and looking into her eyes, which dropped before his. Hopeful as his mood was, he still thought that he had a task of some little difficulty before him, and great was his astonishment when Clare suddenly fell on to her knees, crying—

"Oh, Adrian, do you think you will ever be able to forgive me?"

He stooped and raised her to her feet by main force. "My dear child," he exclaimed, "what do you mean? I was going to ask you to forgive me. It was my fault that you didn't believe what I told you yesterday; but you believe me now, don't you? And if you don't, I can convince you—I am sure I can."

But she drew back, saying, "Stop! you don't know what a wretch I have been! It has been my fault, not in the least yours, from beginning to end; and there is no excuse for me, because, if I had been open with you, everything would have been explained long ago. I don't see how you can possibly go on caring for me after I have told you this; but there is no help for it—I must tell you."

She sank down into a chair and partly covered her face with her hands. "Don't look at me!" she exclaimed. "Don't come near me until I have finished!"

But Adrian ventured to disobey this command. He seated himself close to his wife, put his arm round her waist and drew her head down on to his shoulder. "My dear," he said, "you may be very sure that you have committed no offence against me that I can't easily and willingly pardon."

"Ah," she cried, "you trust me! I didn't trust you."

"Trust me now," returned Adrian. "Tell me everything, and don't be afraid."

And so it was that by slow degrees the story of Susan Bowman's revenge and repentance was unfolded.

Mr. Allan Hornsby, Secretary to the Irish Fisheries Board, has been appointed Inspector of Irish Fisheries, in the room of Mr. W. Johnston; and Mr. George Coffey, Barrister, has been appointed Secretary to the Board.

Monday was the last day of the fence season for Thames coarse fish angling, and all-round angling can now be enjoyed. The Thames, by the action of the voluntary preservation societies, is well stocked with pike, perch, roach, chub, barbel, bream, carp, and other varieties of coarse fish, as well as with trout of large size.

Messrs. Christie on Saturday last brought to a close the sale of the first portion of the Beckett-Denison art collection, which included the pictures. A remarkable incident of the day was the disposal of the famous painting by Rubens, "Daniel in the Den of Lions," for which Mr. Denison gave 5000 guineas at the Hamilton Palace sale. It was now bought back on behalf of the Duke of Hamilton for 2000 guineas, his Grace thus clearing 3000 guineas by this transaction. The first portion of the sale realised £47,795.

MUSIC.

The Royal Italian Opera was to have opened on Tuesday evening; but, in consequence of the indisposition of Madame Adelina Patti, the opening was postponed to this (Saturday) evening, when she is to appear as Violetta, in "La Traviata," as announced for Tuesday.

The Balfe Memorial Concert, which took place at the Royal Albert Hall last week, was a great success. It began with a selection from "Il Talismano," a posthumous work originally composed to English text as "The Knight of the Leopard," and first produced in Italian as "Il Talismano" at Drury-Lane Theatre in 1874, when Madame Christine Nilsson sustained the character of Edith Plantagenet, the selection including Madame Nilsson's charming vocalisation in "Edith's Prayer" and the Rondo "Radiant Splendours," and with Mr. Maas in the beautiful "Ring duet." Madame Trebelli gave Berengaria's "Romance" with naïve expression, Mr. Maas sang the "Rose-Song" with refined style, and Mr. L. Crotty delivered the prayer and war-song with excellent declamation. Various pieces followed the operatic selection. Mr. Sims Reeves gained the usual applause in "Come into the garden, Maud," and other effective performances were contributed by Mdlle. Corani, Miss Hope Glenn, and Mr. L. Crotty. The remainder of the concert consisted of extracts from "The Bohemian Girl" and a short miscellaneous selection, in which vocalists already named were heard.

The St. Cecilia Society (directed by Mr. Malcolm Lawson) gave its sixth public concert at St. James's Hall last week. The band and chorus consist of lady performers reinforced by Miss Carmichael at the pianoforte and Mr. Turpin as organist. The chorus was heard to advantage in several pieces, and effective vocal performances were contributed by Miss L. Phillips, Madame Fassett, and others; dance music of the old school having been played by the lady instrumentalists.

Señor Sarasate, the renowned Spanish violinist, gave the fifth and last of his grand orchestral concerts of the season, at at St. James's Hall, last Saturday afternoon, when he performed with rare skill and refinement a "concert-stück" and Rondo by M. Saint-Saëns, and solo pieces of his own composition. A full orchestra, conducted by Mr. W. G. Cusins, contributed to the programme.

The eighth Richter concert of the eleventh series took place at St. James's Hall last Monday evening, when a symphony, by R. Fuchs, was performed for the first time in England. The work contains some effective orchestral writing, but has no special characteristics, and it produced but little impression. The remainder of the programme requires no comment. Herr Henschel was the vocalist.

The concert announced some weeks back to be given by the late Sir Julius Benedict at Drury-Lane Theatre on Tuesday next, will take place for the benefit of Lady Benedict, the programme being similar to that previously arranged, including dramatic as well as musical performances.

Mdlle. Van Zandt appeared at the Gaiety Theatre on Tuesday night, in the performance, by the French Opera Company, of "Mignon," in the title-character of which the young lady achieved a success equal to that which she obtained in her recent performance as Lakmé, already noticed. In the dramatic and poetical aspect of Goethe's imaginary heroine, and in vocal charm and brilliancy, Mdlle. Van Zandt's performance on Tuesday was alike admirable. Mdlle. Hamann as Philine, M. Dupuy as Wilhem, M. Soulacroix as Laerte, M. Carroul as Lothario, and others, contributed to the general efficiency of the cast. Signor Bevignani conducted.

The Handel Festival at the Crystal Palace will be the musical event of next week, when it will be held, twelve months in advance of its regular triennial recurrence, on account of this year being the bi-centenary of the composer's birth. We have already given a list of the solo singers. A great musical success may be anticipated from the assemblage of about four thousand performers, conducted by Mr. Manns (who replaced the late Sir Michael Costa at the last Festival, in 1883). The grand public rehearsal took place yesterday (Friday). Of this and of subsequent performances we must speak next week.

Colonel Henry Mapleson's invitation concert on Friday week, at St. James's Hall, was a great success. There was a crowded and brilliant audience, and the programme, in which Madame Marie Roze, Madame Lablache, Miss Kate Flinn, Mr. Herbert Reeves, Signor Papini, and other artists took part, was thoroughly enjoyed. During the evening Dr. Moffat gave a short address on the merits of the ammoniaphone, a reference to Mr. Gladstone as one who had obtained benefit from the invention causing a lively demonstration.

Herr Franz Rummel gave a pianoforte recital at St. James's Hall on Wednesday afternoon; Mr. Alfred H. West gave a pianoforte recital at Messrs. Collard's concert-rooms on Thursday afternoon; and in the evening Madame Dukas' pupils gave a concert at Steinway Hall.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

Paris, Tuesday, June 16.

The only political event of capital importance during the past week has been the announcement of the signature of the preliminaries of peace with China, on June 9. Unfortunately, just at the moment when the country was rejoicing over this news, there came the painful announcement of the death of Admiral Courbet. The Minister of Marine communicated this news to the deputies yesterday, and the sitting was raised in sign of grief. Admiral Courbet, who had, it appears, been suffering for some months past from liver and gastric affections, died of an attack of bilious fever, after forty-eight hours' suffering, on June 11, on board his flag-ship, Le Bayard, moored off Makung (Pescadores Islands). Admiral Courbet was born in 1827, and he was given the command of the Tonquin naval and military expedition after the death of the Commandant Rivière, and the French boast he had nothing but successes. Rear-Admiral Lespès now takes the command in Tonquin. Admiral Courbet's remains will be brought back to France, and will be honoured with a state funeral.

The Grand Prix was run at Longchamps last Sunday, in presence of an immense international crowd and under a broiling sun. The result was in accordance with the general expectation—Paradox, the English horse, first; Reluisant, second; and Present Times, third. According to tradition, the Paris season is now at an end, and people will begin to go to the seaside and the mountains, especially if the present exceedingly hot weather continues.

A new opera, "Sigurd," by M. Ernest Reyer, libretto by MM. Du Locle and Blau, was produced at the Grand Opéra on Friday. M. Reyer finished his score twenty years ago. Under the successive managements of MM. Halanzier and Vaucorbeil, the opera was refused or put off. It was produced at Brussels last year and afterwards at Lyons, and, finally, it has conquered its way before a Parisian public. The story of the opera is taken from the first part of the epopée of the "Nibelungen." One may legitimately ask, Of what essential interest this German legend is to the French? and frankly one cannot prophesy an immense success for the work. In the first place, the opera as presented on Friday was very much truncated, even the overture was suppressed; secondly, the public seemed rather lost in presence of the new slightly Wagnerian formula of the score wanting in simple melodies, duos and cavatines. The music of M. Reyer seems to be inspired chiefly by that of Weber, Gluck, and Berlioz; it is real dramatic music, following closely the letter and the spirit of the word; it is the music of a sincere artist. But, to speak frankly, my impression is that the Parisian audience found "Sigurd" awfully long, and the music—well, not amusing at all.

There is talk of creating once more a Théâtre Italien at Paris, the performances of which would take place at the Grand Opéra on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays. The Under-Secretary of State for the Fine Arts is favourable to the project, in which, it appears, Madame Patti is interested.—The last will of Victor Hugo, dated 1875, names M. Léon Say testamentary executor. A previous will named M. Grevy and M. Gambetta, but M. Grévy refused to act. MM. Vacquerie and Meurice are charged with editing all the unpublished works, and will receive 15 per cent on the profits of the first three volumes by way of compensation. The manuscripts left by Victor Hugo are considerable in mass, and of various nature. Vast bundles of papers contain mere notes, verses, half verses, suggestions, &c. Victor Hugo bequeaths all his manuscripts and all his drawings, which are very numerous, to the Bibliothèque Nationale.—General De Chabaud-Latour died last Thursday, at the age of eighty-one. Officer, Deputy, Minister, in 1874, General De Chabaud-Latour has fulfilled innumerable political and administrative functions. He was the author of the plan which was adopted for the fortifications of Paris.—Pel, the hero of the crime of Montreuil, has been condemned to death, the jury having found him guilty of having poisoned his maid-servant, Eliza Boehmer, and of having burnt her body in fragments in a kitchen range.—T. C.

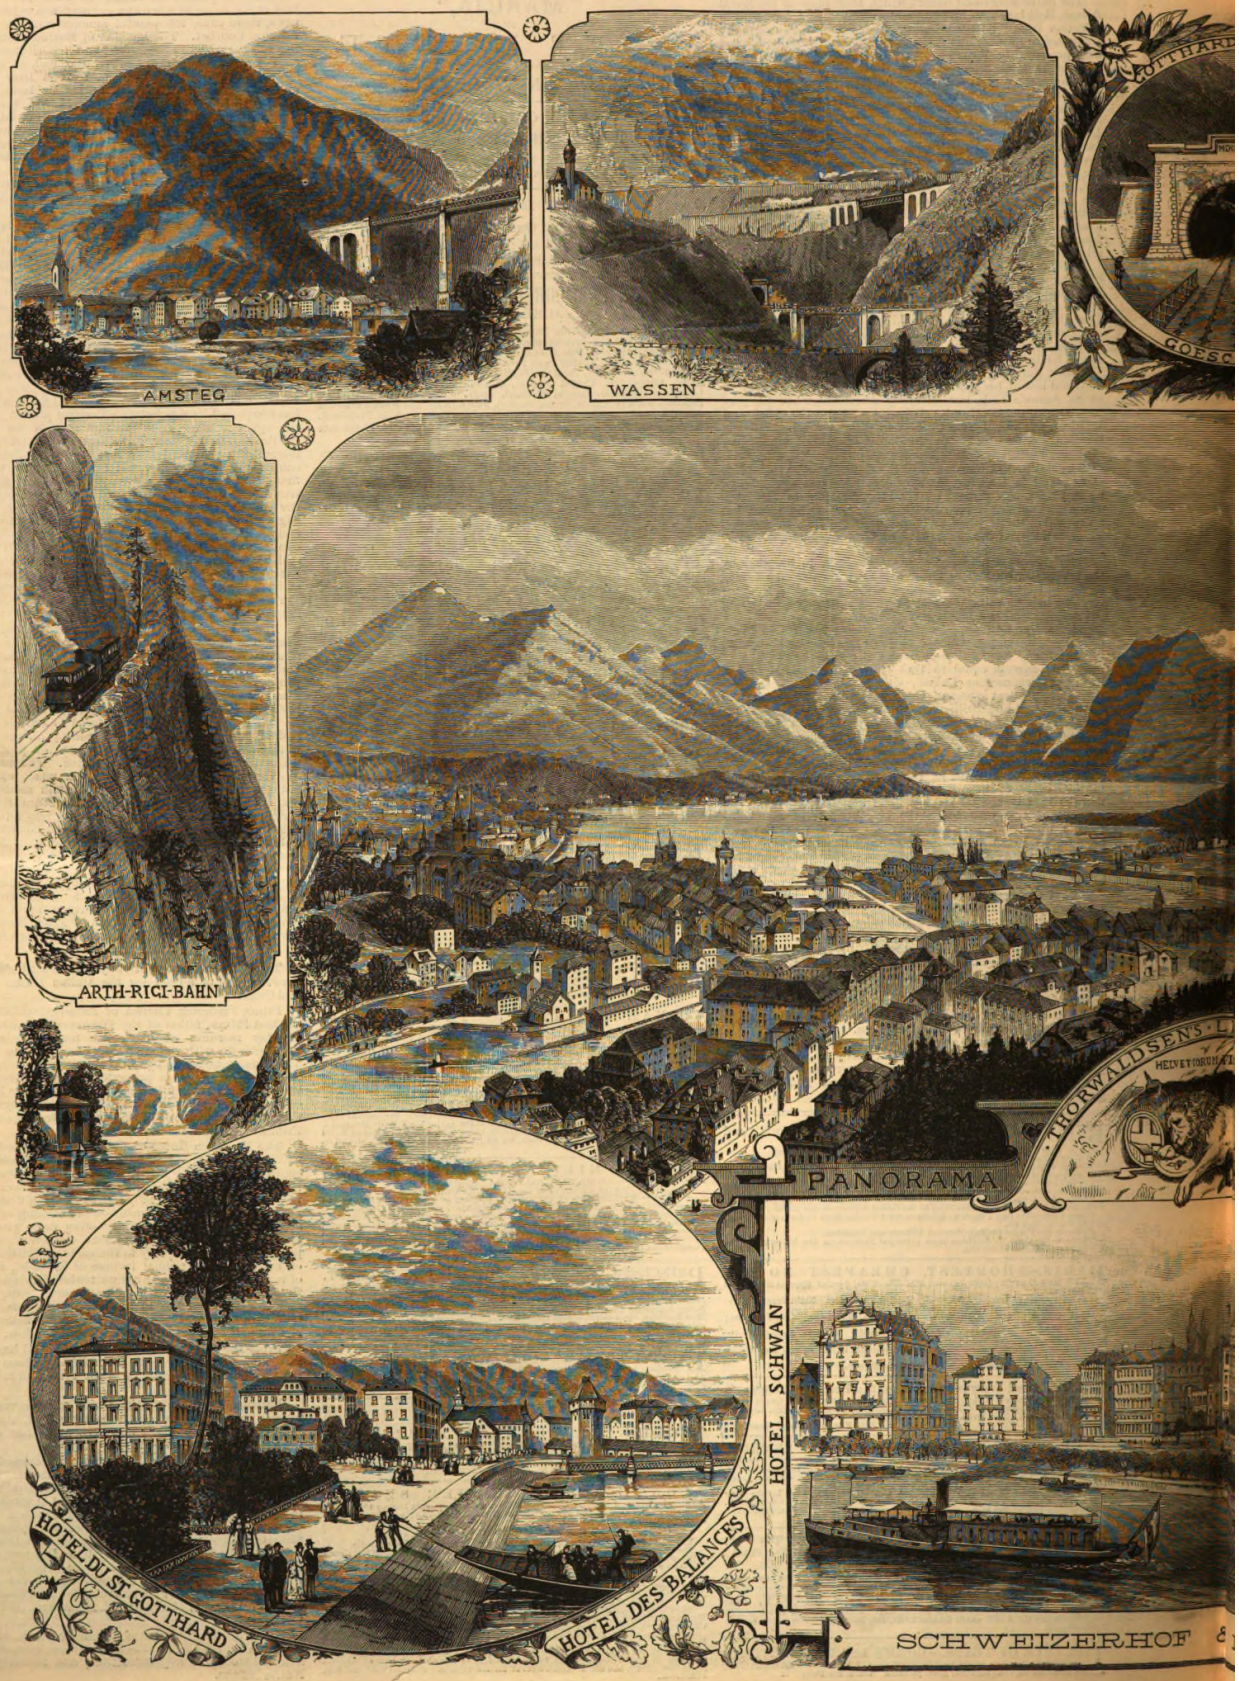
Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia, familiarly known as the Red Prince, father of the Duchess of Connaught, died on Monday morning at his castle near Potsdam, from an apoplectic fit, with which he was seized on the previous day. The German Court will go into mourning for four weeks. The town of Kissingen has presented to Prince Bismarck a laurel wreath, with the following inscription:—"To the great citizen, on the occasion of his fiftieth anniversary of services to the State. The city of Kissingen, with feelings of gratitude." Princess Bismarck has arrived at Kissingen.

The Dominion House of Commons has passed a resolution making a free grant of 5,000,000 acres of land towards the construction of four branch lines from the Canadian Pacific Railway to Prince Albert, Battleford, and other points. The Franchise Bill, which finally passed through Committee in the Dominion House of Commons on the evening of the 9th inst., after a discussion lasting thirty-seven days, gives the vote to Indians on the tribal reserves in the older provinces who possess personal property to the value of 150 dols., to earners of wages with an annual income of 300 dols., and to tenants of real property paying an annual rental of at least 20 dols. The franchise is further extended to farmers' sons, to owners of real property—in cities to the value of 300 dols. and in towns to the value of 200 dols.—and, finally, to fishermen owning real property in boats and tackle worth 150 dols.



From Durban we learn that the Volksraad has rescinded its resolution of the 6th inst. disqualifying those persons who petitioned for the annexation of the Transvaal to Great Britain from holding office.

Earthquake shocks continue with great severity in Cashmere. Two towns have been utterly ruined, and 400 persons have perished. There has also been great loss of life in the neighbouring villages.

The South Australian Parliament was opened on the 12th inst. by the Governor, Sir William Robinson. In the debate on the Address, Mr. Downer, Attorney-General in the former Administration, proposed an amendment of want of confidence in the Ministry, which was carried by four votes. The Ministers thereupon resigned, and Mr. Downer was intrusted with the formation of a new Cabinet, composed as follows:—Premier and Attorney-General, the Hon. John Downer; Chief Secretary, the Hon. J. B. Spence; Treasurer, the Hon. Simon Newland; Commissioner of Crown Lands and Immigration, the Hon. J. H. Howe; Commissioner of Public Works, the Hon. J. Darling; Minister of Education, the Hon. J. A. Cockburn.

The death was announced on the 13th inst., at Wellington, New Zealand, of the Hon. John Sheehan, member of the New Zealand House of Representatives, and formerly Minister of Native Affairs.

LUCERNE.

We present to our readers in this Number of the Illustrated London News a double-page Illustration of Lucerne, with its celebrated lake, and with some places in the neighbourhood. It may be considered that no country is more interesting to tourists than central Switzerland, which abounds with all that can charm the eye and the heart. Nature has here arrayed the mountains, valleys, rivers, and lakes with profuse magnificence, and has adorned the scenery with splendid vegetation, which reaches far up the sides of the snow-topped mountains, the freshness of the verdure being continually kept up by rivulets streaming from the heights; and the eye never wearies with the sublimity of these varied prospects.

Lucerne is distant twenty-four hours' journey from London. The town contains about 20,000 inhabitants. From the Schweizerhof Quay (so called from one of the most sumptuous hotels, the Schweizerhof) will be seen the Rigi group to the left, the snow-clad Urner and Engelberger Alps in the centre, and the Pilatus Mountain to the left. At the end of the Quay is the Hof-kirche, or Stifts-kirche, which possesses some fine altars of carved wood, stained-glass windows, a celebrated organ, and some well-executed monuments in the churchyard. Within a few minutes' walk of the lake is that celebrated monument, the "Lion of Lucerne," sculptured in the solid rock, after a model by the Danish sculptor Thorwaldsen, in 1821. It is in memory of some twenty-five officers and 750 soldiers of the Swiss Guard of Paris, who were cruelly massacred in the defence of the Tuileries in 1792. The dying lion is about 28 ft. in length, and reclines in an alcove, its body being transfixed by a broken lance, its paw sheltering the broken lily. It is certainly one of the most interesting and impressive monuments of its kind. To the left of it is the "Gletscher-garten," an interesting relic of the ice period, with thirty-two holes, formed by whirlpools, of different sizes, worn by the action of the ice.

There is an English Protestant church in the rear of the Schweizerhof, and churches of other denominations close at hand. Lucerne is a city where hotel-keeping has been successfully studied as a desirable science; and there are some luxurious hotels, which will be found depicted in our Illustration. There are also restaurants, cafés, a charming casino, with theatre and opéra bouffe, a ball-room, and other attractions; besides the two daily concerts in the garden of the Schweizerhof. Bathing and boating may be enjoyed on the lake, and there are carriages for excursions. There is an English banker, chemist, and library in the town, and various well-stocked shops, with every article likely to be needed by the tourist. The health of the town is proverbially good; and it is free from those epidemics which have recently embarrassed some of our English travellers whither to wander to escape their dreaded influence.

The Lake Navigation Company possesses a fleet of fourteen boats, of which five are saloon-boats, and capable of carrying upwards of a thousand passengers. These steamers traverse the lake, several times daily to Fluelen, Alpnacht, and Kussnacht, and to Weggis and Vitznau for the Rigi Railway. All these vessels are swift, and are fitted with awnings and every comfort to the traveller, having excellent restaurants on board.

The world-famed St. Gothard Railway is one of the most stupendous works of our century. Its chief feature is the great Gothard tunnel, which is 49,200 feet in length, and is not only the greatest, but also the longest of all the Alpine tunnels; yet the passage through is performed in about twenty minutes, or several minutes less than the journey through the Mont Cenis tunnel, which latter is much shorter than the Gothard. The northern entrance lies in the valley of the Reuss at the height of 3637 English feet; the southern outlet, in the valley of the Tessin, is 3755 feet above the sea; the highest top of the mountain range above the tunnel is 5863 feet. The construction of this tunnel, which has double lines of railway, required nine years and three months, from 1872 to 1881. The cost was about sixty millions of francs, equal to £2,400,000 sterling. We must add that the Gothard Company have employed every possible means to ensure the safety and comfort of travellers, and there are through carriages which go direct to all the principal places, thus avoiding much inconvenience to passengers.

As our space will not permit a more complete account of this wonderful railway, we advise our readers who can afford the time to witness the incomparable beauty of the scenery on the whole length of the Gothard line, for which purpose excursion tickets are issued at Lucerne and other stations of the Gothard line, available for four days, to and from Lake Lugano, at very advantageous rates.

Among our Illustrations are views of the Gothard line. The bridge which crosses the Kerstelen torrent at a height of 175 ft. and a length of 460 ft.; "Wassen," with the train winding in long drays in and out up the mountain; the entrance of the tunnel; the sublime gorge of the Tessin, near Stalvedo; and, lastly, Bellinzona, the capital of the canton of Tessin. To the right and left of the Engravings are shown those of the two Rigi railways, which, with risings or inclines up to 25 deg., climb the Rigi, 5900 ft. in height—the one starting from the beautifully situated village of Vitznau; the other, from the idyllic village of Arth, passing through the débris of the fall of the Rossberg, which buried in 1806 the village of Goldau, together with six churches and chapels, and cost the lives of about five hundred men. The small Sketches, representing Tell's chapel and Schiller's monument, awake poetical and historical remembrances of that part of the land of William Tell, who, though his story is doubted by some critics, lives in the heart of the Swiss people, and has been made immortal by the poetic genius of Schiller.

THE WAR IN THE SOUDAN.

"The Last Shot in the Soudan" may or may not yet have been fired; but Mr. Woodville, in his drawing which has been copied in the Coloured Picture presented for our Extra Supplement, and which is "dedicated to our Australian allies," has treated the incident from that interesting point of view. One of the petty attacks made by detached bands of Osman Digna's followers on a marching column of British troops is repulsed by a few skirmishers of the Mounted Infantry, kneeling to fire in the foreground, while the main body halts for a quarter of an hour, till the enemy are driven from the road. The horses are held, two at a time, by a comrade remaining in the saddle; and the movement is directed by a staff-officer behind. Some clusters of hostile Arabs are still hanging on the side of the hill, but are evidently not disposed to come to close quarters.

Our Special Artist, Mr. Walter Paget, who was lately at Souakim with the army of General Sir Gerald Graham, contributes Sketches of the Lancers watering their horses at the Wells of Handoub; the building of the first advanced station on the line of railway from Souakim to Handoub, which has now been abandoned; and the performance of a native harper belonging to Sheikh Mahmoud Ali, the chief of a friendly tribe, for the amusement of some of our Guards. Sir Gerald Graham, with the officers of his Staff, arrived in England on Saturday last.

CITY ECHOES.

Wednesday, June 17.

Now that Mr. Gladstone's resignation is accepted and Lord Salisbury is proceeding to form a Government, we are brought face to face with political conditions which threaten to greatly interfere with business, since, until the General Election, it is not possible to make sure what will be the foreign or the commercial policy of the next few years, while attention will be further diverted by the preparations for the election. Under these circumstances, money is increasingly difficult to employ, and three-months' bills are being discounted at ¾ per cent per annum, while at times day-to-day loans are scarcely to be placed at all. This is in favour of new issues of a good class, and of such proved securities as are for one reason or another still cheap.

Hudson's Bay shares have somewhat improved on the report, as the accounts show that some dividend might have been paid had the directors not felt it necessary to carry forward a large balance in view of the unsettled state of their trade, due largely to the late "rising" among the Indians. The amount carried forward is equal to 1 s. a share. But the absence of dividend is due to the reduction in net revenue resulting from the decline in the value of furs. As compared with a year ago, the prices obtained in January and March show a fall of 25 to 50 per cent in all but bear skins, which did not alter. The outfit thus realised yielded a profit of but £43,000, as compared with £130,217 last year.

Another great Canadian land company has also published its report for the past year—the Canada North-West Land Company, Limited. In this case, also, there is no dividend; but as it has long been known that land was being sold on but a small scale, no expectations existed under that head.

Beyond paying three dividends, each of 6d. per share, in 1881-2, the Consolidated Telephone Construction and Maintenance Company, Limited, have made no return to the shareholders; but it is now proposed to make an interim distribution of 5 per cent per annum. In consequence of the announcement to this effect, the shares have improved, and are now about ⅞. The United Telephone Company are to make the dividend up to 10 per cent for the past year, as compared with 8 per cent for 1883-4, 6 for 1882-3, and 5 for 1881-2.

Holders of East Indian Railway Deferred Annuities, who for the present are entitled to 4 per cent per annum and a fifth of surplus profits, are to receive 2s. 9d. per cent surplus for the half-year ending with December last. This compares with £1 per cent surplus for the corresponding half of 1883.

The Cape Copper quarterly dividend is 10s. per share, which is the lowest payment made for many years. The shares have £8 paid, and the liability is only up to £10. A few months ago their market value was £40; it is now £30.

The Chelsea Waterworks dividend is 8 per cent per annum, which, as it compares with 7½, shows the company to be unaffected by the questions raised as to what valuation the water rate should be levied on.

From a correspondence published by the directors of the East Argentine Railway Company, there is no immediate prospect of the purchase of the line by the Government being effected.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated Aug. 2, 1877), with three codicils (dated July 16, 1880; Feb. 27, 1883; and Nov. 24, 1884), of Mr. Frank John Moore, late of Woodcock Hill, in the parish of Northchurch, Herts, who died on April 16 last, was proved on the 28th ult. by Charles Oliver Bigg, one of the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £108,000. The testator bequeaths £500 to his trustees to invest for the purposes of the West Herts Infirmary; his plate to go as heirlooms with his mansion, Woodcock House; his household furniture and effects to the person who shall first become entitled to his real estate; and legacies to godchildren, servants, and others. All his real estate and the residue of the personalty he settles upon Alexander Champion Streatfield, for life, with remainder to his eldest son, for life, with remainder to the first and every other son of the said eldest son successively, according to their respective seniorities in tail male. The testator provides that, if any person who is or shall become entitled to his said property be in holy orders, or a minister of any religious denomination, the property so settled shall go to the next person entitled.

Mr. Henry John Hotham, late of Trinity College, Cambridge, died on April 9 last, at San Remo, Italy, a bachelor, without parent, and intestate; and on the 29th ult. Letters of Administration of his personal estate were granted to the Rev. Frederick Harry Hotham, the brother, and one of the next of kin, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £94,000.

The will (dated Jan. 14), with a codicil (dated Jan. 15, 1885), of Mr. William Richard Swainston, late of the Lord Warden Hotel, Dover, who died on Feb. 3 last, was proved on the 21st ult. by Mrs. Helen Swainston, the widow, and William John Swainston, the son, the surviving executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £52,000. The provisions of the will are in favour of testator's wife and children.

The will (dated Sept. 14, 1883) of the Rev. George Currey, D.D., Master of the Charterhouse, who died on April 30 last, at the Master's Lodge, Charterhouse, was proved on the 8th inst. by William Robert Way and the Rev. Thomas William Gibson, the executors, the value of the personal estate exceeding £40,000. The testator bequeaths £250 to the Clergy Orphan Corporation; £100 each to the Incorporated Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, the National Benevolent Institution, the Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy, the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, the East London Hospital for Children, and Firs House, Bournemouth; and legacies to servants, Charterhouse servants, and others. The residue of his real and personal estate he leaves to his two daughters, Frances Georgina and Emma Augusta, in equal shares.

The will (dated Aug. 13, 1878), with three codicils (dated Aug. 13, 1878; Feb. 26, 1883; and Jan. 8, 1885), of Mrs. Maria Burnley Bathoe (daughter of the late Mr. Joseph Hume, M.P.), late of No. 6, Cleveland-gardens, who died on Jan. 30 last, was proved on the 30th ult. by Hans Sloane Stanley and James Hume Webster, two of the executors, the value of the personal estate exceeding £31,000. The testatrix confirms the settlement made by her of the property left to her by her late husband. The trust funds under her marriage settlement she leaves, upon trust, for her sister, Mrs. Balfour, for life; at her death she gives thereout legacies to nephews, nieces, and others, amounting to £10,000; and the remainder of such trust funds to the grandchildren of her late father and mother, Joseph and Maria Hume. There are many pecuniary legacies, and very numerous specific bequests, including the bequest of the service of plate presented to her late father by the electors of Middlesex, to her nephew Arthur Errington Hume and his children; and the residue of her real and personal estate she gives to her niece and goddaughter, Marian Hume Greenhow and Constance Elizabeth Oxenden.

The will (dated Aug. 3, 1880), with a codicil (dated Feb. 12, 1884), of the Very Rev. Joseph Williams Blakesley, B.D., Dean of the Cathedral Church of Lincoln, who died on April 18 last, was proved on the 22nd ult. by George Gisby and Miss Margaret Blakesley, the daughter, the executors, the value of the personal estate, exclusive of property in settlement, amounting to over £14,000. The testator gives legacies to his executors, sons, and butler; and the residue of his real and personal estate to his daughters, Margaret, Elizabeth, Mary, and Alicia. All gifts by will to his children are declared to be in addition to and not in substitution of the provision made for them by his marriage settlement, which he confirms.

The will (dated Dec. 29, 1881), with a codicil (dated May 18, 1883), of Colonel the Hon. Ernest George Curzon, formerly of Aldershott, but late of Shorncliffe, who died on March 6 last, at Gibraltar, was proved on the 2nd inst. by Ernest Charles Penn Curzon and Robert Lothian William Curzon, the sons, two of the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £13,000. The testator bequeaths legacies to his trustees; and the residue of his real and personal estate he leaves, upon trust, for his wife, the Hon. Mrs. Augusta Latham Curzon, for life, and at her death for all his children.

Earl Beauchamp has again returned 20 per cent in cash on the rent of his agricultural tenants; and the Earl of Devon has signified to his county Limerick tenantry his intention of granting 10 per cent reduction on the half-year's rent.

Captain George Robinson has been awarded the good-service pension of £150 a year, rendered vacant by the promotion of Captain St. G. C. D'Arcy-Irvine to the rank of Rear-Admiral.

Mr. David Brynmor Jones has been appointed County Court Judge of Circuit No. 28 (Mid Wales), in succession to Judge Gwilym Williams, who has been transferred to Circuit No 30 to fill the vacancy caused by the recent resignation of Judge B. T. Williams, Q.C.

The Mayor of Bradford presented publicly on the 12th inst. the honorary testimonial of the Royal Humane Society to James Crunstone, who on April 18 made a gallant attempt to rescue a child from drowning in the canal at Bradford. He is only fourteen, and had previously saved two lives.

An influential meeting was held on the 11th inst. at Prince's Hall, the Lord Mayor presiding, to promote the formation of a Gordon Camp for training poor boys for the Army. Cardinal Manning and the Earl of Shaftesbury were among the supporters of the scheme. The immediate object of the meeting was to strengthen an appeal which is intended to be made for the assistance of the Mansion House Gordon Memorial committee, of which the Prince of Wales is chairman.

At the annual dinner, at Limmers' Hotel on the 13th inst., of the officers of the 1st Battalion Loyal North Lancashire Regiment (old 47th), there sat side by side, in the persons of Lieutenant-General Lowry, C.B., Captain N. G. Phillips, and Major Irby, the Captain, Lieutenant, and Ensign of the same company, who had crossed the Alma with it on Sept. 20, 1854. Captain Phillips was wounded, and Major Irby lost a leg at the battle.

FIRE AT THE INDIAN MUSEUM.

Great alarm and anxiety were caused on Friday last week by a fire breaking out in the Indian section of the South Kensington Museum, adjacent to the International Inventions Exhibition, on the west side of Exhibition-road. The fire was discovered about half-past twelve o'clock, when Mr. Purdon Clarke, the keeper of the Indian Museum, gave the alarm, and hastened, with his assistants, to remove the valuable collection of Indian works of art and antiquities, so that most of the portable articles were saved. The building, which is 330 ft. long and 30 ft. wide, and has only a ground floor, adjoins the "Duval" dining-room of Messrs. Spiers and Pond, connected with the Inventions Exhibition, an apartment which was the "Fish-market" of the Fisheries Exhibition two years ago; it also adjoins the building occupied by the Juries' Department of the Inventions Exhibition, and it abuts on the French annexe. The fire seems to have begun in the roof of the Indian Museum, where a flue runs up from some of the furnaces in the adjacent buildings. The spread of the flames in the interior was promptly checked by the use of hand-grenades, the whole of the fire-extinguishing staff and appliances of the Exhibition being actively employed within five minutes of giving the alarm. Nine private hydrants and one stand-pipe were set at work; and the Metropolitan Fire Brigade, under Captain Shaw, Mr. Simonds, and Superintendent Palmer, speedily brought thirteen steam fire-engines from different stations in London. Their efforts were needful chiefly to quench the fire in the roof; and the firemen, for this purpose, carried the hose to the upper windows of the City and Guilds Technical Institute, and to the roofs of the neighbouring Exhibition Buildings. Among those present, encouraging the work of the firemen and salvors, were the Prince of Wales, the Duke of Cambridge, the Duke of Sutherland, and Sir George Birdwood, of the India Office. Only the roofs of the Indian Museum and of the Jury offices were destroyed, but some damage was done to the interior of those buildings, and a little to the right-hand side of the entrance-hall of the Inventions Exhibition. That entrance was closed to visitors for a short time, but was reopened at four o'clock. We regret to learn that many of the larger pieces of architectural sculpture from the Buddhist shrines of India are much damaged; and that numerous unique specimens of Indian wood-carving, of encaustic tile work, and of other artistic decoration, were entirely destroyed.

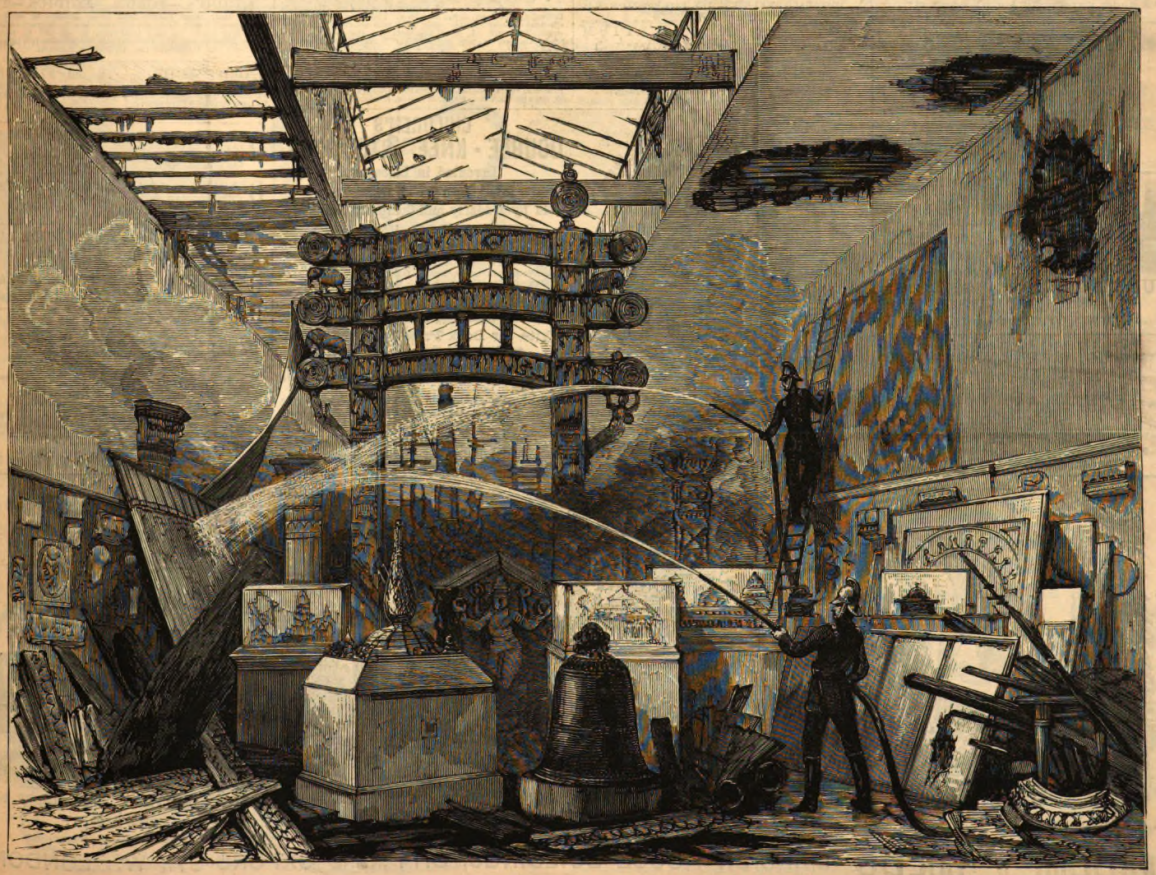
BRET HARTE.

The name of "Bret Harte" is a household word of delightful acceptance in England as well as in America, being associated with the authorship of many popular writings in prose and verse. Our readers will be pleased to know that this clever and successful author has written, for us and for them, the new story of "Maruja," which composes the entire Summer Number of the Illustrated London News of this year, and which is enriched by the valuable illustrations of Mr. R. C. Woodville. Mr. Bret Harte's position as American Consul, man of letters, and man of the world is perhaps unique in this country, where he has made personally as many friends as he has found admirers of his talent and genius. Francis Bret Harte was born at Albany, in New York State, in the year 1839. From his father, a graduate of Union College and Professor of Greek at Albany, he received the classical education and teaching to which he is no doubt indebted for the purity and correctness of his style; from his mother, a descendant of the old Knickerbocker families, he inherited the courtesy and elegance of his manner, which the rough adventurous existence of his youth was unable to obliterate. That existence, with its varied experiences and picturesque hardships, is too well known and has been too accurately reflected in Bret Harte's literary work to require more than a passing mention; nor is it necessary to dwell at any length on those first marvellous tales which revealed to the world at once a new country and a new celebrity.



Bret Harte is known in all civilised countries as the author of the "Heathen Chinee" and "The Luck of Roaring Camp." He has been editor and founder of a successful magazine, and has been Professor of Belles Lettres in the University of California. He has served his country during the civil war, and in time of peace; indeed, he had achieved fame and reputation at an age when the ordinary run of men have not yet tried their power. It may be more interesting to follow him in his later career, in the years which have been almost entirely passed in Europe. In 1878 Bret Harte was appointed American Consul at Crefeld, in Germany, and during a two-years' stay in that city he found time, while faithfully discharging duties new to his life and habits, to write the long poem of "A Legend of Cologne," and the tales of "The Twins of Table Mountain," "An Heiress of Red Dog," "A German Spion," "Peter Schröeder," and "A Gentleman of Laporte." In recognition of his services, he was transferred—much to the regret of the German friends he had made—to the more important Consular post of Glasgow. For a while he seemed to allow his pen to rest; but before the world had had time to mourn over a too protracted silence, he once more brilliantly contributed to contemporary literature in the same vein of rich humour and deep pathos essentially his own, and some of those later stories have been universally acknowledged to be among the best and most powerful he ever wrote. Belgravia, Longmans' Magazine, Macmillan's Illustrated Magazine, have in turns and almost consecutively published "Found at Blazing Star," "Flip," "In the Carquinez Woods," "A Blue Grass Penelope," "Left Out on Lone Star Mountain," "Sarah Walker," "A Ship of '49," "The Mission of San Carmel," and "An Apostle of the Tules." Bret Harte has made himself, in American literature, not the accomplished imitator of European types and styles, but the most original and effective truly American author; he is not the less highly esteemed by readers in this country. The Portrait is from a photograph by Mr. T. Fall, of Baker-street.

MR. FRANCIS BRET HARTE, THE AMERICAN POET AND NOVELIST.
AUTHOR OF "MARUJA," IN THE SUMMER NUMBER OF THE "ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS."

Collections were on Sunday made on behalf of the London Hospitals and Dispensaries in the churches and chapels of the metropolis and its suburbs.

The Class-List in the Cambridge Mathematical Tripos was issued last Saturday morning. The first wrangler is Mr. Arthur Berry, of King's; the second, Mr. Augustus Love, of St. John's; and the third, Mr. Herbert Richmond, of King's. There are two lady wranglers—Miss M. E. Rickett and Miss Blanche Hewett, both of Newnham. Miss O. Dymond, Miss A. Barrington, and Miss B. M. Villy are Senior Optimes; and Miss L. M. E. Barrett, Miss A. B. Murray, Miss L. C. Price, and Miss S. Cunnington are Junior Optimes. The two lady wranglers' names were greatly cheered.

RIDGWAY'S
NEW PATENT
HEDGE, GRASS, & LAWN-EDGE CUTTING MACHINES,

Strongly recommended by the Field, Gardeners' Chronicle, and all the best authorities.

Patronised by Her Majesty's Commissioners of Forests, and have received additional orders from Windsor Great Park every year since their introduction.

HEDGE CUTTERS.
To cut 12 in. 10 0
" 18 in. 12 6

GRASS CUTTERS.
To cut 12 in. 7 6
Best 9 0
" on Wheels, 12 6

The Grass Cutters have recently been much improved. When dull by long use, or cutting through soil, &c., it is quickly and easily sharpened by an ordinary mill-saw file. File for sharpening any of the above machines, 1s. extra.

From General Jones, Thornley, Harrow-on-the-Hill, Oct. 1.—"I have the pleasure to inclose P.O.O. for the amount due. The Hedge Cutter and Grass Cutter are first-rate; the Edge Cutter is equally good.—P.S.—I show them to any of my visitors."

From Thomas Leattie & Co., North of Ireland Seed Warehouse, Belfast, Aug. 2:—"Please send us forward three more Lawn-Edge Clippers by cheapest and quickest route. Your kind and prompt attention will oblige.—P.S.—They are a good thing."

From John Carter, Nurseryman & Seedsman, Keighley, Aug. 4:—"Your 'Lawn-Edger' is the best yet made, and will certainly do its work well."

LAWN-EDGE CLIPPER & TURF TRIMMER.
Price 15s.; 20s., best polished. Warranted very much superior to any other implement for the purpose, as it will cut when moved either backward or forward, thereby making a much cleaner shave.

From Alexander Scott, Sherborne Gardens, Oct. 10:—"After having your Hedge Cutter in use for the last two years, I am now able to give you my opinion of them, and that is I consider them by far the best machines for Hedge Cutting I have ever seen. One man can do more work with them, and with more ease, than two men can do with the shears, and make much better work than is usually done with them."

From C. W. Morriss, Esq., F.R.H.S., King's Lynn, Feb. 23.—"Dear Sir,—Please send me another of the 14 in. polished Grass Cutters. They are invaluable for trimming the grass round specimen shrubs, the corners and banks of sunk tennis lawns, and in numberless other cases where the ordinary mowing machine cannot be employed. I would not be without mine for ten times the cost.—Yours very truly, Chas. W. Morriss.—Mr. A. Ridgway."

May be had direct from the Patentee upon receipt of Post-Office Order.

IS
"The favourite and most fashionable material of the day."

THE WEAR OF EVERY YARD IS GUARANTEED
by the Manufacturer, and every yard of the genuine bears the name
"LOUIS."

Patterns and Prices post-free from nearly all Drapers throughout the kingdom.

The strictest examiner may try every test of touch and sight without discovering that these are other than the Genoa Velvets which they so closely resemble, while the peculiar arrangements resulting in the fast woven pile enable them to stand interminable and rough wear, which would ruin real velvets at four times the price. For Costumes and Trimmings it is unequalled, and, in fact, for all purposes in which Silk Velvet may be used we specially recommend the "LOUIS" VELVETEEN.

VALUABLE DISCOVERY for the HAIR.
If your hair is turning grey or white, or falling off, use THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER; for it will positively restore, in every case, grey or white hair to its original colour, without leaving the disagreeable smell of most "Restorers." It makes the hair charmingly beautiful, as well as promoting the growth of the hair on bald spots, where the glands are not decayed.
This preparation has never been known to fail in restoring the hair to its natural colour and gloss in from eight to twelve days.
It promotes growth, and prevents the hair falling out, eradicating dandruff, and leaving the scalp in a clean, healthy condition.
It imparts peculiar vitality to the roots of the hair, restoring it to its youthful freshness and vigour. Daily applications of this preparation for a week or two will cause it restore faded, grey, or white hair to its natural colour and richness.
It is not a dye, nor does it contain any colouring matter or offensive substance whatever. Hence it does not soil the hands, the scalp, or even white linen, but produces the colour within the substance of the hair.
It may be had of any respectable Chemist, Perfumer, or Dealer in Toilet Articles in the Kingdom, at 3s. 6d. per Bottle. In case the dealer has not "The Mexican Hair Renewer" in stock and will not procure it for you, it will be sent direct by rail, carriage paid, on receipt of 4s. in stamps, to any part of England.

THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.
WHAT BEAUTIFIES THE HAIR?
What gives luxuriance to each tress,
And pleases each one's fancies?
What adds a charm of perfect grace,
And Nature's gift enhances?
What gives a bright and luxurious gloss,
And what says each reviewer?
"That quite successful is the use
Of 'THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER!'"
What gives luxuriance to each tress,
And makes it bright and glowing?
What keeps it free from dandruff, too,
And healthy in its growing?
What does such wonders? Ask the press,
And what says each reviewer?
"That none can equal or approach
'THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER!'"
What gives luxuriance to each tress,
Like some bright halo beaming?
What makes the hair a perfect mass
Of splendid ringlets teeming?
What gives profusion in excess?
Why, what says each reviewer?
"The choicest preparation is
'THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER!'"
What gives luxuriance to each tress,
And makes it so delightful?
Because to speak the honest truth
Is only just and rightful.
What say the people and the press,
And what says each reviewer?
"That most superb for ladies' use
Is 'THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER!'"

THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER has gained for itself the highest reputation, and a decided preference over all other "hair dressings," as evinced from certificates and testimonials from the most respectable sources. Being compounded with the greatest care—combining, as it does, all the most desirable qualities of the best hair preparations of the day, without the objectionable ones—it may be relied on as the very best known to chemistry for restoring the natural colour to the hair, and causing new hair to grow on bald spots, unless the hair glands are decayed; for, if the glands are decayed and gone, no stimulant can restore them; but if, as is often the case, the glands are only torpid, THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER will renew their vitality, and a new growth of hair will follow. Read the following Testimonial:—
Messrs. Wm. Hayes and Co., Chemists, 12, Grafton-street, Dublin, write:—"We are recommending THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER to all our customers as the best of the kind, as we have been told by several of our friends who tried it that it has a wonderful effect in restoring and strengthening their Hair."

THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.
AN IMPORTANT QUESTION FOR LADIES.
Would you have luxuriant hair,
Beautiful, and rich, and rare;
Would you have it soft and bright,
And attractive to the sight?
Then you really can produce
If you put in constant use
THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.
The hair it strengthens and preserves,
And thus a double purpose serves;
It beautifies—improves it, too,
And gives it a most charming hue,
And thus in each essential way,
It public favour gains each day.
THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.
If a single thread of hair
Of a greyish tint is there,
This "Renewer" will restore
All its colour as before,
And thus it is that vast renown
Has daily now its virtues crown—
THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.
No matter whether faded grey,
Or failing like the leaves away,
It will renew the human hair,
And make it like itself appear.
It will revive it, beautify,
And every ardent wish supply—
THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.
The constitution of the person and the condition of the scalp have much to do with the length of time it requires for new hair to grow; also thin or thick hair will depend much upon the vital force remaining in the hair-glands. New hairs are first seen to start around the margin of the bald spots near the permanent hair, and extending onwards until the spots are covered more or less thickly with fine short hair. Excessive brushing should be guarded against as soon as the small hairs make their appearance; but the scalp may be sponged with tepid water to advantage occasionally. The scalp may be pressed and rubbed on the bone by the finger ends, which quickens the circulation and softens the spots which have remained long bald. On applying the hair-dressing it enters the scalp, and in cases where the hair begins to fall a few applications will arrest it, and the new growth presents the assurance and colour of youth. It may be relied on as the best hair-dressing known for restoring grey or faded hair to its original colour without dyeing it, producing the colour within the substance of the hair, imparting a peculiar vitality to the roots, preventing the hair from falling, keeping the head cool, clean, and free from dandruff, causing new hairs to grow, unless the hair-glands are entirely decayed. THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER makes the hair soft, glossy, and luxuriant.

THE WORDS "THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER" are a Trade-Mark; and the public will please see the words are on every case surrounding the Bottle, and the name is blown in the bottle.

RAMBLING SKETCHES.—A KENTISH VILLAGE: OTFORD.

A SUMMER SUMMARY.

I cannot fancy that the Tennysonian idlers who lazed and lounged, with their mild-eyed melancholy, in the languid Lotos-land, where it seemed always afternoon,—I cannot imagine that they could appreciate Summer; appreciate it, that is to say, as it thoroughly deserves to be appreciated. I think that no one could do so who lives in a land where there is perpetual summer; those "lands of lasting summer" of Tennyson's "Boadicea," where there is the "eternal summer" of "Don Juan," with the "eternal sunshine" mentioned in "The Deserted Village." I imagine that, to obtain the fullest and keenest idea of the rare delights of Summer, we must first have passed through those three other seasons of Autumnal decay—fall of the leaf, fogs, and mists—bleak, snow-crowned, hail-driven Winter—and a Spring like to that which we have had in this present year of grace, with its perilous, treacherous weather, its Eastertide east winds, its "ethereal mildness" changed to May's real wildness, and its gentle zephyrs reminding us of Hood's lines concerning the blows of Spring the prize-fighter.

When we have passed through these seasonable and unseasonable changes, then we are in a position really to appreciate the exquisite joys of summer—summer in all its glory—summer in all its heat—and summer in what I may be permitted to call its wealth of verdant greenery. To lounge on the mossy grass, screened from the summer sun, under the fretted arches of the green boughs, and to look out from the dense, cool shade, on the widespread landscape blinking in the heat; while, like the poet Keats, we can listen darkling to the glad nightingale singing "of summer in full-throated ease," we are then in a better condition of mind to appreciate the charms of summer than are those who have had no recent reminiscences of biting spring winds, or of freezing winter gales.

I suppose that when the "child of the sun, refulgent Summer," makes us his annual visit, that we ought to get up at unearthly hours in the morning, and go out to meet him as he comes to us smiling over the eastern hills. I suppose that we ought to make it a conscientious duty, regularly and systematically, to take an early morning walk in summer, when the hedges are garlanded with roses and honeysuckles; and the air is odorous with the scent of clover and bean-blossom; and the buttercups and daisies and wild flowers "do paint the meadows with delight"; and the corn is ripening towards the harvest; and the golden glories of the gorse and broom burnish the green commons, over which the geese are trooping in solemn file; and the ferns and foxgloves are garnishing the banks and woodsides; and the white water-lilies, with their glossy palette-shaped leaves, tremble on the surface of the pool in which the cattle are standing knee-deep. I suppose that we ought to rise early and see these beauties of Nature in their dewy freshness, before the heat of the noonday sun has parched them with its drought.

Perhaps Thomson may have done so, once or twice in his life, to supply himself with poetic material wherewith to point his diatribe against the "falsely luxurious" man who will not spring "from the bed of sloth" to see the sun rise on a summer's morning. Yet those familiar lines were penned by the self-same poet whose indolence was so great that he was seen, in Lord Lyttelton's garden at Hagley, with hands in his pocket, leaning against a wall to eat a peach. But he gave us the best and completest summary of summer that has been written in English blank verse—with the varying events of the summer day—the summer insects—the hay-making and sheep-shearing—the song of the nightingale—summer in the torrid zone—the thunderstorms, meteors, and sundry summer scenes, sports, and occupations. Yes, with his "Castle of Indolence," and "the pleasing land of Drowsy-head," with its day-dreams "for ever flashing round a summer sky," Thomson could appreciate summer; and his poem on that season is the best of the series.

Years after Thomson's "Seasons" had achieved fame, a fellow-workman lent the volume to a working shoemaker in a London garret; and, fired with emulation, Robert Bloomfield, from the personal recollections of a few years in his own life, told, in melodious verse, the true history of a Farmer's Boy during the four seasons of the year. Seated, with six or seven other workmen, in that London garret (14, Bell-alley, Coleman-street), Bloomfield thought out his verses, stored them in his memory, and at night committed them to paper. There could be no greater triumph over circumstances than this. John Clare's exquisite descriptions of rural scenes were written with those scenes before his eyes; but it was from his powers of memory that Bloomfield, in a squalid London garret, surrounded with the prosaic belongings of a working shoemaker, could paint the minutiæ of country life with freshness and fidelity. His "Summer," as in the case of Thomson, is perhaps the best of the four divisions of his work.

Summer comes to us, as usual; but times and manners are altered. Nowadays, the Vicar of Wakefield's daughters do not "go in" for haymaking, but are contented to get such a general idea of the proceedings in their father's glebe as may be witnessed from the tennis-lawn in the Vicarage garden. Nor do the Squire's sons care to exchange the intellectually athletic pastimes of tennis, cricket, and lacrosse, for the dull, mechanical process of turning over swathes of newly-cut grass, with the chance of a passing flirtation with an æsthetic amateur in kid gloves and a sunshade, or a genuine rustic beauty whose hands and "innocent nose" are getting tanned and blistered by many hours' continuous exposure to a broiling sun in the dog-days. Both Thomson and Bloomfield depict such a buxom haymaker: the former, poetically; the latter, more truly and graphically. Such a time of year, and such a period of life, with such an occupation, may be truly termed the Hay-day of existence.

On such a summer's day, as we take a country walk, or ride, or drive, we—we, at least, of the male persuasion—envy the airily-clad rustics in their shirt-sleeves, the costume that Shaw, the valiant Life Guardsman, told the Duke of Wellington he should wish to wear, if he ever had to fight another Battle of Waterloo on a hot June day. As the author of "The Farmer's Boy" says,

> Summer's light garb itself now cumbrous grown,

We envy, too, our faithful companion the dog, who incontinently jumps into the roadside brook or pool, and there refreshes himself with a delicious bath at frequent intervals, and emerges, wet and dripping, to pursue his panting course. We, too, should be glad to avail ourselves of an al fresco bath; but it is one thing to wear a suit from Poole's, and another to be able, with impunity, to wash your only suit in pools as often as they are met with in your summer rambles in the country. We should like to follow our dog's example; but, suitable open-air places for such a purpose are not readily found; and, as we have not made any provision for such an event, we do not care to avail ourselves of a plunge in the tempting purling stream, and to dry ourselves upon its bank, using the sun as a bathing-towel.

Together with the days of chivalry, the poetic days are past and gone, when the young and lovely Musidora could retire to the woodland pool, and there divest herself of the silken stockings with which the poet endowed her, and also of those other "troublesome disguises that we wear"—as said the author of "Paradise Lost"—and, then and there, take her summer bath, and "taste the lucid coolness of the flood," risking the chance of being discovered by any love-stricken Damon. That was a "summer" episode, and a Midsummer-day's dream, that has given at least one famous line to posterity—"So stands the statue that enchants the world." But, nowadays, when bed-room baths are happily in vogue, the modern Musidora is not reduced to such a strait; and she can also visit a fashionable watering-place, where, in the newest thing in bathing costumes, she can step from her machine into the curling waves, and, with "the odour of brine from the ocean," fulfil the poet's description,

> Now beneath the wave
> But ill-concealed, and now with streaming locks
> That half-embrace her in a humid veil,
> Rising again.

Thus, laving herself, we will here "lave her"—as Paddy would say; a cool proceeding on a hot summer's day.

CUTHBERT BEDE.

RAMBLING SKETCHES: OTFORD.

One of the most charming spots within thirty miles of London is Otford, in West Kent, in the valley of the Darent. This district also presents many objects of antiquarian interest. The river, in a course of four miles, passes as many castles; you may see, as you walk up the valley, that of Eynesford, Lullingstone Castle, what little remains of Shoreham Castle, and the Palace of Archbishop Warham, known as Otford Castle. Where this valley opens out into the more extensive one of Holmsdale, is situated the village of Otford, an ancient village, as full of interest to the archæologist as to the artist.

It requires, no doubt, a considerable stretch of imagination for the man whose mind is completely occupied with the things of the present to carry his thoughts back to the year 773; in that year, the Saxon chroniclers say, a great battle was fought here, between Offa, King of Mercia, and the King of Kent. The army of the latter was entirely routed, and the King himself was taken prisoner. Again, in the year 1016, another terrible conflict took place, when Edmund Ironside overtook the Danes at Otford, and with fearful slaughter drove them before him as far as the village of Aylesford.

Many relics of those ancient times have come to light; the ploughshare has unearthed the bones of deceased warriors; and, when a cutting for the South-Eastern Railway was made in this neighbourhood, skeletons were found with weapons of warfare beside them.

Taking a leap forward into the twelfth century, we find Otford the country residence of Thomas à Becket, after his accession to the See of Canterbury. As may be supposed, there are many traditions connecting him with the place. They still point out Becket's Well, the spot where, like Moses of old, the sainted prelate is said to have struck his staff, and behold! a stream of living water gushed forth. We are also told that, on one occasion, the village blacksmith made some default in shoeing the Archbishop's mare, for which he received a saintly malediction; and since that time no smith has flourished in the village. But it seems to us that the son of Vulcan has got his revenge at last; for, on peeping into the Castle tower, our Artist found that the very Archiepiscopal palace itself had been turned into a smithy. Moreover, the present blacksmith is by no means an unsuccessful man; for he has been immortalised by Otto Weber in his picture of "The Casting of the Shoe." The blacksmith, however, has been carried away by the spirit of the times, and has modernised the aspect of his smithy since Weber painted it.

As you stand opposite the smithy, you have a good view of the village, which consists of but one street half a mile in length. Look at those cottages opposite, without a bit of fencing to protect their gardens, the great red roses fairly sprawling over the pathway, and those lying right away back among the hops. What a picture they make, with the tall poplars and the hills beyond! There are few scenes more pleasing than such a village-street as this, with perhaps a waggon crawling along, a labourer in his smock-frock, a group of gossiping women, or mischievous boys, and some bent, grey-headed old father of the village with feeble step tottering out into the sunshine.

As you go down toward the river, you will find several picturesque cottages, and, just by the bridge, a row of old poplars, some of which have fallen; but they are sturdy old fellows, and though laid low, snapped off at the roots, and with trunks decayed, they will not give up life, but sprout out afresh in all directions.

And now turn back up the street to the "Bull Inn." No English village is perfect unless it possess a good old inn, and here is one, truly English. The inside is better than the outside, and there is an intelligent hostess who can tell you many interesting things. Here you will find some Gothic chimneypieces and elaborately carved woodwork, taken from the Castle when it was dismantled.

Having allowed you time for a crust of bread and a glass of ale, we must be off to have a look at the church and castle. The former is a very picturesque object seen from the village green or from any point of view. Its old tower and shingle spire are most characteristic. Here, we are told, in the quiet little churchyard, Herbert Schmalz painted his first exhibited picture, "Sunshine and Shadow."

Passing out of the churchyard by a little gate, you can walk round the Castle and take in its aspect from every point of view. As we observed, the tower is used as a smithy. The rest of the ancient palace has been converted into farm-buildings; and it is curious to note how strangely the old and new are jumbled together: here a tower surmounted by a pigeon-house, and there richly carved walls capped with a roof of thatch.

With one more look at castle and church in the fading light of evening, we turn toward the railway-station, musing on things old and new.

RUSSIAN CENTRAL ASIA.

There is no further excuse for our insular English ignorance, which favours so much bitter prejudice and causeless antipathy, with regard to the Russian Empire in Asia. Ample and precise information has been furnished in the books of recent English travellers, who have tested by their personal observation the truth of authoritative Russian accounts. They have compiled minute statistics upon every subject concerning the vast territories, inhabited by a relatively small population, comprised in the dominion of Alexander III. beyond the Ural. One of the most useful works of this kind was that of an American, Eugene Schuyler, published in 1877. It has been followed by the Rev. Henry Lansdell, D.D., an English clergyman, with two important publications, the first of which appeared in 1882. He has frequently visited different parts of Russia, upon a voluntary errand of religious charity, with the simple purpose of distributing Bibles, New Testaments, and evangelical tracts, in various languages, for the use of inmates of prisons, hospitals, barracks, and similar institutions. It is much to the credit of the Russian Government that Dr. Lansdell has had every facility allowed him for this good work; and his prudence in conducting it, with his discreet and upright behaviour in every respect, preserved him the friendly regard of official persons. In 1879, he went all over the habitable parts of Siberia, West and East, from Tiumen and Tobolsk to Tomsk, Krasnoiarsk, and Barnaul, to Irkutsk, and on to Kiakhta, Chita, and Nikolaefsk on the Sea of Okhotsk. We reviewed his book, "Through Siberia," about two years ago, expressing our confidence in the truth of its statements, particularly with regard to the management of the Russian convict prisons, most of which he had personally inspected. It is our belief that the whole system of penal transportation and servitude in Siberia is now incomparably better than was formerly that maintained by the British Government in New South Wales, Van Diemen's Land, and Norfolk Island. Siberia itself is by no means a land of suffering and despair, but it has, like Canada, a wide temperate zone capable of prosperous colonisation. It is a more ancient possession of Russia than the date of any of the North American British dominions, and is now in the way of being made a valuable part of the civilised world.

In August, 1882, Dr. Lansdell was again at Tiumen, the first important town beyond the Ural boundary of Europe, directly east of Perm, intending to make his way southward into Turkestan or Central Asia. He proceeded to Omsk, on the Irtish, and up that river to Semipalatinsk, where the fresh and original interest of his observations seems to begin. They are presented in two new volumes, entitled "Russian Central Asia," with maps, plenty of engravings, and copious appendices, just published by Messrs. Sampson Low and Co. These contain not only his modest and agreeable personal narrative of long and devious journeys, and descriptions of many places and many races of people, but a great amount of pertinent and accurately studied knowledge, historical, geographical, and statistical, much of it drawn from Russian treatises and special reports, with scientific accounts, revised by eminent authorities, of the botany, zoology, geology, and meteorology of that region.

Dr. Lansdell is not a politician, and is chary of passing judgment on the merits of Russian government; but he seems an independent and impartial observer of facts; and the general impression made by his notices of a great variety of social incidents, and the results of official administration, is decidedly favourable. The superior governing persons, to whom he bore introductions from St. Petersburg, are of high character and ability, who bestow as much care on the improvement of the motley Asiatic populations as is compatible with their military police system; and it cannot be doubted that their rule in Turkestan is a beneficial change from the atrocious barbarism which it has superseded. Amidst the furious outcry that we lately heard against what is called Russian aggression, particularly with regard to Khiva, many English writers and speakers seemed unaware that neither Khiva nor Bokhara has yet been annexed; and the vile condition of those native States, under their despicable Khans, is a significant contrast to the good order and growing prosperity of the provinces incorporated with the Russian Empire. The Khans are merely reduced to political vassalage.

Before, however, reaching the confines of Turkestan, our author had to pass from the north through Semirechensk or Semirechia, east and south-east of the Balkash Lake, skirting the mountain ranges of Chinese Tartary, and he visited Kuldja, on the Ili river, a territory which Russia held for a time only, while the Chinese rule in Kashgar was interrupted by a Mussulman revolution. He has much to tell us of the Kirgheses and the Kalmucks, the nomad pastoral tribes in those parts of Central Asia; but it is when he approaches the Syr Daria (the ancient Jaxartes), and reaches Tashkend, the head-quarters of Russian administration in Turkestan, that we find his remarks assume more political importance. The Syr Daria, with the chain of forts along its banks from the Sea of Aral, was the path by which Russian conquest, not without much provocation, slowly advanced from 1847 until the annexation of the Khanate of Khokand in 1876. This act had been preceded, in 1868, by the capture of Samarcand, taken from the Khan of Bokhara, and of the fertile Zarafshan district, which now form, with the adjacent province called Ferghana, including Khokand, the most thriving portion of Russian Central Asia.

Dr. Lansdell is no apologist for Imperial aggrandisement, and pronounces no opinion respecting the morality of these acts; but they appear to be as much justified as similar measures adopted in India during the past half century, and have manifestly been conducive to civilisation. The Princes of the three Turkish Khanates deserve as little sympathy as any barbarous and debauched tyrants on earth; the capital of each was a den of robbers and a slave-market for the traffic in thousands of kidnapped victims, and they favoured marauding excursions on every side. The populations, of course principally Mussulman, are so mixed of different races, owing to successive wars and conquests and the carrying away of captive multitudes, that the claims of national independence are difficult to be assigned. These reflections are our own, not Dr. Lansdell's; but he found nothing to excite his indignation, as a liberal-minded Englishman, in the substitution of Russian for the Turkish Governments. "After seeing," he says, "Bokhara and Khiva under Asiatic rulers, and Tashkend and Samarcand under Europeans, I should be false to my convictions if I withheld my opinion that the natives have been gainers by Russian conquest." He gives us a chapter on the Turkoman oases and Merv, though he was not able to reach that place from the Oxus; and, while suspending or reserving his judgment upon certain political questions, is content to remark, "Now that Merv is annexed, if there are any who would rather see it revert to its old condition of lawlessness, slavery, and blood, I confess I am not of the number." From Khiva, in the month of November, crossing the Desert westward to the Caspian, and embarking at Krasnovodsk for Batoum, he came home by Tiflis and Odessa. We are indebted to him, this second time, for an interesting, trustworthy, and instructive book, upon a topic of which it is desirable that the truth should be known.

NEW BOOKS.

It was Macaulay who called "Don Quixote" "the best novel in the world beyond all comparison"; it is also the most popular novel, and, with the exception of the Bible, the book that has had the widest circulation. The charm of this masterpiece of fiction is to be found in its humour and in the wisdom that is akin to humour. It is at once the most national of romances, and the most universal; and it does not surprise us that in these days of active literary labour, new translations of the work should appear in English. In spite of what has been done hitherto, there is ample room for a version that shall be at once accurate and idiomatic. The latest adventurer in this field is Mr. John Ormsby, and the first volume of a new translation, in four volumes, of Don Quixote, by Miguel De Cervantes Saavedra (Smith, Elder), is now before us. Mr. Ormsby is known as a translator of "The Poem of the Cid"; and, in a highly attractive introduction, he shows by no faint indications that he has mastered the literature of his subject, and understands how the work of a consummate humourist like Cervantes should be "turned" in a foreign tongue. He states frankly that there can be no thoroughly satisfactory translation of "Don Quixote" into English or any other language. "It is not that the Spanish idioms are so utterly unmanageable, or that the untranslatable words—numerous enough, no doubt—are so superabundant, but rather that the sententious terseness to which the humour of the book owes its flavour is peculiar to Spanish, and can at best be only distantly imitated in any other tongue." That Mr. Ormsby will succeed in producing a Don Quixote worthy of the subject must be the wish as well as the belief of every reader of the elaborate and masterly essay prefixed to the translation. No doubt the racy flavour of Elizabethan English, which makes Shelton's inaccurate version so attractive, suits the history of the knight errant better than the English of our day. The romance carries us into an old world, and is all the better for an antique dress. It would be affectation, however, in a translator to adopt an artificial style. Mr. Ormsby must write like his contemporaries, and it is enough that the language he employs is manly and unaffected. We may add that the form in which the edition is produced makes it worthy of a place in every library.

It is an obvious remark that married people play "very different parts on the stage of their mundane existence" from people who live and die in single blessedness, but this rather commonplace observation supplies the Rev. James Copner with an excuse for publishing a book, entitled Sketches of Celibate Worthies (London Literary Society). It is a most unobjectionable volume. If the writer have nothing new to say of Queen Elizabeth, Horace, Erasmus, Virgil, Sir Isaac Newton, Kant, Bishop Butler, Cowper, Father Mathew, Dr. Thomas Brown, Robert Dick, and Hannah More, all he does say is expressed in a liberal and kindly spirit. The medley of names is curious, and there is evidently no object in linking them together beyond the fact that they are the names of bachelors and spinsters. Two or three of the papers appear to have been originally written for lectures, and as lectures they may have proved attractive, but in none of them is there that weight of matter or charm of style which can justify publication in a volume. Nothing could well be feebler and thinner than the essay upon Cowper; Emanuel Kant is treated as superficially; and the account of Bishop Butler is inadequate. As a volume for light reading, however, the "Sketches" will yield some amusement and instruction.

We are promised before long a Dictionary of Hymnology. Meanwhile the Rev. James King has published a remarkable volume, entitled Anglican Hymnology, being an account of the 325 standard hymns of the highest merit according to the verdict of the whole Anglican Church (Hatchards). Mr. King tells us in his introduction how he has worked out this result. In the English language there are about 20,000 hymns and versions of the Psalms, composed by 1500 authors. Many of these are, of course, very poor; many, perhaps, wholly worthless. Mr. King wanted a test of excellence, and undertook the labour of collating fifty-two representative hymnals used in the Church of England at home and abroad. "The fifty-two were regarded as a committee, each member of which could, as it were, give one vote for each approved hymn. Thus, if a hymn was found in fifteen hymnals, then it was credited with fifteen votes or marks of approval; if found in twenty hymnals, twenty marks; if in thirty hymnals, thirty marks; if in fifty hymnals, fifty marks, and so on." In this curious exploration Mr. King discovered that not a single hymn is to be found in all the fifty-two hymnals, and that of the twenty thousand hymns from which selection can be made, only 325 are found in fifteen hymnals and upwards. Pursuing his plan, the writer ranks all hymns found in thirty selections and upwards in the first rank, all hymns found in twenty hymnals but in less than thirty in the second rank, and all hymns found in fifteen hymnals and upwards, and in fewer than twenty, in the third rank. Mr. King's account of the 325 hymns drawn out from the mass by this ingenious method is full of interest, and the amount of carefully collected information stored up in his volume will be appreciated by every reader who finds the subject attractive. We cannot, however, agree altogether with the assertion that "the verdict of fifty-two hymnals towers high above individual opinion, inasmuch as they represent the voice of the whole Anglican Church." The Church, it may be granted, has accepted certain hymnals which contain certain hymns; but it has accepted these selections as a whole, and not because they contain particular hymns—the choice in a large number of instances of individual editors. Moreover, the presence of what may be called popular hymns in the larger number of hymnals is a proof of public favour rather than of quality, and does not necessarily entitle them to be placed in the first rank. Indeed, it can scarcely be doubted that of the 110 hymns placed in accordance with Mr. King's arrangement in the second rank, several, if intrinsic merit be the test, deserve a place in the first.

Professor Henry Morley deserves the thanks of all readers for printing in his "Universal Library" The Life of Cardinal Wolsey, by George Cavendish, His Gentleman Usher (Routledge and Sons). Not only is the little volume of interest from its association with Shakspeare, who, there can be no doubt, made use of it when writing his "Henry VIII."; but its intrinsic value is also very great. A vivid picture of the famous Cardinal, and also of the age, is presented in these pages. And it is a picture as strange as it is vivid. We see the ambitious churchman "in his time of authority and glory, when he had more respect to the worldly honour of his person than he had to his spiritual profession," and we see him in his fall, lamenting that he had not served God as diligently as he had done the King. How thoroughly he understood the character of the master towards whom he exhibited to the last a loyalty that in our days seems servile, may be seen in the following estimate given by the Cardinal on his death-bed. "He is sure a Prince of a Royal courage, and hath a Princely heart; and rather than he will either miss or want any part of his will or appetite he will put the loss of one half of his realm in danger. For I assure you I have often kneeled before him in his privy chamber on my knees the space of an hour or two to persuade him from his will and appetite, but I could never bring to pass to dissuade him therefrom!" Almost every page of the narrative shows the difference between that age and ours. The Cardinal delighted in outward splendour. In travelling from place to place a great number of gentlemen in black velvet livery coats, and "with great chains of gold about their necks," followed in his train. His sumpter mules and carriages were guarded by bowmen. "He rode like a Cardinal, very sumptuously on a mule trapped with crimson velvet upon velvet. And before him he had his two great cryosses of silver, two great pillars of silver, the great seal of England, his Cardinal's hat, and a gentleman that carried his valaunce, otherwise called a cloak-bag, which was made altogether of fine scarlet cloth, embroidered over and over with cloth of gold very richly." Sometimes a canopy was borne over him, and his gentlemen ushers cried, "On, my lords and masters, on before; make way for my Lord's Grace." If Wolsey travelled ostentatiously, so also did he love splendour in feasting his friends. Indeed, when in France, his hospitality was so great that we are told "many of the Frenchmen were fain to be led to their beds." Cooks in the present day are often paid better than gentlemen; but the Cardinal had a master cook who went daily in damask satin or velvet, with a chain of gold about his neck. In old days, it will be remembered, our physicians carried a cane with a gold box at the head of it, containing some antidote against infection; the Cardinal carried "a very fair orange whereof the meat or substance within was taken out, and filled up again with the part of a sponge, wherein was vinegar and other confections against the pestilent airs." Another characteristic of the man and of the age is the ready way in which tears are shed in public without that sense of shame that would be felt nowadays; but, indeed, the whole story of the ambitious Cardinal presents a state of society utterly unlike our own. A poem by Thomas Churchyard, called "The Tragedy of Cardinal Wolsey," follows the biography of Cavendish. It cannot be said to add to the value of the book.

It is scarcely a paradox to say that London is of all cities that of which Londoners know the least. Its inhabitants are amongst the diligent of the world in exploring foreign towns and countries, and to aid them have at their command some of the best guide-books published; but should a Londoner desire to learn something outside the circle of his own daily life about the city in which he spends the greater part of the year he must have recourse to Baedeker, or some other equally intelligent foreigner. The country visitor to London is even in a worse plight, for unless he relies wholly upon the advertisements in the daily papers, and limits his experiences to the attractions of the moment, he can learn little of the capital and its ways of living. A little volume just published, London of To-day, by Mr. C. Eyre Pascoe (Sampson Low and Marston), proposes to serve as "a guide, philosopher, and friend" to dwellers in and visitors to London with a fulness of information hitherto unattempted. It would be impossible to give in a brief notice even an epitome of the contents of this exceedingly useful volume, which not only sketches the principal changes which have taken place in London during the present century, but, as occasion requires, traces back the origin of existing institutions and buildings to much remoter periods. To the visitor who comes to see the sights, Mr. Pascoe tells him where to find them, how to enjoy them, and at what cost he can see them. He describes the "events of the season," the resources of the suburbs, and has plenty of gossip about the streets, the public places, and the people who frequent them, and the names of those with whom they were in times past associated. The book is fully illustrated, is written in a chatty tone, and will be cordially welcomed, not only by our "country cousins," but by their London hosts, who not unfrequently are very much puzzled how to do the honours of the "sights of London."

Under the title of Holy Living, a Year-Book of Thoughts has been compiled from the works of Jeremy Taylor, with an introduction by Archdeacon Farrar (Marcus Ward and Co.). This, it will be remembered, is the name given by the Bishop to one of his most popular and valuable works, and it seems therefore a pity that it should be appropriated to a selection taken from his writings generally. It is well, however, when, as in the present case, the fault-finding of a reviewer ends with the title of his book. In the quality of the contents, as well as in the form of publication, this beautiful volume ought to satisfy the most exacting critic. Taylor ranks with the greatest of our prose writers; with the wealthiest in fancy and the weightiest in thought. His ample rhetoric would overpower him, and the reader might be tempted to exclaim with Hamlet, "Words, words!" were it not that his intellect is as profound as it is discursive, and that his great learning and mastery of language are turned to practical account. Sound good sense is, indeed, as much one of Taylor's characteristics, as versatility of fancy, and this may be seen in the most devotional of his writings. Another characteristic is his love of Nature, and the art with which he draws illustrations from the natural objects around him. He writes on the most serious of topics—but to be with Taylor is to be always in cheerful company. The greatest of his contemporaries was John Milton. They were alike in their love of learning, in their appreciation of literature, and in their love of freedom. Taylor may have read the "Areopagitica" with delight, and Milton, though probably with less pleasure, "The Liberty of Prophesying," which appeared three years later; but political and ecclesiastical differences made an impassable gulf between these men, and neither of them in his copious writings mentions the name of the other. It is interesting, however, to remember that there was one link between the Puritan poet and the chaplain of Charles I. Lady Alice Egerton, a beautiful girl of fifteen, acted the part of the lady in "Comus," at Ludlow Castle, in 1634. She married Jeremy Taylor's friend the Earl of Carberry, and it was her death that led Taylor to dedicate his "Holy Dying" to her husband. The "Holy Living" and the "Holy Dying" are Taylor's popular masterpieces; but, though less read, "The Liberty of Prophesying" is equally memorable; and, indeed, there is nothing in the fifteen volumes of his works that will not reward the thoughtful reader.

Comparative archæology follows, as a natural course, the road which has been opened up by the study of philology and mythology. If archæology is to assert its position as a science instead of remaining the pleasant hunting-ground of the dilettanti, the Traité d'Archéologie comparée, par M. Adrien Wagnon (Paris: Rothschild, 1885), worthily inaugurates this new departure, and is fittingly dedicated to M. Perrot. There is, in fact, scarcely a thought expressed by M. Wagnon, of which the germ cannot be traced in one or other of M. Perrot's three works. We do not for a moment charge M. Wagnon with plagiarism, of which his frank admission of his indebtedness wholly exonerates him; but we mean that his mind is one rather fertile than inventive. The aim of both writers is to prove that comparative archæology finally disposes of the once-boasted claim of Greek art to be original. Delicate in idea, complete in execution, it was; but wholly autochthonic, born Athene-like, full-grown, it was not; and of late years, from the eagerness with which this later school of criticism has pressed its conclusions and deductions, in the desire to give full weight to the predecessors of Greece—Egypt, Phœnicia, and Assyria—the fashion has grown to represent the Greek artist as a mere skilful borrower and adapter of time-worn ideas. It is to check this unreasonable generalisation that comparative archæology steps in; and it is here, also, that M. Wagnon's work is so valuable—especially in all that relates to the influence of Egypt. By the skilful juxtaposition of superficial similarities he brings out essential differences, and by carefully collating what is analogous he makes clear the inherent disparity which at first sight escaped and subsequently startled the student. Within the limits of our space, we cannot follow M. Wagnon in detail, as he carefully analyses and compares such works of art as the Apollo of Tenea, the Scribe of the Louvre, the Selinus Metopes, the Assos relief; always arriving at the same result—the recognition of divergent aims; in the Egyptian, that of photographic reality; in the Greek, that of truthful ideality. The Egyptian is content to indicate by symbols what the Greek will only express by actuality: the former is satisfied with the surface, and contemplates placidly the outside show; the latter must get behind and within, must see the cause and express its connection with the aim in view. The two nations stand apart—the watchword of the one was repose and death, of the other activity and life; but without the example of Egyptian patience, it is possible that the eager Greeks may have lost heart in attempting to cope with the difficulties of early technique.

There is no doubt that in many lives there are periods which are so monotonous and devoid of interest that the dismissal of a portion of time with no record is desirable; and the dividing a story into parts relieves the author of the necessity of chronicling that which could interest no one. Anthony Fairfax: A Novel in three parts (Bentley), possesses as hero a man with such a life as would be pronounced at once monotonous throughout, and unadvisable for selection as a hero's; but treated by the author with ability, the delineation of Anthony Fairfax's character may be accurately described as a finished study in grey. This study is harmonious in design and in detail—everything blends with the life of the man paralysed so mischievously by the action and falsehood of another—that other, however, only a far-away vision in the story. Anthony Fairfax, although not possessing a fine or an ideal character, has some redeeming qualities; but he is morbid, and, had the opportune relative (who is usually so singularly absent in real life) not left him with means and property, he would in all probability have vegetated for a very brief period indeed and—died. Battling against the stream would have been an impossibility with him. Some readers will no doubt think that, with the disposition Helen possessed, the perilous position of her fiancé would have roused her imagination, and that the romance of upholding the character of the maligned man, and siding with him against the gossip of the petty neighbourhood, would have effectually enlisted her sympathy; and her defection is decidedly a disappointment. On the other hand, it has to be taken into consideration that she was hardly in love, and the discovery of the deception, or rather the want of confidence, on Anthony's part, tried her cruelly. Bee's fine character is well and happily conceived, and the author works up to the full development of it with success. Bob, Joe, and Lizzie are necessary nonentities, and the other dramatis personæ are not of much account. To give the crisis and end of the novel would be to deprive the reader of some pleasurable excitement; suffice it, therefore, to say that there is a sound of wedding bells in the final chapter.

It is scarcely too much to say that no more charming volume has appeared in the "Golden Treasury Series" than Lyrical Poems by Alfred Lord Tennyson, selected and annotated by Francis T. Palgrave (Macmillan and Co.). The most musical poet of our day is also the wealthiest in poetic thought. He is emphatically a singer, and his lyrical notes are among the sweetest this century has produced. Happily, for the most part, his voice is as clear as it is sweet. Tennyson can be profound, but he is rarely obscure. At the same time, while dear to the general reader, he is doubly dear to the poetical student, not only for what Mr. Matthew Arnold would call his "criticism of life," but for his profound mastery of metre and subtle use of language. It is sometimes asked, rather foolishly perhaps, Whether Lord Tennyson is a great poet? If poetical greatness consists solely in producing a noble tragedy like "Macbeth," or a majestic epic like "Paradise Lost," then our Laureate has no claim to the title; but the temple of poetic fame is reached by many roads; and the man who has written lyrics that already live in thousands of hearts, and promise to retain a lasting place in literature, must be, in the best sense of the term, a great poet. Of all modern singers, with the exception perhaps of Coleridge, Lord Tennyson is the most genuinely poetical. There is no prosaic element in his work; there are none of those barren wastes across which, at times, Wordsworth perversely makes his readers travel. This little volume, edited with great judgment by Mr. Palgrave, contains, no doubt, some of Lord Tennyson's rarest work. Every page is "worthy the reading"; and familiar though the poems may be, they are none the less acceptable in this choice and portable form. That we should miss some favourite pieces in a selection like this is inevitable, but it is assuredly as satisfactory as a selection can be; and we doubt not, to quote the editor's words, that it will "amply and delightfully fulfil its proper function."

Quality and not quantity is what we ask for from the poet, and some of the loveliest poems in the language are also among the briefest. Here are two tiny volumes that deserve a word of praise from the critic and recognition by the public; An Irish Garland, by Mrs. Piatt, and The Children Out of Doors, a book of verses, by Two in One House (Douglas). The first book, as the title implies, is the work of one writer; in the second Mr. Piatt joins his voice of song to that of his wife. The little poems, for they are all short, are for the most part suggested by sympathy with the poor; but the subject is daintily handled, and there is in some of the lyrics a freshness and sweetness that will win the reader's heart. Mrs. Piatt has been so unfortunate as to receive exaggerated praise from the American press, but that she has cultivated her small plot of verse-land with success may be readily admitted. Tenderness and pathos are evident throughout, and in the dealing with child-life there is alike simplicity and quaint humour. "A Child's Conclusion" might have been written by Mr. George Macdonald. We may add that the "Children Out of Doors," the most thoughtful and significant poem, perhaps, in the volume with that title, is apparently the work of Mr. Piatt. A lyric called "Ruth (for a picture)" is very charming and would be more so perhaps if the subject did not recall the lovelier stanzas written by Thomas Hood.

"Manon," the words by MM. Meilhac and Gille, the music composed by J. Massenet (Novello, Ewer, and Co.), is a handy and inexpensive edition of the English version of the opera produced by the Carl Rosa Company at Liverpool last January, and again at Drury-Lane Theatre on May 9, as noticed by us. The English text has been adapted by Mr. Joseph Bennett.

SKETCHES AT THE BEN NEVIS OBSERVATORY.

PRIVATE AND CONFIDENTIAL.

THE CONGO FREE STATE.

A man who has done a great thing, if he has done it himself, may some day be called a great man. The American newspaper traveller and special correspondent, who came to London in 1874 from the shores of Lake Tanganyika, where he had found the lost hero of African exploration, Dr. Livingstone, has achieved something great since then. In 1876 he went out as chief of the expedition provided jointly by the New York Herald and the Daily Telegraph, and crossed the unknown interior from east to west. Passing round the Lakes, he followed the Lualaba, a river discovered by Livingstone, till he found it to be the Congo, when he descended that river sixteen hundred miles, and reached the Atlantic coast. He returned to Europe in January, 1878, and published his discoveries, which incited a number of influential persons, under the presidency of King Leopold II. of Belgium, to form an association for opening the Congo to civilisation. Mr. Stanley went out again, in 1879, as manager of this undertaking, and returned last Midsummer, having in five years performed a vast amount of real administrative work. He had been employed in founding a commercial colony, with stations at the most important points, far up the great river, and in negotiating successfully with the various native tribes. The solidity of the results he has obtained, and the value of the prospects he has opened to European enterprise, are now attested by the deliberations of the International Conference held at Berlin, under Prince Bismarck's presidency, from November to February last. They are confirmed by the Treaty for regulating the freedom of trade, the rules of navigation, the prohibition of the slave trade, and the political neutrality of the basin of the Congo; while a newly-created Free State, with precisely defined frontiers, under the flag of the International Association of the Congo, is recognised by European diplomacy. This is as much the creation of Mr. Stanley's individual genius and energy as that of the Spanish West Indies was the work, individually, of Christopher Columbus, apart from the unique character of the maritime discovery of America with regard to the ancient position of geographical science.

Mr. Stanley's experiences and performances since 1879 are related in his new book, "The Congo, and the Founding of its Free State," two volumes published by Messrs. Sampson Low and Co., which are of extraordinary interest as "A Story of Work and Exploration." It is not at all a bragging narrative; and he passes over, with a very slight allusion, the course of his earlier travels and adventures, his search for Livingstone, and his journey from the Lake Region of East Africa to the west coast, with the surprising additions that it made to our geographical knowledge. Mr. Stanley's mind during the past five or six years, seems to have been turned wholly towards the practical realisation of his noble design for the benefit of mankind, by forming peaceful settlements of trade and cultivation in the vast region of the Congo and its tributaries. He is no longer young, and he is devoting, probably, the remainder of his active life and strength to this great and good work.

The narrative and descriptive portions of this book are even more interesting than those which the author had previously given us; because our sympathies are engaged by the efforts he makes to gain, in a fair and peaceable manner, convenient sites for his stations, and to construct proper buildings, to collect stores, and to make roads of communication, instead of merely travelling and exploring. The first station, at Vivi, about a hundred and ten miles from Banana Point at the mouth of the Congo, and some thirty or forty miles above Boma, the head of ordinary commercial navigation, was founded towards the close of the year 1879. Isangila, the next station, at the foot of the lower rapids, is fifty-two miles higher up. The navigation of the river above Isangila for eighty-eight miles, to Manyanga, was found practicable when Mr. Stanley had carried his steel steam-boats overland past the lower falls. It is again interrupted, between Manyanga and Leopoldville, by the upper falls or rapids. Leopoldville, the capital of the new Congo Free State, is just below Stanley Pool, a lake which may be considered to mark the division of the Upper and Lower Congo. The opposite shore of the lake and right bank of the river at Manyanga, and for several hundred miles above this point, belong to the French territory which was occupied by M. De Brazza, and which has been formally recognised as under the dominion of France. The left bank of the Congo, which is the south bank in its lower course and the west bank higher up, according to the great middle bend of the river northward, is assigned to the Free State, with a vast extent of the interior of Central Africa, reaching eastward to Lake Tanganyika, and to eight degrees north of the Equator. The river is navigable for a thousand miles above Leopoldville, as far as Stanley Falls, where the expedition arrived in November, 1883, and formed the remotest station yet created. This was left, at Mr. Stanley's return, in charge of a most worthy Scotchman, Mr. Binnie, whose death we regret to see mentioned in the latest news from Africa. Between Leopoldville and Stanley Falls, of course, there are several important stations; one of these is Bolobo, which was visited by Mr. H. H. Johnston in March, 1883, and is described in his book, "The River Congo," published last year. So far up the mighty river, we have now a tolerably complete and accurate knowledge of the localities and of the various native tribes, of the scenery, the climate, the natural history, botany, and zoology, and of the facilities for trade and for missionary efforts. Above Stanley Falls, it traverses a very different region, which appertains rather to East Central Africa; and Nyangwe, a notable resort of Arab slave-traders from the eastern coast, Lake Moeru and Lake Bangweolo, and the Lualaba, Luapula, and Chamberi, names of the great stream in its upper parts, are familiar to the student of Livingstone's and Cameron's explorations. For the present, however, Mr. Stanley's colonising labours are limited to a reach of about fifteen hundred miles, ascending the river from the west or Atlantic seacoast, the entire length of the river being three thousand miles. He has established a thriving station at the Equator, 412 miles above Leopoldville and 757 miles from the sea. The reader of these volumes will learn how the work was done, and cannot fail to admire Mr. Stanley's courage, address, perseverance, and skilful management, and cordially to approve of his wise, fair, and friendly dealings with the natives. General Gordon himself, if he had been spared to take up this mission, could scarcely have done better; and Mr. Stanley was as much at home on the Congo as ever General Gordon was on the Nile.

We feel no doubt that English trade will benefit largely by the opening of the Congo, but we are particularly anxious that the Congo Free State, and the International Association, should obtain ample financial prosperity. For in the event of its ever being compelled, by pecuniary difficulties, to part with its territory, the French Government would have a right of pre-emption; and that the Congo, with the whole interior of Central Africa, should fall under French sovereignty would be a great political misfortune to Great Britain. The best way to prevent that is by English capitalists subscribing liberally to assist the Free State in constructing about one hundred and fifty miles of railway, to get past the Lower Falls or Rapids, between Isangila and Stanley Pool. We believe that this work can easily be done, at a moderate cost, and that it will be a very paying concern. "They will obtain," says Mr. Stanley, "as much produce as such a railway can convey, from their trading agents on the Upper Congo, who will collect it from over a million native Africans, who are waiting to be told what further produce is needed beyond ivory, palm oil, palm kernels, ground nuts, gum copal, orchilla weed, camwood, cola nuts, gum tragacanth, myrrh, frankincense, furs, skins, hides, feathers, copper, indiarubber, fibre of grasses, beeswax, bark cloth, nutmeg, ginger, castor oil, nuts, &c." If Englishmen do not see that it is worth while to contribute to open up this trade of the Congo, with a free entrance and free market for all our manufactures, England deserves to be left behind in the world's race for commercial advantage.

PRIVATE AND CONFIDENTIAL.

The bond of intimate friendship between two young ladies is never completed without an innocent secret, which may not always, though it often may, relate to some person of the other sex. It is different with men, whose most affectionate and frank regard for each other does not usually prompt them, except for the sake of special counsel and help, to desire any particular communication of merely personal affairs, unless the circumstances be such as to involve a serious obligation and responsibility for action. A brother would scarcely feel himself slighted by discovering, for instance, that his brother intends to marry, the convenient time having arrived, somebody to whom he may have been privately engaged for years past, but whom the family have not known; he never saw her, perhaps never heard of her, but his brother did not want his advice, and why should he have spoken of his attachment to her? Sisters, however, and girls who choose to regard one another in a sisterly way, expect these delicate revelations as an indispensable proof of trustful tenderness; and, so long as they are truly preserved and cherished with considerate sympathy, they may afford mutual support in the changing moods of daily life. We hope that it will be so with the gentle pair whom our Artist has drawn sitting together in the garden, and perusing what seems to be a love-letter, the writer of which, whoever he may be, has also sent his photograph, which one of the ladies holds in her hand. From their different complexions, they do not appear to be sisters; but they may possibly be cousins, like Rosalind and Celia; and one of them may have said to the other, a thousand times already, "O coz, coz, my pretty little coz, that thou didst know how many fathom deep I am in love!"

"A Patriotic Hymn," for chorus and orchestra, by Antonin Dvorák (Novello, Ewer, and Co.). This work has just been published, in a cheap and handy form, with the English text adapted by the Rev. Dr. Troutbeck, and an arrangement of the orchestral accompaniments for the pianofore by Heinrich Von Kaan. Of the merits of the composition we have spoken in our notice of its first performance at St. James's Hall.

A memorial brass, by Mr. James Forsyth, has been placed in Prestwich church, containing the following inscription: "In loving memory of Henry Mildred Birch, B.D., formerly Fellow of King's College, Cambridge, and Assistant Master of Eton College. For thirty-two years Rector of this parish, Canon Residentiary of Ripon Cathedral, Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen, Chaplain and some time Tutor to his Royal Highness Albert Edward, Prince of Wales. Born Jan. 12, 1830; died June 29, 1884."

THE BEN NEVIS OBSERVATORY.

Nearly two years ago, on July 14, 1883, we gave some Illustrations of the Meteorological Observatory established on the summit of Ben Nevis, 4406 ft. above the sea-level, by Mr. Clement Wragge, acting for the Scottish Meteorological Society, of which the Duke of Richmond and Gordon is president. Mr. Wragge's perseverance and fortitude are greatly to be admired; during three years, through the summer and autumn, regularly four times a week, and on many days in the winter, he went up to the top of the mountain, the highest in the British Isles, to make a valuable series of atmospheric observations, which were combined with those made simultaneously at Fort William and at intermediate stations. He could ride up about halfway, as far as the Loch or Tarn, the elevation of which is 1840 ft., and sometimes to Brown's Well, which lies at the height of 2000 ft. The remaining part of the ascent, being extremely steep and encumbered with loose stones, is very toilsome at all seasons; and in winter and spring, till the month of May, it is covered with frozen snow, which often lies 5 ft. deep, and 30 ft. deep in the hollows. On many days of the year, cold biting winds, drenching or drizzling rains, or thick cloud-fogs, annoy the hardy adventurer who mounts to these exposed altitudes, where the air, when not frosty, was often saturated with a chilly moisture, so that it was difficult to keep the instruments in a fit condition, and even to write legible records. In spite of these unfavourable circumstances, Mr. Wragge and Mr. William Whyte, who took charge of the Observatory for some time, aided by competent assistants, obtained correct daily readings of the thermometer, barometers, clockwork hygrometer, dry bulb thermometer, and radiation thermometer, as well as the rain-guages, the ozone tests, the apparatus for testing the actinism of solar light, and for the direction and force of the winds, and for the state of the clouds. The spectroscopic observations of the rain-band were also taken and noted. A hut, rudely built of piled stones, with a tarpaulin roof and wooden door, was erected for the keeping of these instruments, and to shelter the men in the intervals of outdoor work. The daily course of observations, most of which were repeated five times at intervals of half an hour, used to occupy more than two hours, besides writing and putting the instruments in order. Since we published our former Illustrations, funds were subscribed for building and furnishing a more convenient Observatory, which was completed in time for last year's work; there is now tolerable accommodation for the director and his staff, by whom hourly observations have been taken day and night. Detailed reports of all these observations are regularly made up, and a condensed account of the day's work is telegraphed every evening to the Press Association.

During last summer considerable additions were made to the Observatory buildings. A new sitting-room has been built, also two new bed-rooms, a tourists' shelter, and a tower 30 ft. high, which serves the double purpose of carrying anemometers and preventing the observers from being snowed up, as they were in the winter before last. The tourists' shelter will add materially to the comfort of the staff; who, with every desire to show courtesy and hospitality to strangers, must have their patience a little taxed by the great number of tourists who ascend Ben Nevis in summer weather.

One of the Illustrations we now present is a View of the Observatory in its present condition, with the outdoor instruments in the foreground. The interior of the building is shown in another Illustration, and there is one of the telegraph, with the dispatch of the daily report at 9.15 p.m. Two of the other Sketches need no explanation—namely, a visitor writing his name in the visitors' book, and a snug "dinner party in high life," enjoying the social amenities of that meal in a position far more exalted than that of any fashionable and aristocratic dinner-table in London.

The top of Ben Nevis is haunted, like the Brocken in the Hartz mountain region of Germany, by two inoffensive ghosts, who are affectionately known as "Penny Plain" and "Twopence Coloured." The latter is a distinguished ghost, one of the "spectre" order; indeed, he is a brother of the famous Brocken Spectre. He only appears on rare occasions. On a sunshiny day, when the mountain-top is clear, and there is a bank of fog lying under the great northern precipice, a spectator standing on the edge of the precipice can see his own shadow, enormously magnified, on the fog, with a rainbow-coloured "glory" round his head. "Penny Plain" is a more unpretending ghost; he may be "raised" any night with the aid of a bull's-eye lantern, but his head is surrounded by a white "glory." These apparitions, which are diverting to the novice, are shown in two of our Artist's Sketches.

The Council of the Society of Arts have, with the approval of the President, the Prince of Wales, awarded the Albert Medal to Henry Doulton, "in recognition of the impulse given by him to artistic pottery in this country."

A Bluebook, containing a summary of accidents and casualties which have been reported to the Board of Trade as having occurred upon railways in the United Kingdom during the three months ending March 31, 1885, has been issued, from which it appears that the accidents to trains, rolling stock, permanent way, &c., caused the death—of nine persons, and injury to 106.

OUR NOTE-BOOK

The Queen makes one proviso respecting Princess Beatrice's trousseau dresses, and that is that they should be simple. In this as in so many other respects she is a model to her subjects; and if Englishwomen wear "loud" and extravagant toilettes, it is in defiance of their Sovereign's example.

There are people who find fault with the Princess of Wales for dressing her daughters in dark serges on these chilly, rainy June days, and call in question the cut of their garments. Such critics ought to be ashamed of themselves, for all good mothers vary their children's clothes according to the weather. It should not be forgotten that the instincts of our future Queen are those of a quiet, refined gentlewoman, rather than those of one who wishes to set the fashion.

Last week Royal Ascot, that is, the horse-racing on the heath, came to an end; and, to make a cheerful remark appropriate to the occasion, some of us may not live to see another anniversary. Still, it is generally agreed that, what with the weather (bar the last day), what with the millinery, and what with the four-in-hands, to have seen the sight was quite equal to having seen the Bay of Naples, and for whosoever has seen the Bay of Naples there is but one thing, as we all know, left to do. The racing this year was not so satisfactory as usual, as regards the quality of the horses. The Gold Cup on Thursday, when there was no "procession," out of respect for the funeral of the late "Red Prince," was a very poor affair; there were but four runners and the best of them was only a half-winner of the Derby, though he was certainly a "saint" and unbeaten withal, as he still remains; and the race was run before luncheon (contrary to precedent), as if the idea were to get it over and have done with it. Still there were some interesting exhibitions and some strange surprises. Althorp, the despised, came out in the character of a great "stayer"; Royal Fern recovered a portion of his once considerable reputation; Pepper and Salt and Dandie Dinmont showed how small were Royal Hampton's pretensions for the Derby; The Child of the Mist did honour to the sireship of the now almost forgotten Blair Athol; Saraband redeemed his promise of being one of the foremost two-year-olds; the prim Philosopher could not cope with the Gay Hermit; the ever-victorious two-year-old, The Bard, scored his twelfth victory in succession, and made the sum in stakes to his credit up to £6908 (for an original outlay of 650 gs. as a yearling); the expensive St. Honorat, who cost 4000 gs. at two years of age, came out for the first time in his life, disappointed his friends, and did no more than show small promise; the "dark" Isobar, at his first appearance, took everybody's breath away (except the bookmakers', who roared like Boanerges) by beating Duke of Richmond and four others by something less than a "whole street," and by winning a stake of £1050 after costing 250 gs. as a yearling; Energy maintained his greatness; and Mr. H. T. Barclay "came again," and won the rich Hardwicke Stakes (£2727) with Bendigo. In the four days there were twenty-nine events; and, be it observed, in every case but one the winner is descended in the direct male line from Mr. Darley's Arabian. The one exception is Pepper and Salt (unexpected winner, at odds of 50 to 1 against him, of the Prince of Wales's Stakes)—he descends from Captain Byerley's Turk. The poor old Godolphin Arabian (Barb) had no winner to represent him.

A curious story of a walled-up picture is told respecting one of David's canvases, representing the assassination of Lepelletier Saint-Fargeau, who, in dying, left an only daughter to the tender mercies of the French nation. She grew up one of the loveliest women of her day, and married M. De Boisgelin, a gentleman of good old family, who was anxious that the very memory of his wife's father should disappear. Knowing that David, who by that time had received the title of Baron, had never parted with the aforesaid painting, M. De Boisgelin went to Paris, and asking the artist to name a price, paid it cheerfully, though he was somewhat annoyed by a condition attached to the purchase, binding him down not to destroy it. He carried the picture home to his château, in the department of the Yonne, and, sending for a lawyer, an architect, and a chemist, he had the wainscot in one of the rooms taken down, the painting hung on the wall, and the wood replaced in its original position. The man of law made a formal record of the fact, and the chemist signed a deed declaring that the picture would not perish or be injured in the extraordinary position in which it remains to this day.

The Houses of Lords and Commons will have spacious accommodation at the forthcoming naval review, for the troop-ships Himalaya and Tamar will be placed at their service. Each of these great vessels is a perfect floating town when on duty, so our legislators will be well off for elbow room. It is said that the Spithead forts will play very important parts at the review this year, and the event is causing a considerable amount of interest in naval circles.

The Inflexible is nearly ready for sea, but the result of storing her bunkers with coal has been to convert them into reservoirs of gas. The crew feel very uneasy indeed; as besides the serious explosion which recently sent several poor fellows to Haslar Hospital, there have been three minor explosions within the last few days, though neither of them has done more damage than singeing hair and blackening faces. The ventilation of the bunkers, and the kind of coal with which they are stored, will be made the subjects of a searching inquiry.

It is said that among the effects of Goethe's grandson, who died recently, the poet's autograph journals from 1777 to 1832 have been discovered. If published entire, the world will have a feast of many things—scandals included.

The dresses worn at Ascot were, in reality, very plain this year. Of course, there were a few gorgeous ones; but the inclosure is not what it used to be, in more ways than one. Many an honourable woman wore the same toilette at Ascot as she wears every day in the Park, for it is among patricians that the pressure caused by the number of farms unlet is felt. The dresses are far smarter at Sandown, where the cream of the trading classes can get in on the payment of entrance fees, and where they know that they will not be jostled in a nameless cloud.

One cannot but be sorry to hear that Sir Henry Ponsonby's well-deserved holiday during her Majesty's absence at Balmoral, had to be cut short owing to the Ministerial crisis. He is so urbane, and, like his Royal Mistress, so considerate to all sorts and conditions of men and women who have even the smallest claim on his attention, that his time must be more than occupied, and a brief holiday must be a vast relief.

"See, the conquering hero comes," was originally written in the oratorio of "Jephtha," but afterwards transferred to "Judas Maccabeus." Handel did not himself care very much about this chorus, though he foresaw its popularity, and one day told a friend younger than himself that he would probably live to see it a greater favourite with the people than his finer compositions. The vox populi gave its verdict, however, during Handel's lifetime most unmistakably.

The Bi-centenary of Handel's birth, celebrated this week at the Crystal Palace, recalls many anecdotes of that wonderful genius whose temper was as full of fire as his choruses. He once took the famous diva Cuzzoni up in his arms, and, carrying her to an open window, made as if he would throw her out because she flatly refused to sing the aria he had written expressly for her voice in the opera of "Ottone." This treatment had the desired effect; she sang the song in exact accordance with Handel's directions, and with it achieved one of the most brilliant successes of her artistic career. On another occasion, a poet, who never ranked among the immortals, but who wrote many librettos for Handel's music, complained that a certain melody was not suitable to the words. This roused the master's ire, and he thundered out "What! you teach me music? The music, Sir, is good music. It is your words is bad. Hear the passage again. There! go you, make words to that music!"

Bishop Hannington, the junior Prelate on the African "Bench," has been mountaineering with a vengeance. He tramped from his home a couple of hundred miles to Kilimajaro, and ascended it to the height of 8800 ft., though even at that altitude he did not reach the snow-line. The episcopal party seem to have had rather more company than was desirable during their trip, for between the foot of the mountain and the plateau they reached they sighted specimens of every kind of wild beast known to exist on the Dark Continent, with the exception of lions and elephants. The Bishop enjoyed his adventures immensely, and declared that he was not even footsore when he got back to the abode by courtesy called his palace.

Charity is supposed to be a striking virtue of the English people, but it may be doubted whether it bears any proportion to the extraordinary wealth of the country. Considering that the enormous sum assessed for income tax is £600,000,000, the amount devoted to charitable objects should be large indeed. Money given by wealthy persons is no indication of charity unless it involves self-denial, and the amounts collected last Sunday for our hospitals cannot be said to give much indication of this great Christian virtue. For instance, the three services at Westminster Abbey did not yield £200, while the corresponding services at St. Paul's scarcely produced more than £160. Such sums given by such congregations to one of the noblest of metropolitan charities force us to believe, in spite of Shakspeare's assertion, that the quality of mercy is sometimes strained.

Many are the details which an aspirant for histrionic honours must acquaint himself with before he can be considered accomplished; and of late years many opportunities have been offered to him. But a society of Americans who have the interest of the drama at heart have founded a seminary for a purpose which less adventurous spirits might have thought could have been included in the ordinary curriculum of a theatrical education. The establishment is to be called a "school of expression," and its object is to give instruction solely in facial movements. Perhaps embryo clowns will be taught to laugh merrily and smile with the rotundity of their class; young ladies will learn to depict the various emotions of love, hate, envy, jealousy, and pleasure by a code of feature-posing. But whatever may be the result of the enterprise, it will be certainly funny to watch a class studying. The facial gymnastics commenced by a professor and subsequently copied by half a dozen pupils, each, of course, having a different natural set of features, will be interesting if not grotesque, and it may be difficult for certain pupils with a keen sense of humour to restrain their risible faculties over the grief, pantomimically simulated to order, of a fellow-student.

Amongst the many rapid and eccentric changes that the recent abrupt alteration of Government has brought about, a philosopher will dwell with curious interest on the post of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland. But a few months ago Sir Edward Sullivan was advanced from the position of Master of the Rolls to the Hibernian woolsack. It was a popular appointment. Sir Edward was a tried and trusty lawyer, and had, as everyone knew, draughted all the recent bills relating to what is called "exceptional legislation" in the sister country. Suddenly, after a return from the Royal Levée at Dublin Castle, the Lord Chancellor was taken ill, and died in a few hours from what is vaguely called "gout in the heart." Lord Spencer cast about for a successor, and his imperative mandate to his Cabinet was to advance Mr. John Naish, D.C. Mr. Naish was a young man, with a high reputation as an Equity Lawyer, but little or no reputation as an orator. However, he had done the State good service as "Law Adviser" to the Castle, and his appointment was also popular with both the public and the Bar. At last, Chancery suitors, infants, lunatics, and minors looked forward to a prolonged reign of peaceful justice. Suddenly the political teetotum spins round; My Lord Chancellor Naish appears on the bench, receives congratulations, invests in a new wig and a black-and-gold gown, appoints his officers, disposes of some routine business, makes his bow, and after a few hours', to his practised mind, very easy work, retires for life on a pension of £4000 a year. "A Lord Chancellor for a week" would almost make a sensational shilling's-worth.

"I wish you would do something for our young soldiers," said Gordon to Lord Tennyson, shortly before he left England for Africa, and that wish it is now intended to realise by the foundation of a camp in which poor and friendless boys may be trained for service in the Army. Such a memorial to one of the greatest of English heroes is singularly appropriate. The profound sorrow felt by Englishmen at his loss needs visible expression, and how can they better show their sympathy than by doing what he would so gladly have seen done? A memorial like this, which is patriotic as well as personal, need not interfere with others. Gordon's fruitful, self-sacrificing life will, no doubt, receive recognition in many ways, and not by a single mark of England's gratitude. But nothing that may be done hereafter in reverent regard for his memory will honour it more appropriately than the formation of the Gordon Boys' Camp.

It has been generally supposed that the owner of a house possesses the most precise and accurate knowledge of its value. He, one would think, is not likely to let his property at a sum smaller than it is worth. Yet the Assessment Commissioners evidently consider that the landlord does not know his own business, since, in the late reassessment, the rent the landlord charges is in most cases less than the value at which the property is assessed. The assessors are grave men; or one might regard it as a stroke of humour on their part, at a time when house property is universally depreciated, to declare that its value shall be fictitiously increased.

Lessons of humility are said to be good for us, and there are plenty of them to be learnt at the "Inventories." Let a man who thinks that he is clever go and look at a beautiful little automatic machine for turning out screws in the "American Waltham Watch" department; and if he does not come away feeling "real mean," he must either be a very superior person indeed, or can have no feeling at all. Conquerors may be all very well at times; Timour the Tartar, or Alexander the Great, or Napoleon the First, may have been "clayver" men, as Shakspeare and Victor Hugo were; but the inventor of that little machine could have given the conquerors, if not the poets, many pounds, as they say in horse-racing, and have beaten them, so far as what the Greeks called "deinotes" is concerned, by many lengths. Scaliger used to say that he would rather have written Horace's "Ode to Melpomene" (the third of the fourth book) than be King of Arragon: who would not rather have invented that wonderful little machine than have written that charming little ode?

At music-halls, at theatres, and in the "stands" at race meetings it is, unfortunately, by no means uncommon to hear of staircases or something else "giving way," so that many poor creatures are killed and many more grievously injured; and now, on the 10th inst., at the Palais de Justice de Thiers, Puy de Dome, a stone staircase gave way, it is said, "while a murder case was being tried which attracted great public interest," and the casualties are reported as "twenty-four killed" and "one hundred and sixty-four injured." It needed but this to complete the resemblance which has been traced between a Court of Justice, whether in France or in England, or anywhere else, perhaps, in the civilised world, and a place of public amusement.

When "crack" racehorses travel, their meat and drink are sometimes more carefully attended to than would be the case if the travellers, instead of being quadrupeds, were Royal personages. Paradox, it is said, in his late trip to Paris, had his own particular tap of water carried over for him in "cases," like a monarch's own particular champagne. The famous Austro-Hungarian mare, Kincsem, in like manner, used to have her own special "oats and hay" taken about with her, it is related; and so fastidious was she in her drink that, when she was from home, her trainer might have "to send miles for something that suited her taste," else she would refuse to quench her thirst with the common stuff of the neighbourhood. Nor is this matter of water to be treated lightly; for it is well known that the "knob" in Melbourne's throat was caused by the water at Hampton Court, and that "goitre," whether permanent or not, may be traced to the same cause.

The question of eating insects which has been lately discussed in various phases of nastiness has now arrived at the point when we are told that cockroaches are as nice as prawns. This recalls a story of a young housekeeper whose kitchen suffered from the nightly inroads of these marauders. She inquired from someone more experienced than herself as to how she should rid herself of the crawling nuisances, and was told that a hedgehog would exterminate them in less than a week. Accordingly, the little prickly beast was procured, and the lady, being a kind-hearted soul, feared that it might be hungry, and for its food she put down on the floor a large basin of bread and milk. Next morning when she went down to see after the success of her attempt she found more cockroaches than she had ever seen before busily enjoying the bread and milk, while the hedgehog was curled up asleep in a corner. When it has been (as it never will be) finally decided that blackbeetles are desirable as food, the result of this experience should teach people how to catch them.

MUSIC.

THE HANDEL FESTIVAL.

This has been the great musical event of the week, the public rehearsal having taken place on the Friday of last week. These celebrations originated in 1857, when experimental performances were given at the Crystal Palace, conducted by the late Sir Michael Costa, the first occasion of the festivals being made of triennial recurrence having been after that of 1859. The three years' interval was regularly observed until this week's celebration, it having been held twelve months in anticipation, for the very justifiable reason that this year is the bi-centenary of Handel's birth. All the festivals were conducted by Sir Michael Costa until the last, in 1884, when his serious illness (that soon after culminated in death) hindered that co-operation which had exercised so large an influence on the success of these great performances. The appointment of Mr. Manns in place of Sir Michael Costa was but a just recognition of the energy and skill manifested by the former in his direction, during many years, of the famous Saturday Afternoon Concerts at the Crystal Palace. To sway the enormous forces assembled at a Handel festival, however, is a far more arduous undertaking than to conduct a concert in which comparatively small numbers are engaged; and it was a matter for congratulation—scarcely for surprise—that Mr. Manns passed through the ordeal with triumphant success.

The arrangements for this year's festival were on a grand and extensive scale, similar to those of previous years. The performers numbered about four thousand, the solo vocalists having been Mesdames Albani, Valleria, Suter, Patey, and Trebelli, Miss A. Marriott; Mr. E. Lloyd, Mr. Maas, Mr. Santley, Mr. F. King, Mr. B. Foote, Mr. Bridson, and Signor Foli.

As on previous occasions, the three grand performances took place on the Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, preceded by a public rehearsal, this having been held (as already said) yesterday (Friday) week. On this preliminary occasion (which had indeed almost the importance and efficiency of a performance) portions of the works of the three programmes of this week were given, thus enabling visitors who could only attend on one day, to hear some prominent items of the whole proceedings. Monday was, as heretofore, devoted to "The Messiah." On Wednesday a miscellaneous selection (sacred and secular) was performed, and on Friday (yesterday) the Festival closed with "Israel in Egypt," Handel's grandest choral work, and the fittest possible climax for such a celebration.

The solo vocalists in "The Messiah" were—Mesdames Albani and Patey; Mr. Maas, Mr. Santley, and Signor Foli; whose performances were worthy of their high reputation. As is inevitable in so vast a building as the Crystal Palace, the choral music produced the greatest effect, especially those sublime movements—"For unto us a child is born," "Hallelujah," and the final, "Worthy is the Lamb."

The second day's programme comprised several pieces that had not been given at any previous Handel Festival. These included a concerto for double orchestra that still remains in manuscript, and one of the sonatas for violin played by all the orchestral violinists. Another instrumental feature was one of the organ concertos performed by Mr. W. T. Best; Mr. A. J. Eyre, organist to the Crystal Palace, having officiated as accompanying organist during the festival. On the selection-day, and of the closing performance, we must speak next week.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.

The reopening of Covent-Garden Theatre for Italian operatic performances was, as recorded by us last week, postponed from Tuesday until Saturday, in consequence of the indisposition of Madame Adelina Patti, who was announced to appear as Violetta in "La Traviata," which promise was fulfilled on Saturday, when the great prima donna sang and acted with triumphant success. Indeed, whether as to vocal charm and refinement, or intense dramatic power, Madame Patti has never been heard and seen to greater advantage than on Saturday night. In the earlier music of the opera, including the scena "Ah! fors' è lui," brilliant vocalisation was the chief characteristic; the subsequent scenes with Alfredo and the elder Germont—Violetta's lover and his father—having been replete with tenderness and pathos. Especially fine was the dying scene of Violetta, which was tragic in its truthfulness, without being exaggerated in its details. The reception of the great prima donna was of the most enthusiastic kind. As the elder Germont, Signor De Anna displayed a baritone voice of excellent quality, and sang with much success; Signor Giannini having made a good impression in his rendering of the music of Alfredo. The subordinate characters were generally well sustained.

On Tuesday evening "Semiramide" was given, and included Madame Patti's admirable performance in the title-character, the florid music of which was brilliantly rendered. As on many former occasions, the co-operation of Madame Scalchi as Arsace was an important feature. Semiramide's scena, "Bel raggio," and the duet for her and Arsace, "Eben a te ferisci," were among the specialties of the evening. Signor Del Puente, as Assur, sang and acted well, and Signor Cherubini was favourably received on his first appearance as Oroe. A good orchestra and chorus are engaged, and the performances are skilfully conducted by Signor Arditi.

A meeting in reference to the establishment of a standard musical pitch was held at St. James's Hall last Saturday afternoon, under the auspices of the Royal Academy of Music, Sir G. A. Macfarren, Principal of that institution, having presided. He, Mr. Santley, Dr. Stainer, and other well-known musicians, spoke on the subject, and a resolution was arrived at in favour of the French "Diapason normal." It will be well if this is carried out, so as to establish a somewhat lower pitch than has prevailed at our opera-houses, and in some other directions.

A concert was given at the Albert Palace on Saturday in aid of the funds for the Fawcett Memorial. Effective vocal and instrumental performances were contributed by students of the Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind, Upper Norwood. Dr. Campbell (the Principal) conducted the choir, and Mr. A. C. Mackenzie directed the orchestra.

The Guildhall School of Music gave a concert at the Mansion House on Saturday, when the vocal and instrumental performances of the students afforded good evidence of the progress made under the direction of Mr. Weist Hill.

An instrumental and vocal concert was given at Prince's Hall on Saturday evening in aid of the funds of the German Teachers' Society. The programme included performances conducted by Herr Richter, violin solos by Mdlle. Eissler, pianoforte pieces rendered by Chevalier Bach and Messrs. G. Ernest and C. Weber, and vocal music contributed by Miss H. Glenn and others. The object of the concert was a meritorious one, and deserved support.

The ninth and last Richter Concert of the eleventh season took place at St. James's Hall on Monday evening, when the programme closed with Beethoven's choral symphony. The work was finely rendered by orchestra, chorus, and solo vocalists, these having been Misses A. Sherwin and Goldstein, Mr. E. Lloyd, and Mr. F. King. The programme otherwise calls for no comment.

The band sent to this country by the Siamese Government performed at the Inventions Exhibition on Monday. The curious nature of their instruments and of their music (which is mostly handed down traditionally by ear) renders their performances highly interesting.

The Benedict memorial performance took place at Drury-Lane Theatre on Tuesday afternoon, for the benefit of Lady Benedict. The programme, which was dramatic as well as musical, included vocal music contributed by Mr. Sims Reeves, Miss B. Francis, Madame Trebelli, Mr. Maas, Mr. Santley, Mr. King, and Mr. Stedman's choir of boys; and dramatic pieces, in which Mr. and Mrs. Kendal, Mrs. John Wood, Mr. Arthur Cecil, Miss K. Rorke, Mr. Wyndham, and Mr. Giddens appeared; and recitations were given by Mr. Bancroft, Mr. George Grossmith, and Mr. Beerbohm-Tree. There was a very large audience. The occasion had a melancholy interest, the performance having been given in lieu of what would have been the fifty-first annual concert of the late Sir Julius Benedict.

Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir will give the second of this season's concerts at St. James's Hall this (Saturday) afternoon, with an interesting programme.

Mr. Kuhe's annual morning concert will take place at St. James's Hall next Monday afternoon, with a strong programme, including vocal and instrumental performances, and recitations by Mr. Henry Irving.

Mdlle. Fernande Carini and Mdlle. Isabelle Levallois give a matinée musicale next Monday, at 127, Queen's-gate, by permission of Captain and Madame Da Fonzeca Vaz, of the Portuguese Legation.

Miss Amina Goodwin and Herr Alexander Kummer gave a pianoforte and violin recital at Marlborough Rooms last Saturday evening.

Madame Frickenhaus and Herr Josef Ludwig gave another of their chamber concerts on Thursday.

Mr. Kuhe announces his annual concert for next Monday morning at St. James's Hall.

The London Musical Society give an entertainment at St. James's Hall next Tuesday evening, the programme being "The Four Passions," by H. Scheitz; "My Spirit was in Heaviness," by Bach; and madrigals by various composers.

THE PLAYHOUSES.

Theatrical management is indeed a strange science. As illustrated by the recent production of a sensation play at Drury-Lane, it may well puzzle less experienced men than Mr. Augustus Harris. The weather is lovely; we have arrived at the "month of roses"; the Inventories Exhibition is in full swing; people seem sighing for open-air concerts, valses by Strauss, garden parties, bicycle trips, and lawn tennis. The streets are hot; squalid London is hideous: so what is the design of the theatrical manager to assist this summer fancy? He does nothing of the kind; he counteracts it. Street fights in the Seven Dials; women knocked down flat on the stage by bullying husbands; cursing costermongers and hand-to-hand fights between London roughs and stalwart policemen; carneying cockneys with gutter language; the noise and fury of an armed sortie from Paris; shells bursting at the foot of Mont Valerien; the roar of cannon; the scream of the Gatling gun; wounded men carried away on stretchers; Sisters of Mercy and army surgeons binding up wounds; the victorious Prussians marching into Paris through the bleeding ranks of the defeated French:—these are the counteracting influences of dramatic art to oppose the beauty of outside nature. But that is not enough. The squalor of the streets has been succeeded by the terrors of war. Let the battle-picture be exchanged for one of domestic terror. A woman is represented as dying in a workhouse ward. The screen is drawn round her bed. The doctor sprinkles her parched lips with water. The nurse prays in a corner. The friends watch anxiously as the life of the pale consumptive woman ebbs away. A fair child, soon to be an orphan, sobs on the white counterpane. An audience released from the flowers and the sunshine is ushered into the presence of simulated death. All these things, and many more, may be found in Mr. Elliot Galer's "True Story," a realistic drama of a very elaborate kind, that has been mounted at great expense, and produced with scrupulous care, by Mr. Augustus Harris at Drury-Lane. So clever a manager presumably understands his audience, and has studied the age in which he lives. "The drama's laws the drama's patrons give." There are some exceptional and original people who prefer the pleasures of imagination to the powers of reality; who consider the sight of the streets of an overcrowded capital sickening enough without desiring to see much more of them; who would rather shut their ears to foul language than enjoy its repetition as a form of amusement; who would rather avoid death-scenes than be thrust into the contemplation of a dramatic Morgue. Such as these are apparently in a minority. For the rest, there is nothing so exciting as a street row; nothing so curious as the contemplation of a costermonger; nothing so beautiful as a battle; nothing so delightful as death. De gustibus non est disputandum. Although it is not possible to agree with a prominent critic who has openly declared that "A True Story" is a well-constructed or particularly intelligible play, it is at least a picturesque and exciting one. My intellect may be becoming obscured by the contemplation of many-sided drama, but I must own that I grasped the plot with difficulty, and that my wits went wool-gathering during a "sequel," wherein all the characters got as "completely mixed" as the twins in Mr. Harry Leigh's well-known ballad. From the point of view of realistic melodrama, however, the play is admirably done at Drury-Lane. The storming of Paris is a splendid stage picture; it is hot, fiery, noisy, and exciting, and may possibly make people cool on the principle of vaccination and homœopathy. Similia similibus curantur. We drink hot tea to keep cool, poison ourselves to become pure, and contemplate battle-scenes on the eve of the dog days. A Drury-Lane audience, full of enthusiasm, has also pronounced favourable judgment on several of its old favourites. Mr. Harry Jackson and Mr Harry Nicholls are pronounced first-rate—the one as a cadger and the other as a costermonger. They never open their mouths without being greeted with a roar of laughter; and the allied "Harrys" are the idols of Drury-Lane. In one scene Mr. Jackson has an opportunity for a quick departure from buffoonery. He avails himself of it, and acts with great intensity and nature. Popular also, but from another point of view, are Mr. W. Herbert and Miss Fanny Brough, the romantic hero and heroine. The one is manly and unaffected; the other gentle and charming. Mr. Mansfield gives us a very elaborate character sketch of a selfish and sensual old Peer. Mr. Day enacts a well-dressed villain with determined force, and Miss Amy McNeill, from the Surrey, had scarcely been on the stage five minutes before she was recognised as a young actress of exceptional promise and marked intelligence. She has everything in her favour—youth, good looks, and expression. In strong domestic drama she ought to be admirable.

Homer sometimes nods, and the smartest writers occasionally lose the salt of their wit. Mr. Theyre Smith has scarcely kept up his reputation as a composer of pungent dialogue in his little play called "The Castaways," recently produced at the St. James's. From first to last, the joke of bringing together a husband-hunting widow and an old admirer on a desert island in the Pacific, is a little strained and over elaborate. To make the idea natural, Mrs. Kendal ought to copy the characters in the last act of the "Overland Route," and Mr. Kendal should attire himself as a modern Robinson Crusoe. That, however, would never do in a fashionable theatre frequented by the aristocracy. So Mrs. Kendal, as the shipwrecked widow, lolls among the palm-leaves in faultless mourning, and Mr. Kendal is as smart on the lonely tropical island as in the Royal Yacht Squadron Club-house at Cowes. Both actor and actress work very hard, but their labour is rewarded with little laughter. A capital revival of Mr. Pinero's "Money-Spinner" brings Mr. Hare prominently to the front in his old character, the Baron Croodle, an excellent sketch of eccentric manner; and Mr. Mackintosh repeats his able performance of a French detective. The new programme will, no doubt, suffice until the time of the departure of the St. James's company for a long tour in the provinces, where Mr. and Mrs. Kendal and Mr. Hare invariably receive a warm welcome.

The "Comedy" Theatre has changed hands, and its title is no longer a misnomer. Miss Violet Melnotte, weary of the Avenue, has relieved Mr. Alexander Henderson from the cares of management, and has very wisely made a good start with Mr. Sydney Grundy's "Silver Shield," so successfully produced the other morning at the Strand, to the huge delight of the "profession" there assembled. A few changes have been made by the author, and they are all for the better. I cannot at all agree with those critics who blame a writer of comedy for elaborating his dialogue, and for allowing literature to play a prominent part in his plays. There is not one line too much in "The Silver Shield," and not one speech that should be omitted, unless, indeed, we are to dispense with talking altogether on the stage, and to act all our plays in pantomime. Modern playwrights are not allowed to philosophise on the stage at all. If we had a Dumas, an Augier, or a Sardou they would be told that people want action, not talk. To moralise in the theatre is considered a sin, as things are ordered at present. The real reason of this is, only people are afraid to say so, that modern actors and actresses have no idea of speaking, or the skill requisite for the proper delivery of a sentence. They mumble so, and have so fallen into the trick of dropping the voice at the end of every sentence, that they cause the dullness and depression that are ascribed to the author and the author alone. If Mr. Sydney Grundy's comedy be dull, then let no one attempt comedy; for of all the writers for the stage he is the most trenchant and caustic. The acting of the play is fair enough, but not so good as it was, on the whole. Miss Amy Roselle is the only one of the original cast who has clearly improved, and acts better than she did before. Miss Kate Rorke is exceedingly interesting; but Mr. Arthur Roberts and Mr. Percy Compton are not an improvement on their clever predecessors. They are funny in themselves, but they fail to give special character to the common-place manager and the moralising clergyman.

"Loose Tiles," a bright farcical play, has been revived at the Vaudeville, and the adventures of two young fellows in a house that they believe to be a lunatic asylum, are amusingly shown by Mr. Thomas Thorne and Mr. Yorke Stephens. Comic character of a broader type is shown by Miss M. A. Victor, Mr. E. M. Robson, and that clever actress Miss Kate Phillips.

The matinée nuisance flourishes in spite of all remonstrances. Seldom, indeed, has palpably indifferent acting been so popular as it is now. There is a mysterious fascination in the feeble amateur effort that no ridicule will extinguish. The week is not long enough to contain the list of players who desire recognition and plays that demand a hearing. Mr. Norman Forbes, an intelligent young actor, has produced a version of "Gringoire," by Mr. W. G. Wills, and, together with Miss Dorothy Dene and others, has been vigorously applauded by assembled friends. But Mr. Norman Forbes is not actor enough for "Gringoire" as yet. It does not, of course, follow that because Coquelin created the part that nobody else should touch it. Mr. Norman Forbes does not profess to be a Coquelin; but then, on the other hand, he cannot master the supreme difficulties of "Gringoire." But if Miss So-and-So, who has just stepped out of the school-room, can aspire to Juliet, and Mr. Tyro, who has learned Hamlet by heart, considers he can act the Prince of Denmark, why should not a very capable Gratiano, or a possible Horatio, have "a cut in" at such a part as "Gringoire"? There is no law to prevent his doing so; but should such a youthful effort demand serious criticism? Surely actors and actresses can practise in private.

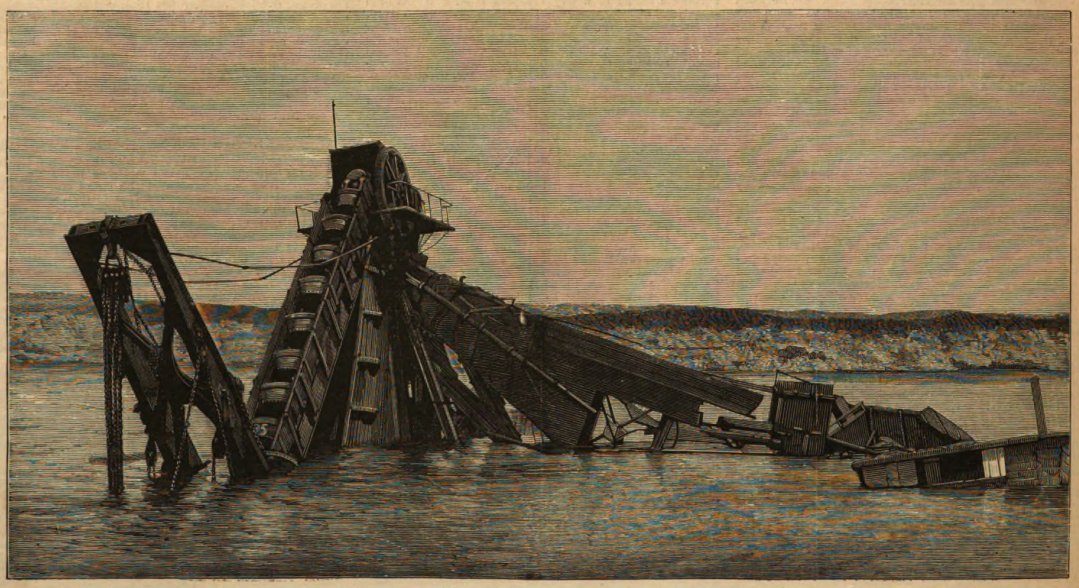
THE REBELLION IN NORTH-WEST CANADA.



The campaign of General Middleton with the Colonial Militia against the half-breed and Indian rebels on the North Saskatchewan seems to be terminated with entire success. The last of the captives who were detained by the Indian chief called Big Bear have been set at liberty, and General Middleton does not propose to pursue that chief farther to the north, as most of his followers have deserted him, and made their submission to the Government. Our military correspondent, Captain H. De H. Haig, R.E., Assistant Quartermaster-General, has sent us an interesting series of Sketches, mostly taken at Batoche, where General Middleton's small force had four days' sharp fighting, from May 9 to May 12 inclusive, and lost eight men killed and forty-six wounded, the loss of the enemy being sixty-four dead and 173 wounded in that time. The enemy's rifle-pits, of which we give two Illustrations, were elaborately constructed for shelter and for convenience of shooting, with loopholes in the low front rampart; in one instance, the nave of a wheel, as shown in Captain Haig's Sketch, had been stuck in the earthen wall to serve as a neat and clear loophole. At the back of this rifle-pit is seen the cooking-fire of its inmates, with a cow's head lying beside it; the wounded men are sprawling on the bank, at the edge of the pit. Some of them behaved with desperate ferocity, and one, having attempted with his revolver to kill a scout who meant to offer him relief or assistance, was instantly put to death by a soldier of the 90th Regiment. Many prisoners, however, were taken; and the General himself, while riding across the field, met a runaway Indian, dressed in shabby old clothes of the European pattern, who said he was servant to the priest, but who had actually been in the fight, and had subsequently hidden his rifle; this man was consigned to safe custody. The surrender of Louis Riel, the prime instigator of the rebellion, was mentioned by us some time ago; he was brought to General Middleton on May 16, at Gardepin's Crossing, fourteen miles beyond Batoche, and our Correspondent made sketches of him and his escort. He is to be tried for high treason at Regina, the capital of the North-West Territory of the Dominion of Canada.

TENT-PEGGING EXTRAORDINARY AT SOUAKIM.

TENT-PEGGING ON A CAMEL.

Military sports, in the camps and garrisons of the British Army wherever our troops are stationed, and sometimes at home, partake not unfrequently of the character of martial exercises imitated from the warlike chivalry of Asia, who are expert both in horsemanship and in the use of the lance while riding. It is probable that the tilting tournaments of the Middle Ages were copied from the practice of the Saracens during the Crusades; and we believe that, not many years ago, both the game of polo and the dexterous trick of striking a tent-peg, and lifting it from the ground at the lance's point, were adopted by some of our officers who had observed the skill of Indian or Punjaubee warriors in these favourite performances. Tent-pegging seems to be a rather humorous variation of the ancient custom of carrying off a suspended ring with the lance, which is described among the habitual feats of knightly accomplishment. We know that many of our gallant countrymen have attained a high degree of expertness, and could probably compete with the cavalry of the Mahrattas or the Sikhs. It has not, however, been reported, so far as we are aware, that any of the native Indian tent-peggers ever ventured to try the experiment in riding a camel, which must be incomparably more difficult. A gallant Captain of the Bengal Lancers, at Souakim, one day while the Indian Contingent was there in camp, had the courage to put this question to a practical test in the presence of a crowd of spectators, but the attempt was a decided failure. Our Special Artist, Mr. Walter Paget, furnishes a Sketch of the amusing exhibition, which is not likely soon to be repeated in the Soudan.

THE SUNKEN DREDGER BLOCKING THE SUEZ CANAL.

FISHING UP LOST ANCHORS.

THE BLOCK IN THE SUEZ CANAL.

On Monday last, the channel which has been cut round the sunken dredger in the Suez Canal being completed, the canal was reopened to the world's commercial and general navigation. It is an extraordinary fact, after all we have lately heard upon the subject, that, owing to the block on the Suez Canal, no fewer than 110 steamers have been detained for twelve days. They represent 250,000 tons of shipping and 350,000 tons of cargo. Thousands of sailors and hundreds of passengers have been condemned during the same time to a life of idleness. Among the vessels detained were fifteen mail-steamers. The stoppage was, of course, perfectly accidental, or was perhaps occasioned by some awkwardness or negligence on the part of servants of the Canal Company, or of the contractors for the dredging, but of this we are not precisely informed. The place where the dredger still lies is near the twentieth milepost from Port Said, and in the centre of the channel. We have to thank Messrs. Wills, Manché, and Co., of Port Said and Suez, for sending us a photograph representing the sunken dredger in its actual position.

FISHING UP LOST ANCHORS.

Many summer holiday-makers, basking on the sunny beach, fail to understand the various cares and labours of the ordinary seaside folk. They look on these, perhaps, as a class of able-bodied men, in extremely stiff and much-patched garments, whose grand business is to do nothing at all, unless the mending their nets—an occupation which looks much like idleness in disguise—may be called doing something. Yet these are the men who spend most of their nights out upon the waters, often battling with storm and tempest, and who are ready, at a moment's notice, to man a life-boat, and go forth in the wild darkness to save some shipwrecked crew. The nets we see them so calmly mending on the shore are their stock-in-trade; and we could gather many a tale of how these nets were torn away from the boats, or rent in pieces by some hidden obstacle. A frequent cause of this disaster is a lost anchor, which may have been slipped from some good ship to avoid collision; or from the strain upon the cable having been too great on some fearful night—the ship, suddenly freed from the anchor, with one mighty bound may perhaps have rushed to her destruction. The broken chain and the trusty anchor lie at the bottom—no longer a help, they have become a dangerous obstacle to all passing nets; and so one duty of the boatmen is to remove them. In a large boat, well adapted to carry such weights, the fishermen sally forth to capture their enemy, whose whereabouts is soon determined by landmarks taken by the owners of the injured nets. Then, by means of a stout hawser, and taking advantage of the rising tide, the anchor and chain are soon recovered, and, having been brought to shore, may ultimately be sold.

ART NOTES.

The exhibition of sculpture now on view at Messrs. Bellman and Ivey's Galleries (37, Piccadilly) merits especial attention from all who are inclined to think disparagingly of this branch of English art. There are here brought together upwards of forty works by Mr. T. Nelson Maclean, whose power as a sculptor time has been quietly but steadily ripening, and one cannot fail to recognise that the English School can now reckon an accomplished artist in a path which is strewn with the faded hopes of many competitors. It is useless to discuss here the cause of the decline of sculpture in this country, and of the apparent powerlessness of even Flaxman to give it more than a passing popularity. Like every other art, the sculptor's art cannot flourish without patronage, and either our temperament or our climate is unpropitious to its encouragement. Mr. Maclean is not daunted by the difficulties in his path, and he now presents the varied fruits of many years' laborious study, hoping to show that the sculptor can produce works of art which not only will command passing admiration, but are consistent with the principles of decoration. With this object, he offers not only finished marble figures, but works in bronze, terra-cotta, and plaster, and on each he impresses the mark of robust individualism and of his strong sympathy with the work of the Italian Renaissance. His principal group, which is at least life-size, is suggested by Mr. Alma Tadema's well-known picture of the "Spring Festival," a Roman youth and maiden in the full movement of a religious or national dance. The success with which the thorough abandon of the dancers has been seized is scarcely less remarkable than the artistic skill with which the group is composed, the symmetry of the lines sustained, and the sense of rhythmic movement conveyed. These features are repeated in a lesser degree in the "Bacchante" (71); and in such figures as "Ione" (9) and "Meditation" (17), Mr. Maclean is equally successful in catching an almost classic idea of simplicity and repose. "Sappho's Last Appeal" (41) is almost tragic in its passionate expression; whilst in the various portrait studies with which the gallery abounds it is not difficult to trace the various dominant emotions with which the sculptor has had to deal, nor to realise the readiness with which he has triumphed over the obstacles in his path. Whatever exceptions may be taken against Mr. Maclean's work, he can never be charged with monotony or repetition—a rare merit in these days.

There is another representative display of British sculpture at Mr. Bruce Joy's studio (Savile-row), which will repay a visit. Mr. Bruce Joy's strength lies in portraiture, and a glance round the room recalls vividly many well-known faces, amongst whom may be mentioned Miss Mary Anderson, Mr. Gladstone, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and others. The principal work, however, is the colossal figure, in bronze, of the late Lord Frederick Cavendish—which, in its present state, shows to great advantage over the plaster cast at the Royal Academy. The pose is manly and simple, but the adaptation of an Inverness cape to the purposes of a Roman toga seems a somewhat severe strain in the resources of utilitarianism. Mr. Bruce Joy has also some interesting work in his newly-invented composition, "Marmorine," of which the full use has yet to be proved by the test of time and exposure. The bust of Mr. Gladstone, taken from the full-length figure designed by the artist, and erected at Stratford, shows that an excellent surface can be obtained in marmorine; and should it be found to have other qualities in equal proportion, it will doubtless commend itself to sculptors who wish to be independent of the pointer and other mechanical assistants.

Mr. William Linnell and Mr. John Proctor have been elected on the Council of the City of London Society of Artists and Guildhall Academy of Arts.

A portrait of Fred. Archer, the famous jockey, painted by Miss Rosa Corder, and engraved by Mr. Richard Josey, has been published by Mr. Ackermann, of Regent-street, who is now issuing signed artists' proofs.

The Irish Artisans' Exhibition in Dublin was opened on Wednesday. It embraces exhibits in almost every branch of Irish industry and manufacture.

In his financial statement Sir Julius Vogel, the Colonial Treasurer for New Zealand, estimates the revenue of the colony for 1885-6 at £4,130,000, and the expenditure at £4,100,000, the revenue for the previous year having been £3,820,000 and the expenditure £3,790,000. The Treasurer proposes to increase the succession duties and the duty on tea, wines, and spirits.

BENEVOLENT OBJECTS.

The Scottish gathering in aid of the Scottish charities in London will be held to-day at Stamford-bridge Grounds.

The Prince and Princess of Wales have become patrons of the Royal Military Benevolent Fund, instituted by Mrs. Ellis-Williams, for granting annuities to widows and daughters of Army officers, if in necessitous circumstances.

The centenary festival dinner of the Marylebone Dispensary was held on the 18th inst. at the Langham Hotel—Alderman Sir R. W. Carden in the chair. There was a large company, and donations to the amount of £700 were announced.

On Tuesday the Lord Mayor presided at a festival dinner given at Willis's Rooms in aid of the funds of the London Fever Hospital, situated in the Liverpool-road, Islington, when subscriptions amounting to £2517 were announced.

Princess Louise, who was accompanied by the Marquis of Lorne, on Tuesday laid the foundation-stone of the new wing for out-patients and nurses at the Victoria Hospital for Sick Children, Chelsea. Purses were afterwards presented to the Princess for the building fund.

Last Saturday the annual examination of the scholars in the Commercial Travellers' Schools for Orphan and Necessitous Children took place, in the presence of a considerable number of subscribers. Mr. Samuel Morley, M.P., presided and distributed the prizes.

The ensuing anniversary festival of the Licensed Victuallers' School will be held at the Crystal Palace on Tuesday next. Mr. Spencer Charrington is to preside. The school in Kennington-lane has for many years past maintained and educated 200 orphans, at a cost approaching £7000 per annum.

The annual Caledonian fancy-dress ball, for the benefit of the Royal Caledonian Asylum and Royal Scottish Hospital, took place at Willis's Rooms on Monday, under the immediate patronage of her Majesty, the Prince and Princess of Wales, and other members of the Royal family.

A bazaar and miniature Tussaud Exhibition, held with the object of securing the purchase of a diocesan home, to be employed for the benefit and aid of young working women, at present rented at a large sum, was on Monday opened at Brixton-rise by the Duchess of Edinburgh, who was accompanied by the Duke and their children.

The sixth annual military tournament, in aid of the funds of the various army charities, was inaugurated last Saturday afternoon by a rehearsal of the effects at the Agricultural Hall. The actual tournament was opened on Monday by the Duke of Cambridge, the performances being repeated every day this week.

Madame Cellini's grand amateur concert in aid of the Hospital for Sick Children, Great Ormond-street, took place at St. James's Hall on Thursday evening. It was under the immediate patronage of the Queen and the Princess of Wales, and numerous members of the nobility kindly assisted as vocalists and instrumentalists.

The annual fête and visit of Festival Stewards took place at the Royal Masonic Institution for Boys, Wood-green, last Saturday, when the Lord Mayor attended to distribute the prizes to the boys who had distinguished themselves in recent examinations. The silver medal for good conduct was bestowed upon H. R. Hounslow, the Canonbury gold medal upon Frank Smith, and the silver watch and chain for general good conduct upon W. A. Sutton.

The foundation-stone of Mr. F. N. Charrington's new great Assembly Hall, in the East-End of London, will be laid next Saturday afternoon, July 4, by the Duchess of Westminster, accompanied by his Grace. The old hall, which had been opened nightly for nearly nine years, was only a temporary building, and altogether incapable of holding the thousands who sought admission. The new hall will hold 5000 persons, and will be the largest mission hall in London.

A meeting was held on Tuesday at the Mansion House in support of the Beaumont Trust Scheme for providing opportunities for rational amusement for the population of East London. The trustees have now secured nearly £40,000 of the £100,000 needed. The Lord Mayor presided, and the Prince of Wales moved the first resolution approving of the scheme, and urging the trustees to complete the purchase of the land and commence building. The Archbishop of Canterbury seconded the resolution, which was adopted. The Prince gave £100 to the fund.

Sir Robert Hart has been appointed her Majesty's Minister to China.

Messrs. Richard W. South and Fred Evered give their pleasant drawing-room entertainment every Monday, Wednesday, and Friday evening at the Egyptian Hall, Piccadilly.

The death, in his eighty-seventh year, of Mr. Arthur Hill, formerly Head Master of Bruce Castle School, Tottenham, and one of the brothers of the late Sir Rowland Hill, should not pass unnoticed; their family has indeed rendered good service, in different ways, to social and national improvement. The funeral of Mr. Arthur Hill, at Highgate Cemetery, on Tuesday, was attended by many of his old pupils, as well as by relatives and other personal friends.

Novelties follow each other in quick succession at Mr. and Mrs. German Reed's elegant entertainment, St. George's Hall. There will be an entire change of programme next Monday, the 29th inst. A new first part, entitled "A Pretty Bequest," is written by Malcolm Watson, the music being by Hamilton Clarke. This will be succeeded by a new musical sketch, by Corney Grain, entitled "The Eton v. Harrow," a sketch of the season. W. Herbert Gardner's "A Night in Wales" will conclude the programme.

Subscriptions are being received towards completing the endowment of a Child's Cot at the Convalescent Hospital, Cromwell House, Highgate, to the joint memory of Juliana Horatia Ewing and her mother, the late Mrs. Alfred Gatty, authoress of "Parables from Nature," &c. The first special cot in the Children's Hospital (49, Great Ormond-street) was established by Mrs. Gatty, the endowment of £1000 being collected by her from readers of "Aunt Judy's Magazine." She afterwards established a second cot, one being intended for the use of girls and the other of boys. Both of these cots are permanently endowed. But there is another at the Convalescent Hospital, Cromwell House, Highgate, dedicated to the memory of Mrs. Alfred Gatty, and towards this only £400 has yet been collected in the columns of "Aunt Judy's Magazine." The sum of £600 more is needed to complete the endowment, otherwise the cot will only last until the sum already given has been spent, instead of remaining, like the two cots at the Children's Hospital, so long as the Institution lasts. It has therefore been suggested that the £600 still wanting shall be collected from readers of Mrs. Ewing's books, and the cot "be re-dedicated to the memory of Mother and Daughter, both of whom were true lovers of children, and both of whom learned by their own sufferings the great value of such alleviations of pain as skilful and tender care can supply." Subscriptions may be sent to Miss Gatty, Villa Ponente, Taunton, or to the secretary of the Children's Hospital, 49, Great Ormond-street, Bloomsbury, London.

THE NEW MINISTRY.

The members of the new Cabinet, whose Portraits fill two pages of this week's Paper, are the Marquis of Salisbury, Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; Sir Stafford Northcote (to be created Earl of Iddesleigh), First Lord of the Treasury; the Duke of Richmond, President of the Board of Trade; Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Chancellor of the Exchequer; Sir Richard Cross, Home Secretary; Colonel Stanley, Secretary for the Colonies; Lord Randolph Churchill, Secretary for India; Mr. W. H. Smith, Secretary for War; Lord George Hamilton, First Lord of the Admiralty; the Earl of Carnarvon, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; Viscount Cranbrook, Lord President of the Council; the Earl of Harrowby, Lord Privy Seal; Sir Hardinge Giffard (with a peerage), Lord Chancellor; Lord John Manners, Postmaster-General; Mr. Edward Stanhope, Vice-President of the Council; and Mr. E. Gibson (with a peerage), Lord Chancellor of Ireland.

The Marquis of Salisbury (the Right Hon. Robert Arthur Talbot Gascoigne Cecil) was born Feb. 3, 1830, and became heir to the title in 1868. He was educated at Eton, and at Christ Church, Oxford; was elected a Fellow of All Souls' College in 1853; and is Chancellor for the University of Oxford, elected in 1869. Was M.P. for Stamford from 1853 to April 12, 1868. Was Secretary of State for India from 1866 to 1867, and from 1874 to 1878; and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs from 1878 to 1880. His Lordship, with General Peel and Lord Carnarvon, withdrew from Lord Derby's Cabinet on March 2, 1867, on account of a difference of opinion on the Parliamentary Reform Bill. Was Special Ambassador at the Constantinople Conference of 1876; and with Lord Beaconsfield at the Berlin Congress of 1878. Lord Salisbury was then invested with the Order of the Garter, together with Lord Beaconsfield. Is a member of the Council on Education, also of the Council of King's College. For many years was chairman of the Middlesex Sessions. Married, in 1857, daughter of the late Hon. Baron Alderson, and has four sons and two daughters.

Sat in the House of Commons for Dudley from March, 1855, till April, 1857, for Stamford from July, 1858, till 1866, and since for North Devonshire. Was Financial Secretary to the Treasury from January till June, 1859; President of the Board of Trade from July, 1866, till March, 1867; Secretary of State for India from March, 1867, till December, 1868; Chancellor of the Exchequer from February, 1874, till April, 1880; and leader of the Conservative party in the House of Commons from the elevation of Mr. Disraeli to the Peerage until the present time. Has served on several Commissions, and on the Joint High Commission whose labours resulted in the Treaty of Washington in 1871. Is a member of the Council on Education, and was elected Lord Rector of Edinburgh University in 1883. Was created a Civil Companion of the Bath for his services as one of the Secretaries to the Great Exhibition of 1851, and is also a G.C.B. Married, in 1843, a daughter of Mr. Thomas Farrer, of Lincoln's Inn; his second son, Mr. H. S. Northcote, is M.P. for Ex ter.

The Duke of Richmond and Gordon (Charles Henry Gordon Lennox) was born Feb. 27, 1818; was educated at Westminster School and Christ Church, Oxford; is an hon. D.C.L., and Chancellor of the University of Aberdeen; is a retired Major in the Army, and was Aide-de-Camp to the Duke of Wellington and to Viscount Hardinge; is Lord Lieutenant of the county of Banffshire; and an Elder Brother of the Trinity House. He succeeded his father in October, 1860. Previously, he sat in the House of Commons as M.P. for West Sussex from 1841. Was President of the Poor Law Board in 1859, President of the Board of Trade from 1867 to 1868, Leader of the Conservative party in the House of Lords from 1874 to 1880, and Lord President of the Council from 1874 to 1880. He married, in 1843, the eldest daughter of Mr. Algernon Frederick Greville; his eldest son, the Earl of March, sits for West Sussex.

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Bart., was born Oct. 23, 1837, was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford; graduated B.A. in 1858 (First-Class in Law and in Modern History). Was returned for his present constituency, East Gloucestershire, in 1864. Was Parliamentary Secretary to the Poor Law Board from March till August, 1868. Under-Secretary for State for the Home Department from August to December, 1868, Chief Secretary for Ireland from February, 1874, till February, 1878, and Secretary of State for the Colonies from February, 1878, till April, 1880. Has been twice married; last, in 1874, to Lady Lucy Catherine, daughter of the third Earl Fortescue.

Sir Richard Assheton Cross, G.C.B., was born May 30, 1823, and was educated at Rugby and at Trinity College, Cambridge; was called to the Bar at the Inner Temple 1849, and made a Bencher of his Inn 1876; for several years went the Northern Circuit. Was Secretary of State for the Home Department from February, 1874, to April, 1880. Is an Ecclesiastical Commissioner for England; also a member of the Council on Education. He has compiled legal works, and is chairman of the Lancashire Quarter Sessions. Married, in 1852, a daughter of the late Mr. T. Lyons, of Appleton Hall, Cheshire.

Colonel Frederick Arthur Stanley is younger brother and heir of the Earl of Derby. Born, Jan. 15, 1841; educated at Eton; entered the Grenadier Guards as Ensign and Lieutenant, April, 1858, became Lieutenant, Captain, and Adjutant, June, 1862, and retired 1865; is Colonel 3rd and 4th Battalion King's Own (Royal Lancashire Regiment). Sat for Preston from July, 1866, till November, 1868, since when he has represented North Lancashire. Was a Civil Lord of the Admiralty from August till November, 1868; Financial Secretary to the War Office from 1874 to 1877; Secretary to the Treasury from 1877 to 1878; and Secretary of State for War from 1878 to 1880. Married, in 1864, Lady Constance, eldest daughter of the fourth Earl of Clarendon.

The Right Hon. William Henry Smith is son of the founder of the firm of W. H. Smith and Son, railway-station newsagents and booksellers. He was born June 24, 1825, was educated at the Grammar School, Tavistock; and was created a D.C.L. at Oxford in 1879. Has sat for Westminster (which he unsuccessfully contested in July, 1865) since November, 1868, when he defeated John Stuart Mill. Was Financial Secretary to the Treasury from February, 1874, till August, 1877, and First Lord of the Admiralty from August, 1877, till March, 1880 (in succession to the late Mr. Ward Hunt). Was a representative of Westminster on the London School Board from 1870 to 1874; and is a member of the Council of King's College. Married, in 1858, a daughter of the late Mr. F. Dawes Danvers.

Lord Randolph Spencer Churchill is third son of the late Duke of Marlborough, and brother of the present Duke. Born Feb. 13, 1849; so he is in his thirty-sixth year. Educated at Merton College, Oxford; graduated B.A. 1870, and M.A. 1872. First elected for Woodstock in February, 1874. At last general election the poll at Woodstock stood thus: Churchill, 512; Hall (L.), 452. The number of electors was 1129. Woodstock is disfranchised under the new Reform Act, and Lord Randolph will contest one of the divisions of Birmingham. He has never before held office. He married, in 1874, Jenny, daughter of Mr. Leonard Jerome, of New York, United States.

Lord George Hamilton, third son of the Duke of Abercorn, was born Dec. 17, 1845, and was educated at Harrow. Entered the Army in the Rifle Brigade 1864, and exchanged into the Coldstream Guards 1868. First elected for Middlesex in November, 1868, when he achieved a great Conservative victory. Was Under-Secretary of State for India from February, 1874, till April, 1878, and Vice-President of the Committee of Education from April, 1878, till April, 1880. Was a Charity Commissioner from May, 1878, till April, 1880. Married, in 1871, Lady Maud Caroline, youngest daughter of the third Earl of Harewood.

The Earl of Carnarvon, Henry Howard Molyneux Herbert, fourth Earl, was born June 24, 1831, and succeeded to the title on Dec. 9, 1849, during his minority. Educated at Eton and at Christ Church, Oxford, where he graduated as a First Class in Classics in 1852, and D.C.L. in 1859; he was nominated in 1859 High Steward of the University of Oxford. Was president of the Society of Antiquaries in 1878; is a pro-Grand Master of the Freemasons. Was Under-Secretary for the Colonies from 1858 to 1859, and was Secretary for the Colonies from 1866 to 1867, and from 1874 to 1878. His Lordship resigned office twice on account of differences with his colleagues on matters of policy—in 1867 in relation to Mr. Disraeli's Reform Bill, and in 1878, upon the order to the Fleet to proceed through the Dardanelles. Been twice married; the present Countess of Carnarvon (married in 1878) is eldest daughter of the late Henry Howard, Esq., of Greystone Castle, Cumberland.

The Earl of Harrowby, Dudley Francis Stewart Ryder, third Earl, was born Jan. 16, 1831, was educated at Harrow and at Christ Church, Oxford. He was M.P. for Lichfield from 1856 to 1859, and for Liverpool (as Lord Sandon) from 1865 to 1882, when he succeeded to the title. Was Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education from 1874 to 1878, and President of the Board of Trade from 1878 to 1880. Married, in 1861, Lady Mary Cecil, daughter of the second Marquis of Exeter.

Sir Hardinge Stanley Giffard, who will take a Peerage as Lord Chancellor, was born in 1825, and was educated at Merton College, Oxford; was called to the Bar in 1850, at the Inner Temple, went the South Wales circuit, and became Q.C. 1865; appointed chairman of the Carmarthenshire Quarter Sessions 1873. Was first elected M.P. for Launceston in March, 1877; having unsuccessfully contested Cardiff (November, 1868, and February, 1874), Launceston (May, 1874), and Horsham (1876). Was Solicitor-General from November, 1875, when he received the honour of knighthood, till April, 1880.

The four-days' Lawn-Tennis Tournament at Leamington concluded yesterday week, when the Mayor, Alderman Flavel, presented the prizes to winners on the lawn of the Manor House Hotel, in the presence of a fashionable company.

At a meeting of the Bristol Bishopric Endowment Fund on Monday, it was stated that a friend, whose name was not to be mentioned, had offered to give £10,000, provided £20,000 are raised within two years.

THE SILENT MEMBER.

The Marquis of Salisbury was, perhaps, not unwise after all in taking a long breath before he definitively accepted the difficult task her Majesty intrusted to him on receiving the resignation of Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues. The noble Marquis, in parleying with the Ministers who displayed such alacrity in shuffling off the coil of responsibilities and difficulties they had accumulated in their five years of office, unmistakably gained time to marshal his ideas and choose his Ministers. From this point of view, not altogether wasted has been the interregnum during which Mr. Gladstone has filled an anomalous position, and was at last persuaded to promise a benevolently neutral attitude to the incoming Government.

It is true, the "marking-time" interval witnessed one error of judgment. When an exceptionally large gathering of the Lords met on Friday week to learn whether the Marquis of Salisbury had surmounted the difficulties in his way, his Lordship had only to say that the arrangements had not been concluded, but he seized the opportunity to spring a surprise on the House. He had suddenly detected an irregularity in the Redistribution Bill. He gravely and earnestly warned noble Lords, in the clear, ringing tones which might well be generally adopted, that this was the first time in history that, supposing the Redistribution Bill were passed, the Sovereign would be deprived of her Constitutional right to dissolve for some months—in point of fact till November next. His Lordship, alarmed by this suppositious infringement of the Constitution, prayed their Lordships to refrain from dealing with the Commons' amendments to the measure till Tuesday, to which date the House was adjourned after a division—but not before the Earl of Kimberley, speaking with unwonted force, had indulged in a rhetorical protest addressed more to the constituencies without the walls of the House of Lords than the noble assemblage within. As portending a threatened delay of a measure of just and rational representation the country has set its heart on securing, this ingenious but injudicious plea of the noble Marquis was as unwise, as a matter of Party tactics, as the disqualification of the county householders whose misfortune it has been to accept hospital relief. Each has given demagogues a strong argument to use in favour of a reconstitution of the House of Lords.

Tuesday saw the Ministerial crisis, happily, ended. The House of Lords was remarkably full. The Ministerial bench was still occupied by Earl Granville, the Earl of Derby, Lord Northbrook, Lord Rosebery, and one or two other ex-Ministers. But there was an overwhelming Conservative phalanx opposite, the front Opposition bench being thronged by the Duke of Richmond, Lord Cranbrook, the Earl of Harrowby, Earl Cadogan, and other Conservative leaders, Lord Lathom holding genial converse with one or the other. The Prince of Wales occupied his usual seat on the front cross-bench. Conspicuous by his absence was the Marquis of Salisbury. He was away on a visit to her Majesty at Windsor. On his behalf, Earl Granville explaining that the noble Marquis had accepted office, moved the adjournment till Thursday. This was agreed to, after the Commons' amendments to the Redistribution Bill had been sanctioned, and the measure passed. The brilliant assemblage of Peers and Peeresses had really assisted at an important historic sitting; but the proceedings were actually tame in the extreme.

The brief sitting of the Commons on Tuesday passed off nearly as quietly. The goodly gathering of retiring Ministers on the front Opposition bench comprised Mr. Gladstone (with a white flower in his buttonhole), Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Childers, Lord R. Grosvenor, the Marquis of Hartington, and Sir Charles Dilke. Lord Randolph Churchill was absent from his accustomed seat at the corner of the front bench below the gangway, Sir H. Drummond-Wolff representing him. The front Opposition bench was saved from emptiness by the courteous Conservative "whips," Sir W. Hart-Dyke and Mr. Rowland Winn, by the Lord Mayor and Mr. Bourke. Mr. Gladstone, speaking literally by the book, for he held a Parliamentary handbook while he spoke, sonorously informed the crowded House that the Marquis of Salisbury was in the throes of Cabinet-making, and moved the adjournment till Wednesday afternoon at five, when the writs for the re-election of Ministers would be applied for. Neither Mr. Jesse Collings nor Mr. Henry Labouchere was wholly satisfied with the parting utterance of the Prime Minister (who was warmly cheered by a muster of Liberals assuredly strong enough to have voted Mr. Gladstone back to office had that course been desirable). But both were speedily reassured. Mr. Labouchere was informed by Mr. Gladstone that he had not bartered the liberty of debate in his communications with the incoming Prime Minister. Mr. Jesse Collings was relieved by the assurance that no agreement had been come to to pass over his Elections Medical Relief Bill. Hence the last sitting of the Gladstone Administration passed off smoothly—Mr. Bradlaugh being under the Peers' Gallery to smile a benediction, as he was present—very much present—at the commencement of the present Parliament.

Some of the familiar faces of the House of Commons are delineated in the large Drawing by Mr. Lucien Darwin, issued as a Supplement with the current Number of THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. As it is pretty certain the places of many hon. members and right hon. gentlemen will know them no longer in the next Parliament, this pictorial record of several of the leading spirits of the late Liberal Government may be deemed of interest. The hardest workers of the talented Mr. Gladstone surrounded himself with will be recognised in the Illustration. The Artist has given Mr. Gladstone himself a harder mouth than he has; but the late Prime Minister will be easily identified nevertheless in the central group, including also Mr. John Bright, and Mr. Childers, the financial authority whose Budget brought about the defeat of his Government. The likeness of Sir William Harcourt is good; and fairly faithful is the clearly-cut face of Mr. Chamberlain, who is likely to occupy a commanding position in the next Liberal Ministry. Pretty true to life also are the counterfeit presentments of Mr. G. O. Trevelyan, another great Minister of the future, Sir Henry James, Mr. Forster, Lord E. Fitzmaurice, Sir Thomas Brassey, and the Marquis of Hartington (as much as is shown of the noble Marquis, a very probable Prime Minister of the future), but his best friends would only know the figure of Mr. Labouchere after close study.

The Rugby School speeches and distribution of prizes took place last Saturday in the Townhall, in the presence of a large and fashionable audience.

At Nottingham on Monday, in the presence of many thousands of spectators, new colours were presented to the 4th Battalion Derbyshire Regiment. The colours were the gift of the Duchess of St. Albans.

The public dinner of the Statistical Society was held on Tuesday evening at the Criterion Restaurant, and was attended by a large number of distinguished British and foreign statisticians.

THE NEW

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL, M.P.
SECRETARY FOR INDIA.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE (EARL OF IDDESLEIGH).
FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY

THE MARQUIS OF PRIME MINISTER AND

SIR RICHARD ASSHETON CROSS, G.C.B., M.P.

LEAFY JUNE.

What so fair as a day in June? asks the poet; and, looking out at the wondrous expanse of verdure before us, we answer, "Nothing"; and feel very sure that there will be none bold enough to contradict us; for even those whose one idea of June is London and the Season have sufficient cause for agreeing with us, if they see nought save the park and the square-gardens around which their tents are pitched.

The wonderful foliage, unnipped by frost, and nurtured and cherished by the churlish tears of an angry May, has never looked better than it does at this moment; even the prosaic gardens aforementioned are beautiful with lilacs, red, pink, and white may, gueldre roses, and the golden flash of the laburnums—"dropping wells of fire"; while every breeze that floats softly in through the white-curtained windows is laden with a thousand scents, all redolent of country lanes, and suggestive of anything save the treadmill of society, that is being so gallantly worked by its votaries in this the very loveliest month in the whole year; when Kensington Gardens, with its wealth of greenery, its song-birds, its occasional cuckoo, its silences (only broken by the never-ceasing subtle murmur, like a distant ground-sea) and its shades, offers sufficient country, should they turn away from the streets for a little while, and endeavour to see for a moment what the "real country" must be looking like now the flower-girls' baskets are heaped with pinks and pale roses, and the days are long and sweet, and suggestive of cool river-shadows and rich grasses, in which the cattle stand knee-deep, motionless, save for an occasional flick of the tail when the flies are more than ordinarily troublesome and disturbing.

But not even in Kensington Gardens can we see all that leafy June means to those who are courageous enough to go for a while farther afield, eager to note for themselves what the earth is like a little way away from the haunts of men: where, bursting upon us like a revelation, the scene unfolds itself before us, and we comprehend in a moment how much we have forgotten since last we and June met face to face in a quiet corner of England.

Standing on a vantage-ground, we look absorbed and delighted, speechlessly and wonderingly, as we recognise that the whole wide common, where the south-west breeze is rollicking gaily, is one mass of brilliant, glittering gold—here a deeper saffron hue, where the gorse is blooming; there a pale amber, where the graceful broom hangs its drooping head as it contemplates the carpet of yellow flowers beneath it, caused by its blossoms falling and fading among butter-cups and dandelions, all different shades of the same colour; while in a distant hollow the young oak foliage is a golden hue, too, contrasting forcibly and beautifully with the dense dark chestnut-trees, that appear almost black, so full are their leafy crowns with broad foliage trimmed here and there with great clusters of pink or white flowers, that are magnificent enough to be gathered to decorate my lady's chamber.

June is most certainly the time to notice how each tree that flowers—and indeed there are few, if any, that do not—has put out his claim to notice. The sycamore, with his broad indented foliage, has lighter-coloured "bunches of keys" hanging under the leaves; the nut-trees have their flowers; and of course all the world can see the chestnuts, and the beautiful hawthorn, which is like a dense sheet of snow or else a ruddy flush, suggestive of sunrise and broadening light in some distant garden in the country; while the copper beech shows his burnished foliage, relieving the eye, that may possibly be sated by the green-and-gold arrangements of colour that Dame Nature has provided for us. So few people ever see the country in June, that we are more than tempted to dilate on all they lose, to remind them of all they have never seen, most likely, since they were quite small children. Who walks now in the "walled garden," for example, which was the very El Dorado of one's young days? Yet few words will bring back the recollection of the gooseberry-trees, with their green and acrid fruit, bitten, with such sad results, to see if they were never going to become ripe again; of the bushes with the pale transparent tiny currants beginning to turn red; and with the gorgeous rows of blue and yellow and white iris, its occasional rose-tree, and its four old yellow-red and green walls, trimmed with lichens, crowned by self-sown snap-dragons and wall-flowers, and given over to slugs and snails, that "lay low" there until such time as those anxiously watched plums and peaches began to ripen, when they emerged from their seclusion and came down to demolish our hopes at one fell swoop;—or who recollects the first stolen joys of a day's fishing all alone, when the tiny creeping stream was one mass of glittering snowy crow's-foot, and the edge was hidden perilously by vast bunches of yellow marsh-marigolds, or king-cups, and by tall pale marguerites, and a hundred different sorts of grasses, brown or black and pale grey, in which the wind always whispered so mysteriously, and seemed to hint at evil consequences should our day of pleasure ever have to be accounted for to the higher powers?

Even among the roar and rush of London, a single note of a bird can conjure up a thousand pictures, all stored away in one's memory, and remind one of a thousand beauties one has forgotten; in a moment, we see the swifts darting and sweeping round the grey square tower of a church, shrieking in the way that obtains for them their nick-name of "screech-owls," and that prophesies a continuance of fine weather. We hear the corn-crake among the meadows, or a lark—poor caged minstrel!—in some upper window breaks his heart with singing in captivity, but gives us, at the same time, a reminder of days when we were as free as was his country prototype, and when June was nothing save a procession of pictures—a pageant expressly made for us by Summer's hand—by Summer herself, who could never do too much to amuse and delight us.

After all, with very little trouble, leafy June may become a reality to anyone. An hour, or less, in the train, and the silence and golden glories of the common may be the property of us all. Before we can realise that the streets are left behind, we are free among the flowers and the lovely trees; we can see whole rows of patient folk tending strawberries and flowers for our use to-morrow in London; or we can be quite alone, a chorus of thrushes and blackbirds to give us welcome, and the perfect, marvellous, indescribable wealth of June at our feet and around us, reminding us that, after all, there are few things so beautiful as our own English country-side at this the most lovely time of the year.

An enthusiastic welcome was given to Sir Peter Lumsden on Monday night at a large and distinguished gathering of the Royal Geographical Society, before whom he read an elaborate paper descriptive of the country north of Herat. He gave an interesting description of the geography of the Murghab Valley and the customs of its people; and quoted a singular account of two lakes of solid salt covered with an inch or two of water, over which Captain Yate and his party rode on horse-back. The Marquis of Lorne presided; and amongst the speakers who took part in the discussion was M. Lessar.—At the last meeting of the Zoological Society a letter was read from Sir Peter Lumsden giving details of the capture of two young snow leopards sent down from the Afghan frontier to Quettah, and intended for the society's collection.

THE BRITISH CHESS ASSOCIATION.

The management and the competitors are, alike, to be congratulated on the rapid and harmonious progress of the principal tourney of the first meeting of this association. The first meeting was, necessarily, a broken one, partly from the preliminary formalities of the inauguration and partly from the half-holiday on the occasion of the inaugural banquet; nevertheless, at the end of it the results of 54 of the 120 games to be played were recorded on the score sheet. Since our last report of the proceedings, the most notable incidents of the tourney are, Mr. Gunsberg's rush to the front, Mr. Bird's consequent retirement to the second place, and Mr. Donnisthorpe's defeat by Mr. Rumboll, of Bath. Mr. Gunsberg's success is due to his display of his correctness, steadiness, and ingenuity of play, and Mr. Bird's retirement is the consequence of his being unusually deficient in all these qualities on the day appointed for his battle with Mr. Gunsberg. We shall hope for that day only, for since then his course of success has been renewed and continued without interruption down to the time of writing. In Mr. Donnisthorpe's case we had a repetition of the Kieseritzky incident of the 1851 tourney, for he lost his Queen by a forked check from Mr. Rumboll's Knight, and thereafter had no resource save that last resource of philosophic minds—"resignation." Appended is the score of the competitors up to Monday night, the 22nd inst., and for a better understanding of it we remind our readers that each competitor has to play fifteen games in all, and that drawn games count half a point to each side.

	GAMES. Played.	Won.		GAMES. Played.	Won.
Gunsberg ...	9	9	Loman ...	6	3½
Bird ...	10	8½	Wainwright ...	6	3½
Donnisthorpe ...	10	6	Hewitt ...	6	3
Pollock ...	10	6	Reeves ...	6	3
MacDonnell ...	6	4½	Rumboll ...	9	2
Guest ...	5	4	Mills ...	7	1½
Mortimer ...	10	4	Mackeson ...	8	0½
De Soyres ...	11	4	Rabson ...	7	0

The competition for the prizes presented by Lord Tennyson and Mr. Ruskin was commenced on Monday last, and a game in each tourney was scored by Mr. Pollock and Mr. Mortimer respectively.

The inaugural banquet was held at "Simpson's" on the 19th inst., Mr. F. H. Lewis presiding on the occasion. He was supported by about thirty members of the association, including representatives of the "Federated Clubs." After the usual loyal toasts, there followed, the "British Chess Association," proposed by Mr. J. I. Minchin and responded to by Mr. Hewitt; the "Chess Masters," coupled with the name of Mr. Bird; the "Federated Clubs," to which Mr. Ashton replied for the metropolitan, and Mr. Walton, of Birmingham, for the provincial clubs; Major Verney replied for the players of "Four-Handed Chess." Mr. Woodgate proposed the "Chess Press," coupled with the names of Messrs. Duffy, MacDonnell, Hoffer, and Gunsberg, for which compliment all four returned thanks. The remainder of the evening was devoted to conversation and music. Among the exponents of the latter was the popular tenor vocalist, Mr. Henry Walsham, who delighted the members by his rendering of "Annie Laurie" and other Scotch ballads.

We regret that owing to unusual pressure on our space we are obliged to defer the Game to next week.

Mr. T. D. Sullivan, M.P., is to be Lord Mayor of Dublin for 1886, having been selected by the Nationalists, who constitute two thirds of the members of the Corporation.

A remarkably comprehensive and cheap Illustrated Narrative of the War in the Soudan, entitled "Gordon and the Mahdi," has been published by Messrs. Vizetelly and Co. For one shilling is presented a profusely illustrated history of the Soudan, from the period of its conquest by Mehemet Ali to the assassination of the heroic defender of Khartoum. The hundred engravings comprise the most interesting War Illustrations that have appeared in this Journal, a clear Map of the Soudan, portraits of the Mahdi, the late General Gordon, Hicks Pasha, General Sir Herbert Stewart, Colonel Burnaby, General Earle, Colonel Stewart, Mr. Cameron, and Ismail Pasha, in the return of whom as Khedive to Cairo is held out hope of the future pacification of Egypt and the Soudan. Regarded simply as a panorama of War in the desert land in which so many brave Englishmen have found a grave, and which many millions of treasure have been sunk, "Gordon and the Mahdi" is likely to be a popular handbook. When it is added that the hundred and sixty richly embellished pages offer a carefully compiled story of General Gordon's first masterly administration of the Soudan as Governor-General, of his fight against the Slave-Trade, of the rise of the Mahdi, the annihilation of Hicks Pasha's army, the sanguinary battles near Souakim, and the gallant but fruitless Nile Expedition of Lord Wolseley to rescue General Gordon, enough has been said to prove that this wonderfully good shilling's-worth should command a wide sale.

THE COURT.

Her Majesty on Saturday last entered the forty-ninth year of her reign, having ascended the Throne on June 20, 1837. Divine service was performed on Sunday morning in the presence of the Queen, Princess Beatrice, the Princess of Leiningen, and several members of her Majesty's household, in the Royal Mausoleum at Frogmore, by the Very Rev. Randall Davidson, Dean of Windsor, who afterwards officiated in the private chapel at the castle at twelve o'clock. An official order has been issued for Court mourning until the 30th inst. for the late Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia. The Princess of Leiningen took leave of her Majesty on Monday afternoon, and left the castle at four o'clock for Kensington Palace, on a visit to Princess Louise, Marchioness of Lorne. The Queen and Princess Beatrice drove out in the afternoon; and her Majesty drove to Frogmore on Tuesday morning with the Princess.

The marriage service at the wedding of Princess Beatrice and Prince Henry of Battenberg, which takes place on Thursday, July 23, at Whippingham church, will be read by the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of Winchester. Princess Beatrice and Prince Henry, after their marriage, will stay for a time at Quarr Abbey, the residence of Lady Cochrane.

Last Saturday afternoon the Prince of Wales visited the Windsor Cavalry Barracks, and was present at a party given by the officers of the 2nd Life Guards at the close of the festivities of the Ascot week. The Prince and Princess, who have been staying at Easthampstead Park, Bracknell, Berks, during the Ascot race-week, left Windsor on Monday morning for London. The Prince and Princess, accompanied by Prince Albert Victor and Princess Louise, were present at a ball given by Lord and Lady Carrington at their residence in Whitehall in the evening. Prince Albert Victor, attended by the Rev. J. N. Dalton, arrived at Marlborough House on the termination of his studies at Trinity College, Cambridge. It is announced that "the Rev. J. N. Dalton, C.M.G., who acted as governor to the Prince until the latter attained his majority, in January last, and who continued with him at Cambridge, has now, on the termination of his Royal Highness's University career, retired, after upwards of fourteen years' faithful service as tutor and governor." The Prince and Princess Albert Victor witnessed the opera "Lakmé," at the Gaiety Theatre, in the evening. The Prince, attended by Colonel Clarke, was present on Tuesday afternoon at a meeting at the Mansion House in aid of the Beaumont Trust Fund, and moved the first resolution. The Lord Mayor presided. His Royal Highness afterwards went to the House of Lords. The Prince and Princess, accompanied by Prince Albert Victor, dined with the French Ambassador and Madame Waddington at the Embassy, at Albert-gate.

The Duchess of Edinburgh, who opened a bazaar on Monday afternoon at Brixton-rise, left town in the evening for Germany, viâ Queenborough and Flushing. The Duke, who remains in town for the present, accompanied the Duchess to the railway terminus.

CITY ECHOES.

There has been no perceptible diminution in the amount of cash seeking employment, and rates to borrowers have continued extremely low, advances for short periods being obtained at the nominal figure of five shillings per cent per annum, while for best three months' draughts the discount charges have been usually ⅝ to ¾ per cent. Several fresh loans have been launched, and others are looked for, but so far they have had practically no effect upon the value of money, and in the meantime more gold has been arriving from the Australian Colonies, while next month the supply of money will be largely increased by the dividends on Consols and on foreign loans. Stock Exchange business, however, does not appear to benefit much from this excessive cheapness of money, any prospect of increasing animation being for the time checked by the dead-lock in politics. First-class investment stocks have shown decided firmness, and a feature of interest has been the demand which has prevailed for Chinese loans. American railways are considerably higher, and arrangements to end the war of rates are talked of, but nothing definite has been done yet. Home railway dividend prospects are being estimated, and the conclusions are not encouraging.

A further falling off in the dividend is announced by the Imperial Ottoman Bank, 8 per cent being paid for the past year, compared with 10 per cent for 1883, and 15 for 1881 and for 1882. For the two years 1879 and 1880, 5 per cent per annum was distributed, while for the three preceding years the shareholders received nothing. For the second half of the year 1884 the Colonial Bank pays 10 per cent, or the same rate as for the first half of that year. For the year ended May last the Distillers' Company will pay 12½ per cent, compared with 14 for 1883-4. The Marine Insurance Company's dividend for the past year is maintained at £1 17s. 6d. per share.

Western Australia has succeeded in placing a 4 per cent loan for £525,000 on what may be called satisfactory terms, the whole being taken at an average rate of £98 2s. 6d. per cent, the tenders ranging from the minimum of £97 10s. to £101. Amongst the Australian colonies Western Australia has made about the least progress, although lately it has received a little more attention, the result has been that the loans have not always gone off satisfactorily. In July, 1883, tenders were invited for £254,000 in 4 per cent bonds, but only £100,000 was applied for, the minimum on that occasion being £96 10s. per cent. The remaining £154,000 was, however, successfully placed in March of last year at £97 1s. and above.

A Dominion of Canada loan for £4,000,000 in 4 per cent sterling bonds is before the public. Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co., and Messrs. Glyn, Mills, Currie, and Co. being authorised to receive tenders up to Monday next. The minimum price has been fixed at £99 per cent, and the principal is to be repaid in London within the year 1910 and 1935 upon the Government giving six months' notice. The money is required to meet the charges in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, the granting of subsidies for railway purposes, and to provide for the construction of public works.

By a further payment of £2 10s., the dividend of the Australian Agricultural Company for the year 1884 is made up to £5 per share, which compares with £4 10s. for 1883, £2 3s. for 1882, and £1 12s. 6d. for 1881.

With the defeat of the Opposition amendment, another stage has been reached in regard to the resolutions before the Dominion Parliament for readjusting the relations between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The bill may now be regarded as safe.

T. S.

Field-Marshal Lord Napier of Magdala reviewed the Metropolitan Engineer Volunteers last Saturday evening in Regent's Park, in the presence of a large assemblage of spectators. The brigade numbered nearly 1000 officers and men. Besides the above-mentioned corps some 6000 men were out on Saturday evening for inspection or brigade drill.

GORDON'S JOURNALS AT KHARTOUM.

No publication has been awaited with more eager interest than this, which Messrs. Kegan Paul, Trench, and Co., of Paternoster-square, have lost no time in giving to the world since the manuscript materials, sent home by the British military authorities in the Soudan, were placed in the hands of General Gordon's family. The chosen editor was Mr. A. Egmont Hake, a nephew of General Gordon and a literary man of some experience, who had already produced acceptable memoirs of that romantic and illustrious career which will certainly be of classic celebrity among the British Worthies of every generation. Mr. Hake's last contribution, the second volume of "The Story of Chinese Gordon," published by Messrs. Remington and Co. since the lamented death of the hero was known, should by this time have found acceptance with a multitude of readers, as a truthful and spirited narrative of the events in the Soudan, concerning Gordon personally, from the destruction of Hicks Pasha's army in November, 1883, to the capture of Khartoum and the slaughter of its heroic defender, on Jan. 26 this year. It was known that Gordon had written a journal during the siege of Khartoum; but whether this would be permitted to see the light seemed for some time to be uncertain, and several questions were asked in Parliament about its disposal. Six volumes or parts of the Diary, kept by Gordon from Sept. 10 to Dec. 14, were sent by him from Khartoum to Metammeh, when his steam-boats went down, and were delivered on Jan. 22 to Sir Charles Wilson, then commanding the advanced British force after Sir Herbert Stewart was wounded. A preceding Diary, kept by Colonel J. D. Stewart from March 1 to Sept. 9, is unfortunately lost or is now in the possession of the Mahdi, having been taken by the Arabs who murdered Stewart on Sept. 18 between Berber and Abou Hamed. Gordon's journal was sent to England by Lord Wolseley; and, having been examined by our Government, was handed over to Sir Henry Gordon, the writer's brother, who arranged with Messrs. Kegan Paul and Co. for its publication. Sir Henry tells us, in one of the prefatory notes, that only six or seven pages, containing no matter of public interest, have been omitted; but it was General Gordon's express wish that his Diary should be "pruned down," and we perceive that some names of persons are left blank, though it is not difficult to guess who is meant in his censures of British Ministers, diplomatists, and other well-known official folk. We do not entirely agree with these censures; nor can we adopt, in every respect, the views of Mr. Egmont Hake, in his introductory chapter, with reference to the policy of our Government in the Soudan and its responsibility for all the acts and declarations of General Gordon. Mistakes were made, unhappily, on several occasions in the course of these affairs, but not altogether on the side of the British Government; and the future historian will judge more fairly and impartially than most of the contemporary speakers and writers have been able to do.

The Journal now printed, filling nearly four hundred pages (exclusive of lengthy documents in the appendices) is highly characteristic of Gordon, and abounds with his original comments and remarks, as well as with anecdotes and incidents of his situation at Khartoum. It begins on Sept. 10, the day when Colonel Stewart, with Mr. Frank Power and M. Herbin, left Khartoum for Berber, by steam-boat, on their way to Dongola. At that time, the Mahdi with his army was at Rahad, about two hundred miles from Khartoum. The city, in which there were 34,000 people, was blockaded and deprived of supplies by gathering bands of hostile tribes. Gordon says, "I do not call our enemy rebels, but Arabs: for it is a vexed question whether we are not rebels, seeing I hold the firman restoring the Soudan to its chiefs." He observes, further, "There is scarcely one great family of the Soudan, families who can trace their pedigree for five hundred years, who have not accepted Mahomet Achmet as Mahdi, to save their property." The people of Khartoum, he states, had every possible facility to leave the city, but they persisted in clinging to it. The problem to be solved was the safe removal of the Egyptian garrisons of Khartoum and Sennaar, and of the refugees, not belonging to the country. It was for this purpose that Gordon determined to await the attack of the Mahdi at Khartoum, hoping to defeat him there, after which he thought the only way to deal with the country was "to let the Turks come in," or to send up Zebehr Pasha, giving him a subsidy of £100,000 a year. It is notorious that her Majesty's Government did not approve of either of these courses, but wished Gordon, if possible, to bring the garrisons away before the Mahdi could arrive near Khartoum. Gordon found that this was impossible, unless a British military expedition came up to Berber, in which case he would have endeavoured to send down the garrisons and refugees to that place. He had, in fact, no means of transport except on the river, and could not think of a march across the Desert. This we believe was his real difficulty, which was not understood in England during the summer and autumn months, when his communications with Government were cut off. At the same time, in the judgment of the best military authorities knowing the Soudan and its climate, a British expedition could not have been sent to Berber in summer. Hence the failure of the plans for the intended evacuation of the Soudan.

When General Gordon was informed of Lord Wolseley's expedition, he resented with great indignation, as was natural, the idea that it was sent for his own personal deliverance. He insists, over and over again, in this journal, that it should undertake the safe return of the garrisons and refugees. Not to execute this purpose, to which he felt pledged in honour, seems to him the "meanest and shabbiest" conduct, and he expresses the strongest contempt for everybody in office who does not think as he does. He forgets that the purpose was originally formed and announced when Government had been led, partly by his representations, to believe that the garrisons and refugees could easily be withdrawn in March or April, without the aid of a military expedition. Our Government had not intended, and had certainly never promised, to extend its efforts for their relief to the use of warlike means; it had not undertaken an unlimited and unconditional responsibility for their safety. But General Gordon, in a very chivalrous spirit, had personally assumed this responsibility, and he expected Ministers to find the means of fulfilling his pledges, which went far beyond the instructions he had received.

It is unnecessary here to quote the many severe and angry reflections in which this brave man relieved his vexed spirit during the painful crisis of affairs at Khartoum, when he had no care or thought of danger to himself. The Mahdi did not arrive to lay close siege to Khartoum until the middle of October, after which period the situation of Gordon became more threatening. He makes a note on the 13th of that month, "It is of course on the cards that Khartoum is taken under the nose of the expeditionary force, which will be just too late;" a prophecy too well verified by the result. But he had a garrison of more than eight thousand fighting men, twelve guns, eleven steamers, 21,000 rounds of artillery ammunition, and above two million rounds for the rifles, with store of grain and biscuit for several months; but very little money, except in paper. He expected the advanced force of the British army to reach Khartoum about the 15th of November; we know that to have been impossible, and we believe that Lord Wolseley did not lose any time, but Gordon could not be aware of the difficulties of transport up the Nile with a large regular force. For his own part, he was longing to get out of the Soudan, to retire from the British service, and not to live in England, but to devote the remainder of his life to the work for which he had engaged on the Congo. His recommendation for the future settlement of the Soudan was either to transfer it to the Sultan of Turkey, with a subsidy of two millions sterling, or to appoint Zebehr Pasha as Governor, with half a million paid down and a large yearly allowance. "In both cases," he observes, "the slave trade will flourish." He was utterly opposed to establishing British rule in the Soudan, and equally to its continuing a province of Egypt; and, in the event of Khartoum being taken by the Mahdi, he thought it would be useless to retake it, or to waste life and money in carrying on the campaign. These were Gordon's deliberate opinions within three months of his death.

The final siege of the city does not appear to have been fairly begun until November, as the Mahdi was extremely slow in his operations. There had been much desultory fighting in the previous months, and nearly a thousand of the garrison, altogether, had been killed; but Khartoum had never been in immediate peril of capture by force. "We have had a truly wearisome time for 241 days," writes Gordon on Nov. 8; but he records again the same determination, "that I will not leave here until everyone who wants to go down is given the chance to do so." The first serious conflict with the Mahdi's proper army was on the 12th, when Gordon's steamers and forts were opposed to a large force of the enemy supported by artillery at Omdurman. He was led, by their style of fighting, to suspect that some of them were the former Egyptian regular troops captured in Kordofan and Darfur. The repeated engagements on the White Nile became a matter of anxiety, since the Mahdi's army, with his guns and shells, was very different from the mere horde of savages which had gathered in May on the other side of Khartoum. They had boats to cross the river, and Gordon became anxious for his little steamers, which now and then got aground. The daily narrative from this time has greater military interest, and the attempts to save Omdurman Fort, on the further bank of the Nile, the capture of which by the Mahdi proved ultimately fatal, continue to the latest date in the Journal. The Mahdi's army was estimated at 25,000 men, part of them regular troops, under skilled officers, of whom several were Europeans. General Gordon had now not so much leisure to write lengthy disquisitions on the conduct of Government, and on the inconsistency and irrationality of English public opinion, or to adorn his pages with caricature portraits of the diplomatic agents at Cairo. His great ability as a soldier, his amazing personal energy and industry, and his genius for command were now called into perpetual activity; and the last two months of the siege, by all accounts, witnessed marvellous efforts of defensive warfare.

It would appear, from all that we read in this Journal or that we have learnt elsewhere, likely enough that Gordon might have prolonged the defence successfully till the full relieving force under Lord Wolseley could have reached Khartoum, but for the treachery of his subordinate officers, and the disaffection of the black Soudanese troops. These were the best fighting soldiers of the garrison; the Cairo Bashi-bazouks, the Egyptian fellaheen, and the Shaggiyeh Arabs being of a very cowardly temper. Gordon could not rely upon any of his officers after the departure of Colonel Stewart; he stood alone as an Englishman and Christian, the few remaining Europeans in Khartoum being persons from whom he could seek no assistance; and there was probably a conspiracy of fanatical Mohammedans to betray him, existing some weeks before the tragedy of Jan. 26. They might have readily compassed his assassination, if they had so resolved, without awaiting the treasonable compact with the Mahdi after the surrender of Omdurman; and it may be that this would have taken place at the approach of the British Army. Gordon himself was not suspicious of treachery among those under his command; but, even if he had been apprehensive of it, he might have had no means of guarding against it. To the latest date in his Journal, Dec. 14, there seems to have been very little direct mischief done in Khartoum by the incessant fire of the enemy; and the fortifications, if properly defended, could scarcely have been taken by assault. The rapid decrease of the store of food was by far the most alarming circumstance in Gordon's apparent position; and he writes on that day, "Now, mark this, if the expeditionary force does not come in ten days, the town may fall, and I have done my best for the honour of our country. Good-bye.—C. G. GORDON." He had not the slightest fear of death, on his own account, and he felt worried and disgusted with the miscarriage of his generous enterprise, and with the perverseness and baseness of many people he had had to deal with. Some of his judgments may appear to us mistaken, and his sentiments upon some occasions much overstrained; but his was a very peculiar mind. This volume will be perused with deep interest, and will probably draw forth renewed comment upon the topics which are fresh in public recollection; but it has not altered, in our own mind, the opinions already formed with regard to those transactions. The mission of General Gordon to Khartoum last year was ill-advised from its beginning, as neither he, nor the Ministers in London, nor the Ministers at Cairo, had a decided plan of action. It was left to his own discretion what he should do at Khartoum; but he was not entitled to make the Governments of Egypt and of Great Britain adopt his views with regard to external action on their part, the appointment of Zebehr, or the sending of troops to Berber, which had never been contemplated between Gordon and those authorities. The bitter reproaches cast upon eminent English officials for declining to put themselves entirely under Gordon's directions seem to be quite uncalled-for; he may or may not have been always in the right upon particular measures; but, in his general notions of the degree of authority with which he had been invested, Gordon was frequently much in the wrong. He was a real hero, nevertheless, whose memory will be cherished in the esteem of his countrymen and of mankind.

Mr. H. F. Frost gave a lecture on "Tristan und Isolde," last Tuesday evening, at 26, Leinster-gardens. Musical illustrations from the opera were excellently rendered by Mr. J. S. Shedlock on the pianoforte. The next meeting is fixed for July 17, when Miss Alma Murray will give a dramatic reading.

A thoughtful paper, by Dr. Jabez Hogg, in the current number of the Journal of Science reminds us of one favourite occupation Mr. Gladstone is not unlikely to resume when the time is ripe for his long-threatened retirement from the cares of Parliamentary life. In marshalling his reasons for declaring "Homer Colour-Blind," Dr. Hogg claims Mr. Gladstone among the Homeric authorities who support his theory. Will Mr. Gladstone be tempted to break fresh ground in this direction? Of high repute as an oculist, Dr. Hogg aptly improves the occasion in another publication, it may be stated, by showing in an article on "Colour-Blindness in the Mercantile Marine" how widespread is the ignorance of colours among those who would be sailors.

PARISIAN SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

Paris, Tuesday, June 23.

Although the date of the general elections has not yet been fixed, the campaign is already morally opened. Candidates are coming forward, programmes are being published, and public opinion is awakening to the importance of the struggle. The new system of voting by the scrutin de liste, instead of by isolated districts, will give results which none can foresee; it will give to the Republic the final consecration of the population, unhampered by official candidatures; or, as the Conservatives expect, it will give them such a proportion of representatives as will enable them to hope some day to overthrow the Republic. The scrutin de liste places the elections above merely local questions, nullifies local influence, and renders Governmental interference very difficult. Above all, it permits the scattered units of opinion to join and form a force. Whether in the large towns or in a department, the reactionaries can mass their votes; whereas, under the old system of the scrutin d'arrondissement, the reactionaries, being in a minority generally in each separate district, had no chance whatever; their efforts were necessarily isolated, and of no avail. The forthcoming elections, whatever may be their material result, will have, therefore, a great moral result: they will enable public opinion to form a current and Conservative France, to separate itself distinctly from Republican France. For the first time, the Republic will really be submitted to a plébiscite.

How the electoral platform will finally present itself before the country, we cannot say beforehand. No group and no chief can circumscribe the field of battle, for the new system of voting will produce powerful currents of opinion which will pass over personal ambitions, coteries, coalitions, and party cries. The affranchised universal suffrage will probably attach more importance to ideas than to persons. However, the programmes are being prepared on all sides by Conservatives, Bonapartists, Radicals. The most important programme yet published is that of the two most advanced groups of the Chamber—the Extreme Left and the Radical Left; and it is worth noticing that this document is severely criticised alike by the Moderate Republicans and the Irreconcileable Radicals: the former point out the vagueness of this transformed Radicalism; the latter, at the same time, scoff at its timidity, and look upon it as a manner of abdication. In short, the immediate result of this programme has been to diminish and isolate the Radical party.

Meanwhile, the Chamber has begun, with no little ferocity, the discussion of the Budget—that delicate subject which will give the Conservatives the much-coveted opportunity of revealing to the country the immensity of the financial deficit. The communication of the text of the peace with China, which has to be ratified by the Chamber, has also furnished an occasion for airing the question of colonial policy. Thus, during the present week two of the great points on which the elections will turn are brought before the Chamber and before the country.

The ceremony of the reception of M. Victor Duruy at the French Academy last Thursday derived a certain piquancy, from the fact that the Academician who received him beneath the dome of the Institute, Mgr. Perraud, Bishop of Autun, endeavoured to convert M. Duruy to Christianity. M. Duruy is a man, a writer, and a thinker of no mean order; as Minister under the Empire, he was a great reformer of public instruction in France; his history of Rome, from the foundation to the death of Theodosius, is a monument which the French can oppose to the work of Mommsen. Mgr. Perraud certainly admired all M. Duruy's qualities, but he found him guilty of too strong sympathies with paganism, of too sharp regrets of Roman civilisation, and of too severe criticism of the ascetic influence of Christianity. Thereupon the Bishop developed a whole theory of severe and dogmatic Roman Catholicism, and did his best to prove that M. Duruy was a great sinner. It is interesting to note that the whole press, with the exception of three or four ultramontane journals, sides with the pagan historian against his ascetic critic. We are living in a material age, and, consciously or unconsciously, the majority of the Latin Frenchmen are pagans at heart. T. C.

A monument to Cardinal Mezzofanti, the celebrated linguist, was inaugurated last Saturday at the Church of St. Onofrio, Rome, where Tasso was buried. The Italian Cabinet have resigned, in consequence of the small majority obtained on the Estimates for the Ministry for Foreign Affairs.

The Portuguese Chamber has ratified the General Act adopted by the Berlin Conference and the Convention with the African National Association.

The Dutch Chamber has voted in favour of the maintenance of the public lottery. This will bear henceforth the name of "State Lottery," the King being opposed to it on principle, and not wishing to have it called any longer "Royal Lottery." It has hitherto yielded to the Government an annual profit of 490,000 fl.

The King and Queen of the Belgians and Princess Clémentine went, on the 18th inst., to Ostend for the summer.

On Sunday afternoon the Emperor William accorded a special audience to the retiring and incoming American Ministers, Mr. Kasson and Mr. Pendleton, who presented their letters of recall and credentials respectively. Count Herbert Bismarck was present for the first time as the representative of the Foreign Office.—In the evening the Emperor left Berlin for Ems, where he arrived on Monday morning, meeting an enthusiastic reception.—The Empress has accepted a copy of the Revised Bible from the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. It was presented through the resident English chaplain, the Rev. Archibald White.—The funeral of the late Prince Frederick Charles took place on the 18th inst., at Potsdam, with much ceremony.

The Emperor of Austria-Hungary leaves Vienna to-day (Saturday) to spend a month at Ischl.—On the 20th inst. the Municipal Council of Vienna took formal possession of the beautiful new Townhall erected on the Ring.

The colossal statue of Liberty was yesterday week escorted by a grand procession of vessels of all kinds to the island in New York Harbour, where it is to be erected. The ceremonial presentation of the figure took place subsequently in the City Hall. Here a civic ceremony took place in the afternoon, the Mayor, Mr. Grace, delivering an address of welcome.

According to official reports, 3081 persons lost their lives by the earthquake shocks in Cashmere. Cattle and sheep also perished in large numbers, and 70,000 dwellings were destroyed.

The Victoria Parliament was opened at Melbourne on the 18th inst. by the Governor, Sir Henry Brougham Loch, who congratulated the Legislature upon the flourishing condition of the colony. The bills announced by his Excellency are of local interest only.—A grand demonstration was held in Sydney on the return of the Australian Contingent from the Soudan. The troops landed on Tuesday morning and were received by the Governor, who thanked them in the name of the Queen and the people of the colony for their services. Their action had practically established an Imperial federation.

A BENGAL LANCER.

Although no further active military operations are now proceeding in the neighbourhood of Souakim, and the remaining British garrison will confine its services to the defence of the town and seaport, the remembrance of the late campaign against Osman Digna, under the command of Sir Gerald Graham, is still fresh in the public mind. We therefore present a few of the last Sketches taken by our Special Artist, Mr. Walter Paget, shortly before his departure, including that of the review by Lord Wolseley of the Bengal Lancers, part of the Indian Contingent, outside the west redoubt at Souakim. The abortive project of the railway to be constructed from Souakim to Berber on the Nile will have cost a large sum of money; and the materials and plant, it is said, have been offered to the Government of Cyprus, as a free gift, for the proposed line to connect the port of Larnaca with Leukosia and the interior of that island. The natives of the Eastern Soudan may have learned an interesting lesson about the "resources of civilisation" from the brief opportunity that was afforded them of seeing what a railway is like; and, when the train was running as far as Handoub, it was a sight which they naturally beheld with astonishment, and which must have given them some new ideas of the effect of European knowledge and skill. The contrast which our Artist has r presented, in one of his Sketches, between the camel and the locomotive engine, as means of "the old transport" and "the new transport," could not fail to impress the minds of those ignorant people of the Desert with a sentiment of respect for the power of foreign nations; and, if it should incline them to seek an improvement of their own condition in the opening of their country to legitimate trade, the expense of this demonstration may not have been entirely thrown away in the future of the Soudan and of the African Arab race. A View of the Souakim terminus of the line, at Quarantine Island, with the tents occupied by the staff of the contractors, Messrs. Lucas and Aird, is included among these Illustrations.

THE NEW IRISH BARONETS.

GATEWAY AT BALA MURGHAB.

NEW IRISH BARONETS.

The visit of their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales to Ireland in April was an event that will be remembered with much gratification by the Royal Family. As the Lord Mayor and Corporation of the City of Dublin, yielding to perverse and mistaken notions of Irish national spirit, refused to pay due respect to the gracious and illustrious visitors, the leading official representatives of Dublin society upon that occasion were found in Mr. Edward Guinness, once High Sheriff, and the Chairman of the Port and Docks Board, Mr. Richard Martin. These gentlemen, supported by the most respectable classes in Dublin and its neighbourhood, successfully exerted themselves to maintain the old Irish virtues of courtesy and hospitality, not to speak of loyalty; and the result was most agreeable to their Royal Highnesses, and to his Excellency Earl Spencer, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. The Portraits of Sir Edward Guinness, Bart., who is a brother of Lord Ardilaun, and Sir Richard Martin, Bart., who has done much for the benefit of the port and trade of Dublin by the construction of the new docks, are presented in this Number of our Journal. We regret that the same rank of baronetcy has not been bestowed on another gentleman, Mr. E. J. Harland, the Mayor of Belfast, head of the great shipbuilding firm of Messrs. Harland and Wolff: the splendid festivities and the cordial welcome with which the Prince and Princess of Wales were greeted at Belfast, and the commercial importance of that city, deserved a better token of recognition than the knighthood offered to its chief magistrate, which Mr. Harland is said to have declined. A knighthood has also been conferred on Dr. Wycherley, High Sheriff of the county of Cork, and on Professor C. A. Cameron, President of the Royal College of Surgeons of Ireland.

The Portraits of Sir Richard Martin and of Sir Edward Guinness are from photographs by Werner and Son, of Dublin.

The little volume entitled My Holiday: a Record in Pen and Pencil (J. F. Shaw and Co.), is an entire novelty. It is intended as a companion for a holiday tour, and contains, first, a page set apart for an entry of the date of leaving and returning home, then a series of Japanese designs, forming backgrounds to frames intended for pencil or other sketches, or they will form suitable mounts for photographs illustrating places visited. For those who sketch in water colours, a few leaves of Whatman's drawing-paper are provided, and four pages are set apart for botanical notes. The second portion of the book consists of writing-paper for a diary, followed by a page for the autographs of friends who may have been met in travelling; and, lastly, on the cover and on the titlepage is a space for the "author's" name. As something quite new, the book is sure to recommend itself to those who are now planning their annual "outing," and as it will be a really useful adjunct to a tourist's baggage, it is well worth noting down among the "things wanted."

Amongst the untrodden by-paths of literature, Mr. Lawrence Hutton, the author of Literary Landmarks of London (T. Fisher Unwin), has hit upon one of uncommon interest. There is no more fascinating subject for investigation than the homes and haunts of the literary worthies with whose works we are familiar, and whose names have truly become "literary landmarks." Probably no city in the world is so full of such associations as London. Fleet-street alone would supply material for a volume, the very name conjuring up visions of Shakspeare and Ben Jonson; of Addison and Steele; of Dr. Johnson and Goldsmith. The author expressly states that he has not attempted anything in the nature of a biography, but has confined himself to supplying a guide to such localities as are associated with the lives of eminent literary men. This he has done with so much accuracy and completeness that his work may be safely recommended as a reliable authority on a most interesting subject.

The results of a journey from Italy to Japan have been garnered up in a small volume by Lord Ronald Gower, entitled Notes of a Tour from Brindisi to Yokohama, 1883-4 (Kegan Paul and Co.). Externally, the book is of the slightest texture—it contains only eighty pages—but the writer seems to have enjoyed the expedition, and in a measure his readers will enjoy it also. In India he notices how strangers are welcomed as old friends, and observes that it is worth while going there if only to see the best side of the English character. When at Ahmedabad he visits the old pleasure-palace of the Kings, and remarks that in point of splendour it realises all one's dreams of Eastern magnificence. From Jeypore an excursion was made to the palace of Ambar, the situation of which is "grand beyond words," while "days might be passed in merely going from one exquisite room into another of this fairy-like palace." At Delhi Lord Ronald took an Indian bath, which must be as painful as a surgical operation, the victim being twisted and turned, "now with one's feet over and behind one's head, and now with the operator dancing a war-dance on one's chest and back." Of course, when at Agra, the Taj-Mahal was inspected, and pronounced "absolute perfection," the common verdict of travellers; but the writer suggests that it is even too finished, too perfect. A week was spent at Government House, Calcutta, at the crisis of the Ilbert Bill affair. At a ball the traveller met Mr. Ilbert, and was surprised to see a comparatively youthful man with a pleasant expression and intellectual head; but what most struck him was the absence of good looks among the ladies. At Colombo, in company with Lord Rosebery, he visited Arabi, and who gave him the impression of having the welfare of his country at heart. What more the author has to say of Arabi, of Ceylon, and finally of Japan, has the advantage in this age of big books of being written in the briefest compass. No reader will be likely to complain that Lord Ronald Gower is tedious.

On the occasion of the centenary of the Baptist Chapel, Bow, on Sunday, the Lord Mayor, at the evening service, preached to a crowded congregation.

Saturday was Founder's Day at Dulwich College, and the occasion was celebrated much in the usual way, by "speeches" from pupils and glees and madrigals from the choir.

In consequence of information which her Majesty's Postmaster-General has received by telegraph from the Austrian Post Office, the extension of the money order system to Austria-Hungary, which was to have taken effect from July 1, has been postponed until Aug. 1.

At the annual meeting of the Victoria (Philosophical) Institute (the Earl of Shaftesbury in the chair) the report was read by the honorary secretary, Captain Frank Petrie, showing that the number of home and foreign members had increased to upwards of eleven hundred. The institute's object, to promote scientific inquiry, and especially in cases where questions of science are held by those who advance them to be subversive of religion, is aided by scientific men, whether in its ranks or not. The address was delivered by Dr. J. Leslie Porter, President of Queen's College, Belfast, the subject being "Egypt: Historical and Geographical." Among the speakers were Sir H. Barkly and Professor Stokes, of Cambridge, who gave an important account of the progress of physical science during the past quarter of a century; and, reviewing the results, specially noted that as scientific truth developed, so had men to give up the idea that there was any opposition between the Book of Nature and the Book of Revelation, both of which had the same source.

Shortly after nine o'clock on Thursday morning, the 18th inst., one of the most disastrous colliery explosions of recent years occurred in the Clifton Hall Colliery, Pendlebury, near Manchester. There were at the time 349 men and boys engaged in the three chief seams. From two of these workings almost all the men escaped, though many sustained injuries; but in the third 147 men were entombed. Mr. Knowles, one of the proprietors of the colliery, stated on Monday to the meeting of the Manchester Relief Committee that 180 lives were lost in the disaster, and that 85 widows, 279 children, and 36 other persons are left destitute. The necessary relief will absorb the Colliery Club fund of £10,800, and £15,000 more is required to be raised. Sir Henry Ponsonby telegraphed to Mr. Ellis Lever, of Bowdon, expressing her Majesty's deep regret at the disaster. The Lord Mayor receives contributions at the Mansion House and forwards them to Manchester, where the Mayor has opened a relief fund.

THE AFGHAN BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

Sir Peter Lumsden's lecture to the Royal Geographical Society, last Monday evening, on the country of the Murghab, the Kushk, and the Heri-Rud, north of Herat, recalled many of the descriptive notices of that topography which accompanied the Sketches of our Special Artist, Mr. William Simpson, during his sojourn there with the Afghan Boundary Commission. Bala Murghab, the place where they abode in camp from the middle of December to February, has already been made tolerably familiar to the readers of the Illustrated London News. We present one more Illustration, that of an old gateway, belonging to the period when Bala Murghab was a Turkish town of some importance on the road from Herat to Maimene and Balkh, in one direction, or to Bokhara in another. The British Commission is now encamped near Herat, and is being consulted by the Ameer's Government about the fortifications of that city.

Intelligence has been received at Simla that the Russian telegraph line has been completed to Sarakhs.

Miss Jennie Young gives a concert-lecture on the potter's art this (Saturday) afternoon at Steinway Hall.

The Bishop of Lincoln has reopened the ancient parish church at Somerby, near Brigg, after restoration from plans by Mr. M. Townsend, of Peterborough. This is the first re-opening ceremony conducted by the Bishop since his elevation to the see.

Six steamers arrived at Liverpool during the past week with live stock and fresh meat on board from American and Canadian ports; the total imports being 1323 cattle, 6007 quarters of beef, and 615 carcases of mutton, showing a large decrease in comparison with the arrivals of the preceding week.

A concert of vocal and instrumental music was given last Saturday afternoon at the Albert Palace, in aid of the funds of the Fawcett Memorial Committee, by artists and a select choir from the Royal Normal College and Academy of Music for the Blind, Upper Norwood. The Skinners' Company have contributed fifty guineas, and the Fishmongers' Company twenty guineas, to this fund.

Sir James M'Garel-Hogg, entertaining members of the Metropolitan Board of Works last Saturday evening at Willis's Rooms, announced that the new street from Oxford-street to Piccadilly-circus would be opened before the end of the year, and that the new thoroughfare to be formed between Charing-cross and Tottenham-court-road would be one of the handsomest in the Metropolis.

In the case brought by Baron Henry De Worms, M.P., against Mr. Hughes for libel, the Queen's Bench jury on Tuesday returned a verdict for the plaintiff with £500 damages, with costs. They also found for the plaintiff on a counter-claim. In another case, the proprietors of a newspaper which had published the libel apologised, and agreed to pay nominal damages.

In London 2375 births and 1284 deaths were registered last week. Allowing for increase of population, the births were 266, and the deaths 164, below the average numbers in the corresponding weeks of the last ten years. The deaths included 21 from smallpox, 95 from measles, 7 from scarlet fever, 16 from diphtheria, 42 from whooping-cough, 6 from enteric fever, 2 from ill-defined forms of continued fever, 24 from diarrhœa and dysentery, 3 from cholera. The deaths referred to diseases of the respiratory organs, which had declined from 305 to 231 in the four preceding weeks, further fell last week to 196, and were 46 below the corrected weekly average. Different forms of violence caused 56 deaths; 44 were the result of negligence or accident, among which were 17 from fractures and contusions, 7 from burns and scalds, 10 from drowning, and 6 of infants under one year of age from suffocation. Eleven cases of suicide were registered.

Sold by all Chemists and Druggists.

HAY FEVER.—The most effective Remedy for this distressing affection is EPPS'S ANTHOXANTHUM, administered as spray. The relief to the excoriated membrane is almost instantaneous. In Bottles, 2s. 9d. and 4s. 9d. (by post, 36 or 57 stamps), labelled JAMES EPPS and CO., 170, Piccadilly, and 48, Threadneedle-street.

THE SKIN.—The Glory of Woman, the Pride of Man. It contains the delicate lines of beauty, and constitutes all that we term "Loveliness"; yet how many have their skins blemished by irritant soaps, carbolic, coal tar, glycerine—made of putrid fats. THE ALBION MILK AND SULPHUR SOAP is the purest of all toilet soaps. It cleanses and purifies the skin, guarding it against infection, and removing all skin irritation. It is a boon to sensitive skins, and as a shaving soap is unequalled. Beautifully white, delicately perfumed. Sold in Tablets, by all Chemists.

TO STOUT PERSONS.—DR. YATE HOLLAND'S POWDERS (or Pills) are the original and only reliable remedy for Corpulency. Highly recommended by the Faculty. Price 2s. 9d., 5s. 6d., and 11s. per Box. Through any Chemist, or post-free, in plain wrappers, direct of C. GRICE and CO., 8s, Fleet-street, E.C.

DRAWN BY F. BARNARD.

Heriot was off the sofa and after him in a moment. He found the man sitting in the dark, with his face buried in his hands, and sobbing like a baby.

ADRIAN VIDAL.

BY W. E. NORRIS,

CHAPTER XLIV.

A LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT.

Heriot had an old and faithful servant who had been with him since his college days, had accompanied him in all his wanderings, had nursed him through many illnesses, and had ended by becoming his friend and to some extent also his confidant. A few hours after Adrian had left him he sent for this man and said: "Sit down here, Graves, beside me; I want to have a talk with you."

"Better let me get you to bed, Sir," answered Graves, after scrutinising his master's face. "You've had about enough talking for one day, if you aint had too much. That there Mr. Vidal, he comes here and he sets and he sets just as if you was made of cast iron. I was very near knocking at the door and sending of him away this afternoon, I can tell you."

"Come, now, Graves, you can't accuse him of having given me too much of his company lately."

"No; that he aint!" growled Graves, who was not particularly devoted to his master's friend. "He don't trouble himself so much as to inquire at the door for weeks together, and when he do come there's no getting rid of him. He's tired you out, that's plain enough to see. Now, if you please, Sir, you'll just go to bed and let me read you to sleep. Here's the evening paper just come in with a leading article that would send you off beautiful in five minutes."

"I have no doubt it would, if anything would; but I don't want to go to sleep just yet. Sit down, as I tell you, and don't irritate me. The doctor particularly said that I was not to be irritated. How old are you, Graves?"

"Let me see," murmured Graves. "Forty-six—forty-eight—yes, Sir, I'm as near eight-and-forty as it makes no difference."

"Are you really? Well, now, don't you think that at eight and forty it is about time for a young fellow to begin to contemplate marriage?"

"No, Sir," answered Graves, with a decisive shake of his head. "I don't. I know what married servants is, and I hope I know my duty to my employer. No incumbrances for me, thank you."

"But what about your duty to Mrs. Anderson? How long is it that you have been keeping company with her? Twenty years?"

"Scarcely so much, I think, Sir; but that don't make no odds. She knows I aint one to change. She don't want to go running off to church at once, like a housemaid who's afraid of her sweetheart giving her the slip; and if she did, want would have to be her master. I've told her often enough that I'm not going to leave you so long as you need me. 'And,' says I, 'if that don't suit you, mum, why, you're welcome to look elsewhere."

"That was rather ungallant of you, Graves. Poor Mrs. Anderson may be excused for being a little impatient after such a number of years, and I am glad to think that her patience won't be tried much longer. My time is nearly up, Graves."

"It aint nothing of the sort, Sir."

"Graves, I thought you had more sense. I am at the point of death, and you know it. That is why I want you to tell me what you will do after I am gone."

"I aint going to speak about no such thing, Sir—nor yet think about it," returned the man, doggedly.

"My dear old friend, do you suppose I don't know that you will be sorry to lose me? But we must part, you see; it can't be helped; and I should like to have some idea of what your future is to be. Do you think of lodgings, for instance?"

"Well, Sir," answered Graves, reluctantly, "Mrs. Anderson, she have spoke of it; but my own notion was occasional waiting. It aint wealth; but it's a small certainty, and it don't entail no risk. Now, I've known a great number of men as has left service and taken to letting lodgings; but I never knowed one yet as had capital enough to start clear. What with the crushing rent you have to pay in Mayfair or Belgravia—for it aint much good to go anywhere else—and what with the cost of furnishing, you're a lucky man if you ever manage to pay off your debts; that's my experience."

"Yes; but of course you know that I shall leave you something. Don't protest: I am sure that you have never wished that I should die: only you must, in common prudence, have counted upon coming into some additional capital at my death. And what I wanted to say to you was that I have had you put down in my will for a sufficient sum to pay for furniture and to give you a small income, but not quite sufficient to keep you in idleness. A man without an occupation is a miserable man, Graves."

"There's no doubt of it, Sir."

"Do you remember how, in Spain and Italy, and all those southern countries, we used to watch the people sitting for hours together in the sun doing nothing; and how we used to wonder what they were thinking of all the time?"

"They was thinking of no good, Sir, that you may depend," answered Graves. "A pack of cut-throat villains, the whole lot of 'em—Italians, Spaniards, and Greeks, there aint a pin to choose. When they aint thinking of a murder or a robbery, it's long odds that they're thinking about nothing at all."

"Well," said Heriot, smiling, "I dare say they often contrive to have no thoughts. They have raised laziness to the level of a fine art; they are satisfied to exist, and don't know what boredom is. It isn't so with us northern people. We have no sun, worth speaking of, to sit in; and we must be doing something, or else we lose our spirits and our health. I have never been fit to follow an occupation myself; but I have very frequently felt the want of one. In spite of books and friends, and such interests as I could create for myself, I haven't always been able to fill up the hours; and I shouldn't feel that I was doing any man a kindness by making him altogether independent of work."

"I don't think you would, Sir."

"Yet, when one has a good deal of money to leave, and only a few people to leave it to, one is a little puzzled. You see, there is a certain class of persons who would work all the better, perhaps, if their daily bread didn't actually depend upon it. Artists, for instance, and—and authors. If a man is in a hurry to get his job done and be paid, he can't give as much time as he ought to detail and finish; and therefore I think that, to enable him to show himself at his best, one should try to place him out of the reach of money worries. Don't you see what I mean?"

"Maybe I do, Sir; but there's some authors as isn't fit to be trusted with much money, in my opinion. Some authors would do a deal better if the money was settled on their wives—and tied up tight too."

"That idea has occurred to me; but I have seen some objections to it. The question, after all, is rather one of amount than of mode of bequest. Now, tell me honestly, Graves—because there may be time for me to alter my will yet—what should you say was a satisfactory sum, neither too much nor too little, for a man in your position to inherit?"

Graves looked distressed. "If you please, Sir, I'd rather not name a figure. I hope it'll be many a long day before I inherit anything from you, and I believe I've saved enough to keep my head above water without any legacies."

"Yes; but you wouldn't gratify Mrs. Anderson by taking lodgings unless you had rather more capital, and I don't fancy the occasional waiting business for you. This isn't a subject about which you need feel the slightest delicacy; for what doesn't go to you and to one or two other persons after my death will go to charities. Would £5000 be enough, do you think?"

"Too much, Sir, by half."

"I shouldn't like to make it less. One must allow a margin for contingencies; and it is possible, though I hope it isn't at all likely, that your lodgings might turn out a failure. So that is what you will get, Graves—that and a few trifles that I thought you might like to have as reminders of an old friend. And now about the other bequests. What would be your notion of the proper income for a literary gentleman who had better not be too rich and certainly ought not to be poor?"

"In addition to what he has got already, do you mean?" Heriot nodded.

"Five or six hundred a year, Sir," replied Graves, without the least hesitation.

"What! for a married man who may have a large family? I thought you would have put it at quite double that amount. To tell you the truth, I have made it rather more than double, and I am not sure that I haven't been stingy."

Graves shook his head. "I should have liked to have seen it settled on the lady, Sir," said he.

"Be satisfied, then," returned Heriot, laughing; "half of it is settled on the lady. My old friend, Mrs. Irvine, will come into a round sum—you won't object to that, I suppose—and then there is that Children's Hospital that Mrs. Vidal is interested in; I thought she would be glad that it should be remembered. All the rest goes to different charities. There! I've altered my will I don't know how often, and I've given no end of bother to the lawyers; but I doubt whether I shall bother them again. Graves, you have known me a long time; you knew me before I was an invalid; you have been with me since I began to suffer, all those years ago, and you have seen me in pain and out of spirits and out of temper"——

"Never!" burst out Graves, suddenly. "Never seed you out of temper once, I'll swear!"

"Haven't you?" said Heriot, consideringly. "Perhaps not—perhaps I haven't shown it in the ordinary way. And now tell me, do you think that, upon the whole, I have borne it all like a man?"

Something prevented Graves from answering at once; but presently he said, in a gruff voice, "Yes; you've bore it like a man."

"Well, do you know, Graves, that is what I think myself. I hope it isn't arrogant. A soldier, you know, who has been through several campaigns and hasn't shirked death or wounds is entitled to call himself a brave man. You may say that he has no business to brag, because he has only done his duty, and he would have been a very despicable being if he had run away; still, I think it must sometimes be a satisfaction to him to be able to say to himself, 'Anyhow, I am not a coward.' That is the way that I look at my life. I haven't been a coward; though I have often enough felt afraid. Lately I have felt more afraid than I used; the machine is worn out, you see."

He was silent for a minute or two, and then added, "Mr. and Mrs. Vidal will be here to-morrow afternoon; you must tell them that I don't feel well enough to see them. I shall never see them again. After keeping up for so long, it would not do to run the risk of breaking down at the finish and giving them a painful recollection of me, and I feel as if I were losing hold of myself. Well, I think I'll go to bed now, Graves."

Graves got up, without replying, and began to bustle about; but all of a sudden he stopped in the midst of his preparations, stood still for a moment, and then hurried off into the adjoining room, where he had slept during his master's illness, slamming the door behind him.

Heriot was off the sofa and after him in a moment. He found the man sitting in the dark, with his face buried in his hands, and sobbing like a baby.

"Why, Graves, what's the matter? What an old fool you are!" he exclaimed, laughing, though his own voice was a little unsteady. "You mustn't do this sort of thing, you know. Didn't you hear the doctor say that I was to be spared all agitation?"

"What do you go to upset me for, then?" returned the other, angrily. "You've no regard for a man's feelings. Now, you won't find me making a fool of myself like this again; so I tell you. And you'll just please let me get you to bed, Sir, and stop talking. It's enough to give anyone an illness to go on like you've been doing to-night."

Graves continued to grumble under his breath until his master was between the sheets, when he reverted to the leading article which he had recommended before as a soporific, and proposed to begin reading it aloud. But Heriot answered that he thought he could get to sleep without that.

"Good-night, Graves," he said, holding out his wasted hand. "I'm sorry that I distressed you just now; but I couldn't help it. It had to be said some time. And, Graves, if the pain comes on in the night and you hear me call out, you'll come in at once with the medicine, won't you?"

Graves nodded. "You shan't have to wait, Sir. But you'll have a quiet night, please God. Your eyes looks heavy, and I think you're going to sleep well."

And so it proved. Several times after this Graves returned, and was reassured by the sound of slow and regular breathing. Then, being a light sleeper, and knowing that the slightest sound would awaken him, he lay down and took a few hours of rest. He was not disturbed; but when, with the first glimmer of dawn, he stole on tiptoe into his master's room, there was nothing but stillness and emptiness there. Upon the bed, as if in slumber, lay what had once been called Heriot; but the real Heriot, having faithfully performed the task allotted to him in this world of pain and weariness, had received his message of recall during the night, and, silently responding to it, had passed away to the land where all things are forgotten.

CHAPTER XLV.

NEW LEAVES.

It was on a sunny, hazy afternoon in the autumn that Adrian and Clare wandered out to the headland overlooking Polruth Bay, where one of them had been wont to sit in days gone by, and amuse herself with dreams which time had only in part fulfilled. As she sat down in the old place now, she seemed to see before her a future less romantic, perhaps, but more assured and more peaceful. She had lived and learnt, and had gained something and lost something by that process, as all must. The events of the past two years had changed her both outwardly and inwardly more than they had changed her husband, who had stretched himself upon the turf at her feet, and was unrolling one of a number of architectural drawings which he had brought with him. This paper, labelled "South Elevation," he spread out and secured by placing stones on its four corners, and then—

"Just look here a moment, will you, Clare?" he said. "You see, here's the front door, with the dining-room windows on one side and the library on the other. He calls it south; but I've been over the ground, and it isn't south a bit; it's as nearly as possible south-west. Now the question is whether, when there's a gale (which, I suppose, will be about every Monday, Wednesday, and Friday during the winter) we shall be able to use our front door at all without having all our teeth blown down our throats."

"When there is a gale we will use the back door," answered Clare; "but it is a great mistake to imagine that there are more gales in Cornwall than anywhere else. If it does happen to blow, it blows rather hard, that is all. And during the winter the front door will be locked, because we shall be in London."

"Shall we indeed? And where are we going to live in London, if it isn't an impertinent question?"

"In our own house, of course. Adrian, did you really suppose that I contemplated planting you down in Cornwall for the rest of your days?"

"My dear girl, wealthy as we are, I don't think we can quite afford to have two houses, and if it is a question between Cornwall and London, I give my vote for Cornwall without hesitation."

"Then I give mine for London. It would not make me at all happy to have my own way in everything. This house is only being built to please me, and I should never enjoy living in it if I felt the whole time that I was keeping you away from your friends and your club and all the amusements that you are accustomed to. You know you hate the country."

"That is just where you are mistaken, my dear. I love the country. I suppose no man ever was more sick of a place than I am of London, and I decided to have a house hereabouts, because I happen to prefer Cornwall to any other county in England. As for this particular house, I take it that it is being built, not to please either you or me, but to please your mother, who in an evil hour fell in with 'the most promising young architect you ever saw,' and of course had to find some employment for him, since nobody else seemed to be disposed to give him any. As far as I can judge, there is considerably more promise than performance about him. If he ever carries out his fell designs, we shall find ourselves the proud possessors of the ugliest and most incommodious dwelling in England. I have been studying his features, which seem to express a happy combination of knavery and stupidity; and I have been wondering whether it might not be worth while to pay him a certain sum in advance, upon the chance of his bolting off with the money and never being heard of again."

Clare laughed. "Considering that you are his employer," she remarked, "I should think you might venture to dismiss him without tempting him to rob you. Are you going to let your wife and your mother-in-law reduce you to a state of slavery? Georgina thinks that is your only chance. Did I tell you that I had a letter from her this morning? She assures me that since her marriage she has become more than ever convinced that either the husband or the wife should be a benevolent despot, and that the one whose will is strongest should always be placed in command."

"Oh, indeed. And has she discovered that De Wynt's strength of will is phenomenal?"

"So she says; and as she has no doubt at all about my will being stronger than yours, she concludes that you must be made to obey, or else we shall both suffer for it. Her view is—But after all, I don't think I will repeat her view to you," said Clare, with a slight laugh.

But Adrian lifted his handsome young face, upon which care had left no faintest indication of its passage, and looked up at his wife, smiling. "Let us hear her view," he said. "It is always amusing and sometimes profitable to be told what other people think of us."

"What she thinks is not amusing," answered Clare, who had grown grave. "She says that we are not suited to one another, and that you will never understand me, nor I you. It isn't true, though. You don't think it is true, do you, Adrian?"

"My dear Clare, do you believe that one human being ever did completely understand another? As to our not being suited to each other, surely we may be allowed to be the best judges of that. I remember poor old Heriot saying the same thing to me once. It was long ago—before we were married."

"Did he?" asked Clare, a look of pain coming over her face. "But he changed his mind afterwards—I am sure he did. I often wish that he could see us now. And yet, I don't know—it seems rather cruel that we should be happy, and that we should be making plans and discussing what we shall do with his money, and seeming to forget him—though we don't really forget. I wonder whether he would have approved of our establishing ourselves down here. I wonder what he thought our future would be."

The secret which Heriot had kept so long and so well had been duly divulged to Clare, in accordance with his wish; but it had hardly affected her so painfully as it would have done had she realised its full meaning. Heriot, during his lifetime, had never seemed to her to be a man who could love or be loved in that particular way, nor could she feel that his love for her had been anything more than what he himself had called it—a dream. Perhaps the uppermost feeling in her mind was one of thankfulness that she had not been told sooner; and it is not improbable that Heriot may have foreseen that this would be so.

Adrian, who was pulling up tufts of the sweet-smelling herbage and crushing them between his fingers, did not answer for a minute or two. He had felt Heriot's death more, perhaps, than Clare had done; he certainly missed his friend more than she did; but he hated all painful topics, and could not speak about them without an effort.

"That queer fellow, Graves, gave me an account of a long talk that he had with his master the last evening that they were together," he remarked, presently. "The man told it very well; I could fancy that I heard poor old Heriot's voice. His wish seems to have been that we should be well enough off to be independent, but that I should not fancy myself too rich to work. Well, I have no thought of giving up work; only I shan't write any more novels."

"Oh, Adrian, why not? Not because the last one didn't succeed quite so well as the one before?"

"That wouldn't be a bad reason. One ends by finding out what one can do and what one can't. I might go on writing novels indefinitely, and by taking pains I might, I think, always manage to attract a certain number of readers; but no amount of pains would ever lift me into the front rank of novelists. I have the descriptive faculty, but I haven't the creative; and that is like saying of a painter that he is an excellent copyist. You can make a living by copying; it's a vocation like another; but I can't conceive anyone adopting it unless with a view to making a living. Now, I am not obliged to work for my living any more. We have what I suppose may be called a comfortable competence, and I think I am entitled to take up any kind of employment which may never bring me in any money at all, and which, at all events, can't do so for a considerable time."

"What kind of employment do you mean?" asked Clare, wonderingly.

"I am going to write a history. Don't open your eyes at me; it isn't such a wild piece of presumption as it sounds. Do you know why there are comparatively few historians? Why, simply because very few literary men can afford to wait an indefinite time for payment. What, after all, are the qualifications of an historian? Accuracy and diligence, to begin with. Everybody can be accurate and diligent if he will. After that, he should have a pleasant style, he should be able to sift the grain from the chaff, and he should know how to put life into the personages whom he describes. Now, between ourselves, and as nobody is listening to us, I don't mind saying candidly that I believe I possess these gifts in some measure. I may not be a Gibbon or a Macaulay"——

"I don't see why you should not be," interrupted Clare; and indeed she spoke with perfect sincerity.

"But, without aiming quite so high as that, one may perhaps earn a little credit for oneself and spend a few years very pleasantly in erecting a monument which may or may not prove more perennial than bronze. I've decided upon my subject; I mean to take the period of the First Empire. I shall not call it a life of Napoleon, though of course his will be the central figure; but just think of the list of his contemporaries! Pitt, Fox, Wellington, Talleyrand, Goethe, Madame de Staël—there's no end to them. And then the materials that one has to work upon! One's great difficulty will be the boiling of them down. Now, I know what you are going to say; it isn't new ground. But what of that? The history of such a period is always new; no one writer can exhaust all that there is to be said about it. Besides, I haven't any very formidable rivals. The "Histoire du Consulat et de l'Empire" is a tolerably well-known book; but how many English people have read it, do you suppose?"

"I have not," answered Clare.

"You will have it to read now," Adrian said, laughing. "For years to come, your days will be passed among the dead. I shall get you to take notes for me, and to write from dictation, and to do a hundred other disagreeable things; and every now and then we shall have to go up to London to consult authorities. That will be better fun than having a house there, won't it? Of course, too, we shall have to visit Paris at intervals—not to speak of Italy and Spain and every battlefield from Waterloo to the Borodino. Do you know, Clare, I believe we shall be inconsolable when this great work is completed."

Clare allowed herself to be gained by her husband's enthusiasm. New horizons opened out before her as he talked on; she saw herself becoming his companion, his helpmate, and his friend, and acknowledged to herself that such a life was at least more useful and dignified than the existence of perpetual love-making, which she had once longed for and still regretted a little. She was beginning, "I wouldn't change places with any woman living now," when her sentence was interrupted by the sudden appearance of her mother, who was seen hurrying up the slope in a state of much agitation and breathlessness.

"Oh, here you are!" panted Mrs. Irvine; "I have been looking for you everywhere to tell you of a most painful thing that has happened. I have just heard that that wretched young man has been arrested at Bodmin on a charge of embezzlement. Is it not too heartrending?"

"I have no doubt that I should feel it to be so," answered Adrian, to whom this appeal seemed to be addressed, "if I knew who the wretched young man was. Can it be—but no; that would be too good to be true. It isn't our friend the architect?"

Mrs. Irvine nodded solemnly. "It is, indeed; and I feel that I shall never be able to believe in the honesty of any distressed person again."

"Oh, yes, you will," said Adrian, encouragingly. "I will venture to predict that the very next distressed person who turns up will command your full confidence. Only I do trust that no more casual architects will appear in these parts until Clare and I have got a roof over our heads."

"You need have no fear," replied Mrs. Irvine, who had taken her son-in-law's arm, and was leading him down towards the village. "If a hundred architects were to come and beg me to find employment for them, I should tell them that they might as well talk to one of their own stone walls as to me. I have been taken in too often. Do you remember how poor dear Mr. Heriot used to laugh at me about the people whom I had tried to befriend and who had turned out badly? I always maintained that I had been exceptionally unlucky in my experiences; but I am beginning to see that there are more rogues than honest folk in the world. I shall turn over a new leaf now and subscribe to the Charity Organisation Society."

"We are all going to turn over new leaves," Adrian remarked. "You are going to give up indiscriminate charity; Mr. Irvine is going to give up enriching the curiosity-dealers; Georgina is going to give up savage life; and Clare and I are going to give up writing novels and frequenting fashionable society and—and other things which it is unnecessary to specify. I wonder whether all of us, or any of us, will keep our resolutions?"

And then, as Mrs. Irvine, who had paused to exchange greetings with an ancient mariner, was evidently not attending to him, he turned to his wife and said, "What do you think, Clare?"

"Perhaps, if we keep the resolutions that you didn't mention, it will be sufficient," she answered.

THE END.

NEW TALE BY MR. BUCHANAN.

In our next Number, being the first of a New Volume, will be commenced an Original Tale, entitled THE MASTER OF THE MINE, by ROBERT BUCHANAN, to be continued weekly until completed.

A BOUT WITH THE GLOVES.

In the duels of chivalry, we are told, the glove was sometimes made the gage of conflict; and a lady might even give her own glove as a prize to be fought for between two rival suitors. Fighting with the gloves, as practised among pugilists, has quite a different purpose; the fists being so attired, and the gloves being so prudently padded, that a boxing-match may take place, and the most vigorous blows may be exchanged, without much peril of disfiguring and painful bruises. This combat of the young dogs, shown in our Artist's Drawing, in its use or misuse of the glove reminds us more of the former custom of human duellists, as the glove is what they are just now fighting for, though any other small article of apparel, which they could tear to pieces, might serve as well to invite their sportive contention. A third dog, sitting as umpire, gravely overlooks the proceeding, which may not, however, be approved by the master of these animals, the owner of the gloves and boots, when he views the mischievous result of the struggle.

The Duke of Richmond and Gordon has been appointed an Ecclesiastical Commissioner for England.

The Pope has appointed Monsignor Butt Roman Catholic Bishop of Portsmouth.

The Earl of Lindsay has been elected a respresentative Peer of Scotland, in room of the late Earl of Selkirk.

Mr. Alfred Tristrum Lawrence, of the Oxford Circuit, has been appointed Recorder of Windsor.

Mr. E. Birkbeck, M.P. for North Norfolk, has been appointed a Public Works Loan Commissioner.

Lady John Manners opened a handsome new coffee-tavern at Leicester last week, in presence of a large company. The house, which is the twelfth in Leicester, cost over £10,000.

A new shelter for cabmen, the gift of Miss Paris, which is stationed opposite St. George's Hospital, Hyde Park-corner, was opened last week by Mr. F. A. Bevan.

The College of Physicians have appointed a committee to superintend the reproduction in autotype of the original manuscript notes of William Harvey's lectures, delivered in the Royal College of Physicians, in and after 1616, and has guaranteed the cost of one hundred copies. A printed transcript will be furnished with each page of the autotype—the bad handwriting, the curious phraseology, and the abbreviations used by the great physiologist rendering some interpretation necessary. These lectures contain the first suggestions of Harvey's discovery of the circulation, so that this manuscript may be regarded as the most interesting monument of English natural science. The number of copies to be produced will be limited to 500. Messrs. Churchill have liberally undertaken to publish the work without the usual commission, as soon as 350 copies are subscribed for. At least 200 more subscribers are required before the work can be put in hand. Any communications on the subject may be addressed to Dr. E. H. Sieveking, of 17, Manchester-square, London; or to Messrs. Churchill, 11, New Burlington-street, London. The cost of each copy, including the transcript, and bound, will be £2 2s. to subscribers, and £2 12s. 6d. after publication.

OBITUARY.

SIR WILLIAM MILMAN, BART.

Sir William Milman, third Baronet, of Levaton, in the county of Devon, died at Tenby, on the 17th inst., in his seventy-second year. He was second son of Sir William George Milman, second Baronet, by Elizabeth Hurry, his wife, only daughter of Mr. Robert Alderson, Recorder of Ipswich, and succeeded to the title at the decease of his father, Aug. 21, 1857 (his elder brother, Francis, having died vitâ patris). He was educated at Westminster, and at Brasenose College, Oxford, where he graduated in 1837. In 1841 he was called to the Bar, and joined the Oxford circuit. He married, Oct. 26, 1841, Matilda Frances, eldest daughter of the Rev. John Pretyman, Rector of Sherington, Bucks, and leaves three surviving sons and four surviving daughters. The eldest son, now Sir Francis John Milman, late Royal Artillery, was born in 1842, and married, in 1870, Katherine Grace, second daughter of Mr. Stephen C. Moore, of Barne, in the county of Tipperary, by whom he has issue.

SIR RICHARD GETHIN, BART.

Sir Richard Gethin, seventh Baronet, late of Percy Mount, in the county of Sligo, died on the 11th inst., in his sixty-first year. He was eldest son of Captain Richard Gethin, eldest son of Sir Percy Gethin, sixth Baronet; and (his father having died v.p. in 1835) he succeeded to the baronetcy at his grandfather's decease, Oct. 10, 1837. The Gethins of Gethinsgrott were of Welsh ancestry. The baronetcy was conferred, Aug. 1, 1665, on Sir Richard Gethin, of Gethinsgrott, M.P. for Limavady. The Baronet whose death we record held commissions, successively, in the 20th Foot, the 1st Dragoon Guards, and the 83rd Regiment. In 1856 he served as Captain in the Turkish Contingent during the Crimean War. He married, June 25, 1846, Frances, youngest daughter of Mr. George Weller Poley, of Boxted Hall, Suffolk (which marriage was dissolved in 1862). The only surviving son, now Sir Richard Charles Percy Gethin, eighth Baronet, barrister-at-law, was born Nov. 30, 1847, and married, June 5, 1876, Catharine, eldest daughter of Mr. Frederick Edward Burton Scott, of Cloughton, Cheshire, by whom he has issue.

GENERAL CONWAY.

General Thomas Sydenham Conway, C.B., died at his residence, Bury-street, St. James's, on Sunday, the 7th inst., at the age of seventy-five. He entered the Army in February, 1828, and served throughout the operations in Scinde; commanded the Light Company at the defence of the Residency at Hyderabad; and was present at the battles of Meeanee and Hyderabad, for which he had a medal. He also served in the Mahratta war. He became Major in 1843, in which year he was made a Companion of the Bath, and attained the rank of General in July, 1881.

MAJOR-GENERAL WALTER FANE.

Major-General Walter Fane, C.B., Madras Staff Corps, died at Fulbeck, Lincolnshire, on the 16th inst., aged fifty-seven. He was the youngest son of the Rev. Edward Fane, Prebendary of Lincoln, and grandson of Thomas, eighth Earl of Westmoreland, entered the Army in 1845, and attained the rank of Major-General in 1879. He served in the Punjaub Irregular Cavalry 1849 to 1857, and in 1859 participated in the pursuit and capture of Tantia Topee in Central India; subsequently raised a regiment of Irregular Cavalry for service in China, and commanded Fane's Horse in the engagement at Sinho and at the capture of Pekin. In requital he received the Companionship of the Bath. He married, Aug. 4, 1879, Agnes, daughter of Sir Henry Bold Hoghton, Bart.

MR. MACKIE, M.P.

Mr. Robert Bownas Mackie, F.S.A., J.P., of St. John's House, Wakefield, M.P. for that town, died on the 18th inst. He was born in 1829, the eldest son of the late Mr. Robert J. Mackie, of St. John's, and was educated at Wesley College, Sheffield. He was formerly a partner in the firm of Robert Mackie and Co., corn merchants, of Wakefield. That borough he unsuccessfully contested in 1874, but was returned, in the Liberal interest, in 1880. He married, in 1852, Fanny, daughter of the late Mr. William Shaw, of Stanley Hall, and became a widower in 1853. His brother, Colonel Edward Alexander Mackie, J.P., of Manor House, Heath, is Honorary Colonel 1st Volunteer Battalion King's Own Light Infantry, South Yorkshire Regiment.

We have also to record the deaths of—

Professor Fleeming Jenkin, Professor of Engineering in the University of Edinburgh, unexpectedly, on the 12th inst., from blood-poisoning, after undergoing a surgical operation of a trivial kind.

The Rev. Edwin Paxton Hood, recently in Paris. He was formerly editor of the Eclectic Review, and author of a biography of Wordsworth, a life of the Rev. Dr. Binney, and of other popular works.

The Venerable Henry Fearon, M.A., B.D., Hon. Canon of Peterborough, Rector of Loughborough, and formerly and for twenty-one years Archdeacon of Leicester, on the 12th inst., in his eighty-third year.

Mr. James Moncrieff Arnott, of Chapel, in the county of Fife, aged ninety-one. He was elected a Fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons in 1843, and had been Surgeon in Ordinary to H.R.H. the late Prince Consort.

The Rev. Frederick Rouch, Minor Canon of Canterbury Cathedral, and Vicar of Littlebourne, one of the oldest beneficed clergymen of the Church of England. He was born towards the close of the last century and graduated at Oxford in 1820.

Mr. Xavier De Castanos Royds Peel, of Donant, in the county of Pembroke, at Glenafon, near Haverfordwest, on the 29th ult., aged seventy-six. He was son of the late Mr. Jonathan Haworth Peel, of Cottsmere, who was nephew of Sir Robert Peel, the first Baronet.

General William Clarke Francis Gosling, Royal (late Madras) Artillery, on the 14th inst., in his sixty-third year. He entered the Army in 1840, and attained the rank of General in 1883. He was in the Crimean campaign; and in 1858 served with General Whitelock's field force in Bundelcund.

Colonel William Gerard Byron, 2nd Battalion the King's Royal Rifle Corps, at his residence in York-street, Portman-square, aged forty-eight. Colonel Byron was descended from a younger son of the fourth Lord Byron; he entered the Army in 1855, was present at the siege of Lucknow, served in the Afghan war, and accompanied Sir F. Roberts to Candahar.

Admiral John Lort Stokes, at his residence, Scotchwell, in the county of Pembroke, on the 11th inst. He was born in 1812, and entered the Royal Navy in 1824. In 1846 he attained the rank of Captain, and was appointed to the command of the Acheron; he became Rear-Admiral in 1864, Vice-Admiral (retired) 1871, and Admiral in 1876.

Rev. Augustus Sutton, M.A., Prebendary of Lincoln Cathedral, Rector and Patron of West Tolf, Norfolk, at his residence, on the 10th inst. He was born June 18, 1825, the fifth son of Sir Richard Sutton, second Baronet, of Norwood Park; was admitted to priest's orders in 1848, and married, in 1851, Charlotte, daughter of Mr. John Carter, of Northwold, Norfolk, by whom he leaves issue.

The Rev. William Wyndham Malet, for forty years Vicar of Ardeley, Stevenage, Herts, on the 12th inst., at the Vicarage, aged eighty-two, third son of Sir Charles Warre Malet, Bart., and first cousin of Sir Henry Baldwin Malet, Ambassador at Berlin. Originally on the Bombay establishment of the Hon. East India Company's Civil Service, he was ordained in 1836. He published several works.

In the Obituary Notice of Mr. Charles Fieschi Heneage, in a recent issue, it was omitted to be stated that he married secondly, in 1872, Campbell Macaulay Mary, daughter of the late Mr. Alexander Greig, who survives him.

THE WEST PACIFIC ISLANDS.

The entire breadth of the Pacific Ocean is a hundred and fifty degrees of longitude; and two thirds of its space, to the south-east of Asia and to the east of Australia, is dotted with hundreds of islands, of which there are more than seventy distinct groups. If the geographical region of islands be taken to embrace the Malay Archipelago, beginning from the west at Sumatra, and ending at the Marquesas, or at Pitcairn Island, it embraces more than one-third of the main circumference of the globe within the south tropical zone. Different portions of this vast region, in the Pacific, have received the geographical names of Micronesia, Melanesia, and Polynesia, while Australia, Papua or New Guinea, and the islands of New Zealand, are of too great size and importance to be confounded with the world of smaller islands. The Fiji Islands, situated directly north of New Zealand, just within the 180th degree of latitude, mark the dividing line between the western and eastern series of archipelagos; the former being those of Melanesia and Micronesia, including the Pellew Islands, the Caroline Islands, the Ladrone Islands, the Marshall and Gilbert Islands north of the Equator; and south of the Equator, New Britain and New Ireland, the Admiralty Islands, the Solomon Islands, the Santa Cruz, Banks's, New Hebrides, and Loyalty Islands, with New Caledonia. The name Melanesia has been given to these last-mentioned island groups, collectively, on account of the black colour of the native people, who are also woolly-haired, and belong to an entirely different race from the Polynesians of the Samoa and Tonga Islands, and all those farther to the east, and from the Maories of New Zealand. But this remark does not apply to all the islanders of Micronesia, north of the Equator, where the inhabitants of the Pellew, Caroline, Marshall, and Gilbert Islands show a considerable admixture either of Malay, or of some race akin to the Maori, and to the Hawaiians of the Sandwich Islands, with the Negroid type of Melanesian humanity. The same is observed on the eastern coast of New Guinea.

The westernmost group is the Pellew Islands, distant only six hundred miles from the Philippines. A century ago the amiable disposition of the native race was much lauded in England, as exemplified in the person of Prince Le Boo, son of King Abba Thulle, when that youth, who died here, was brought among us by Captain Wilson, of the Antelope, who visited the Pellew Islands in 1783. One of our Illustrations shows the front of a wooden house, with its decorative carvings, which are very elaborate, like those of the Maori chiefs in New Zealand. The Pellew islanders have a strict and complicated social code, and a privileged aristocracy who must not be addressed in the language of the common people, but in a special language used at the Court. The Caroline Islands, which are scattered over a space of more than two thousand miles, are mostly formed by circular reefs of coral, surrounding lagoons, probably craters at the summit of submarine volcanoes, which are called "atolls"; but some of the islands, such as Yap, are large and rocky. They produce the bread-fruit tree, sweet potato, cocoa-nut, plantain, sugar-cane, and several other articles of food, besides the useful bamboo. The people, who are mostly of the brown Polynesian race, tattoo themselves, and wear ornaments of shell or flowers stuck in the holes they pierce in their noses and ears; they are much addicted to chewing betel. One extraordinary thing among them is the use of large round slabs of stone, with a hole made in the centre, as a substitute for money; this cumbrous currency, which is shown in two of our Illustrations, might perhaps be trundled or rolled from buyer to seller, but could not be carried in the purse, and nobody would fear to have his pocket picked by stealth. The aggregate population of the Caroline Islands does not exceed thirty thousand, and there are about ten thousand in the Marshall Islands, speaking a different language. The Gilbert or Kingsmill Islands are much more thickly peopled, and rely on fishing mainly for their support. The most valuable article of vegetable food here is the fruit of the pandang; there are no native quadrupeds on these islands except the goats, pigs, dogs, and cats that have been introduced by European visitors. We present also a view of the coast of Blanche Bay, in the larger island of New Britain, which has, with New Ireland, recently been annexed to the German Empire. These two islands, close to the north-eastern shore of New Guinea, are of limestone rock formation, and almost mountainous, the hills rising to nearly 30,0 ft. They are densely wooded, and the animals, birds, and insects are similar to those of New Guinea. The people seem to be a mixture of Papuans and of the brown race from the islands of Polynesia; they have a great diversity of languages, and are divided into castes which refuse to intermarry with each other. One singular custom they have is that of confining young girls of the higher class in a sort of cage or closed basket, made of palm leaves, during several years before they are given in marriage.

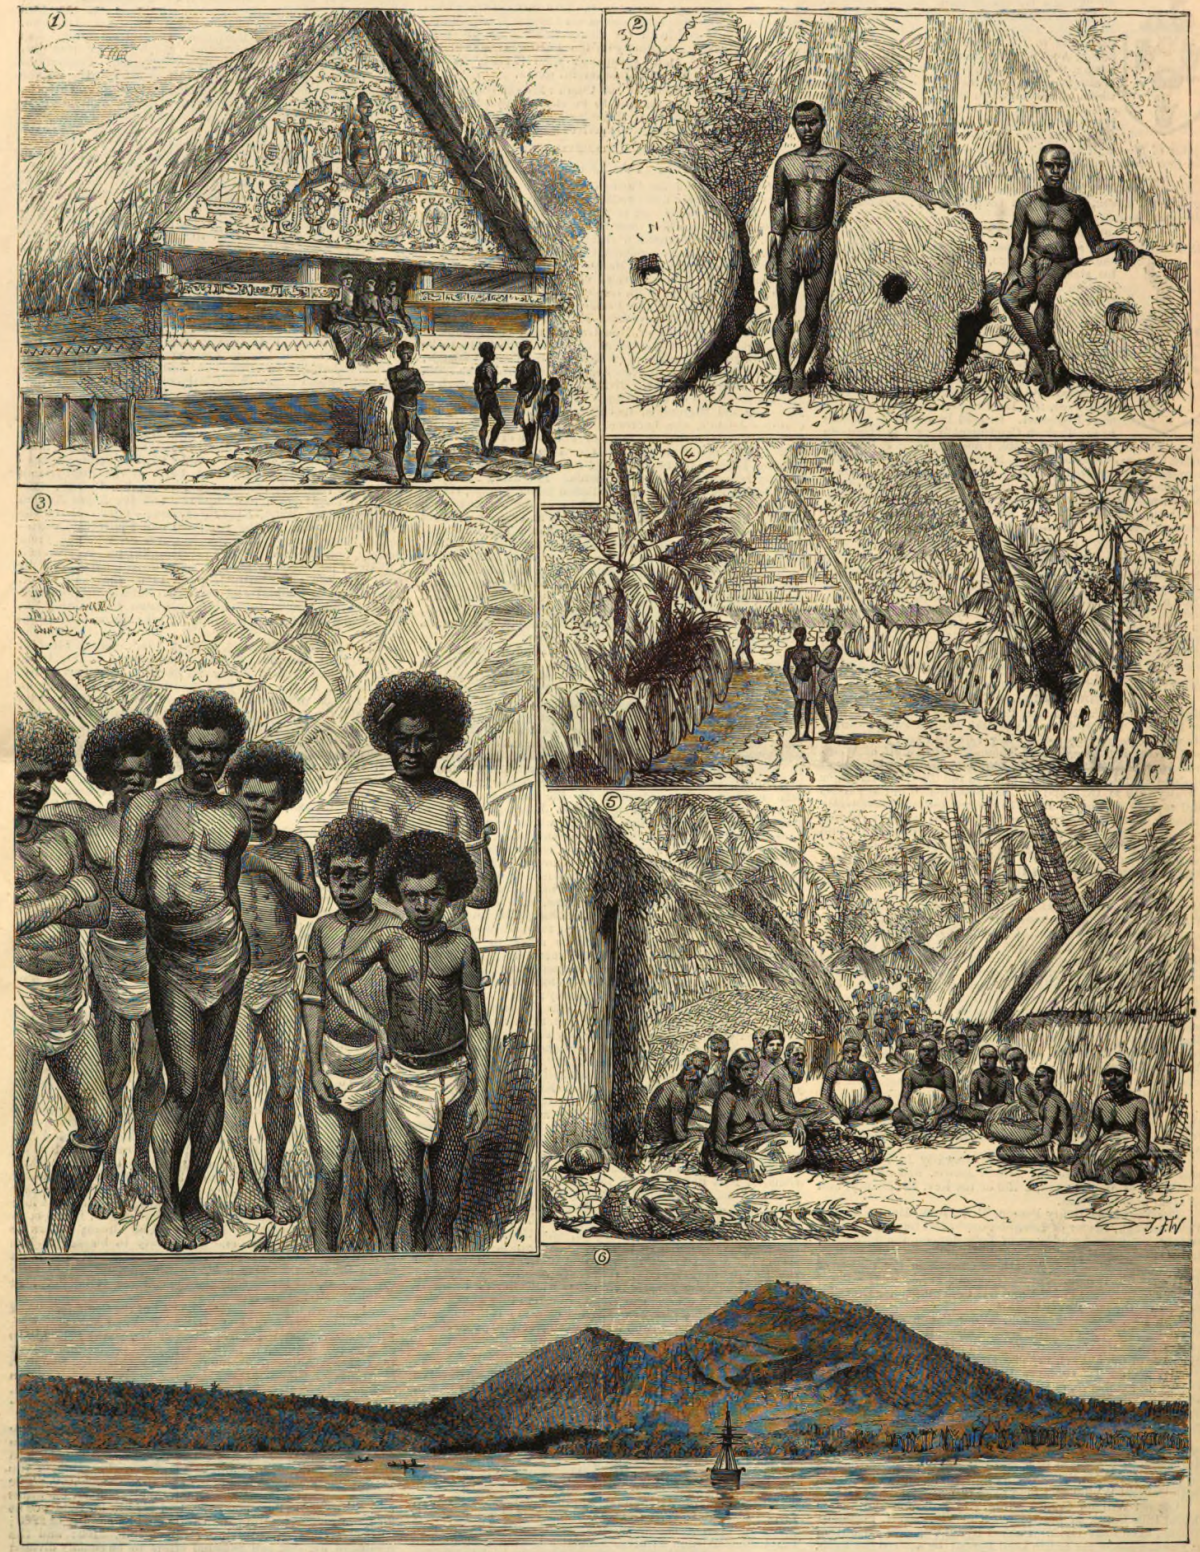
The parish of All Saints', South Lambeth, is in high favour with Royalty. Next Wednesday Princess Louise is going to open a bazaar in Mrs. Merryweather's grounds, Clapham-road; and Princess Frederica has also consented to open a large People's Flower Show and Industrial Exhibition at Springfield House, Wandsworth-road, on July 15. Both events will make the neighbourhood en fête. The objects of the Flower Show and Exhibition are to beautify the homes of the poor in this crowded parish, and to encourage both parents and children to grow flowers or to cultivate that industry in which they take especial interest. The prizes will be distributed by Lieut.-General Sir Frederick Fitzwygram, Bart, M.P., to successful competitors, on Saturday, the 18th, and all exhibitors receive a free ticket for admission on that day.

WILLS AND BEQUESTS.

The will (dated June 30, 1880), with four codicils (dated May 10, 1883; two on April 22, 1884; and July 9, 1884), of Mr. James Alexander, formerly of the firm of Messrs. Redfern, Alexander, and Co., merchants, of No. 3, Great Winchester-street, and of No. 10, Porchester-terrace, Bayswater, but late of Avenue House, Hampstead, who died on the 13th ult., was proved on the 16th inst. by John Anderson, Alexander Littlejohn, Benjamin Thomas Harding, and Philip Vanderbyl, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £365,000. The testator gives his leasehold residence at Hampstead, with all the pictures, plate, books, wines, household furniture and effects, horses and carriages, and pecuniary legacies amounting to £4000, to his wife, Mrs. Margaret Frances Wheeler Alexander, and £2000 per annum, for life, to be reduced one half in the event of her marrying again; £1000 and a house in Porchester-terrace to his daughter, Mrs. Sarah Eliza Vanderbyl; £500 to his executors Mr. Anderson, Mr. Littlejohn, and Mr. Harding; £30,000, upon trust, for his five grandchildren, as his said daughter and her husband shall jointly appoint; and many other legacies to relatives, clerks, servants, and others. He also bequeaths £19,100 in charitable legacies, of which the following is a complete list—viz., £3000 for the religious, educational, and charitable objects in connection with the Conference Hall, Mildmay-park, as Mrs. Pennefather, or her successor, shall determine; £3000 to the Refuge for Deserted Mothers and their Children; £2000 to the London Bible and Domestic Female Missions; £1000 each to the Royal Hospital for Incurables, Putney, the National Benevolent Institution, the United Kingdom Beneficent Association, the London Homœopathic Hospital, the Marylebone Presbyterian Church, and the National Refuges of Homeless and Destitute Boys, the Training-Ships Chichester and Arethusa, and Boys' and Girls' Country Homes;—£500 each to the Foreign Missions Fund of the Presbyterian Church of England, Trinity Presbyterian Church, Hampstead; the Home of Industry, Commercial-street, Spitalfields; the Evangelisation Society, the London City Mission, the British and Foreign Bible Society, and the East-End Juvenile Mission, Stepney Causeway;—£200 to the Sustentation Fund of the Presbyterian Church of England, the English Presbyterian College, Soho Hospital for Women, Soho-square; and the Royal Normal College for the Blind, Upper Norwood;—£100 each to the National Hospital for the Paralysed and Epileptic, Queens-square, Bloomsbury; the Surgical Aid Society, the Tract Society, and the Samaritan Free Hospital for Women and Children; and £500 to his wife, to be distributed by her for such religious and charitable purposes as she shall select. The residue of his real and personal estate is, in the events which have happened, to be held, upon trust, for his daughter, Mrs. Vanderbyl, for life, and then for her children as she shall appoint.

The will (dated March 20, 1858) of Admiral of the Fleet Sir George Rose Sartorius, G.C.B., Grand Cross of St. Bento D'Avis, Grand Cross of Tower and Sword, late of East Grove, Lymington, in the county of Southampton, who died on April 13 last, was proved on the 5th inst. by John Peter Theobald, the sole executor, the value of the personal estate exceeding £3800. The testator bequeaths to his wife, Dame Sophy Sartorius, his money, plate, pictures, books, household furniture, and other personal chattels. His real estate in Portugal and all his leasehold and personal estate, not specifically bequeathed to his wife, he leaves, upon trust, for her for life, and then for his children or their issue, as she shall appoint, and, in default of appointment, to his children, in equal shares.

The will (dated Oct. 23, 1884) of Mr. Frederick Swindell, late of No. 14, Royal-crescent, Brighton, who died on the 17th ult., was proved on the 8th inst. by Frederick Charles Swindell and James Dixon, the executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £146,000. The testator leaves to his wife, Mrs. Mary Georgiana Swindell, all his jewellery, plate, furniture, pictures, and other articles of household use and ornament, his carriages and horses, except race-horses or horses being reared for racing purposes, an immediate legacy of £200, and a further legacy of £20,000; to his brother Thomas £5000; and other legacies. All his real estate and the residue of the personalty he leaves to his adopted son, Frederick Charles Swindell.



The Scotch Confirmation, under seal of office of the Commissariot of Dumbarton, of the trust disposition and settlement (dated Oct. 7, 1874), with a holograph codicil, of Mr. James Cruikshank, formerly of Glasgow, and afterwards of Overdale, Bearsden, Dumbartonshire, who died at Harrogate on Oct. 9 last, granted to James Lamont, Alexander Sheriff Cooper, James Grant, Francis James Cruikshank, and James Brown Cruikshank, the executors nominate and assumed, was sealed in London on the 5th inst., the value of the personal estate in England, Scotland, and Ireland amounting to £119,000.

The will (dated Feb. 8, 1885) of Mr. Richard Ansdell, R.A., late of Collingwood Tower, Frimley, Surrey, who died on April 20 last, was proved on the 10th inst. by Mrs. Maria Ansdell, the widow, and Thomas Chester Ansdell and Gerrard Ansdell, the sons, the value of the personal estate amounting to over £49,000. The testator bequeaths £2000 to his wife; £50 each to his daughters, Mrs. Leech and Mrs. Larnach, to purchase a memento of him, they being already otherwise sufficiently provided for; and an annuity to his sister. The residue of his real and personal estate is to be held upon trust to pay the income to his wife, for life, and, subject to such life interest, for his six sons and the children of his deceased daughter, Mrs. Maria Morley.

The Scotch Confirmation, under seal of the Commissariot of Lanarkshire, of the deed of settlement (dated Nov. 28, 1868), with a codicil (dated June 8, 1881), of Mr. David Dickie, late of No. 18, Woodlands-terrace, Glasgow, Goods Manager of the Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, who died at Moffat, on March 21 last, granted to Mrs. Mary Johnston or Dickie, the widow, and four others, the executors nominate, was sealed in London on the 29th ult., the value of the personal estate in England and Scotland exceeding £42,000.

The will (dated Nov. 18, 1882) of Mr. Isaac Whitaker, late of Hessle, Yorkshire, who died on April 19 last, was proved on the 1st inst. by Benjamin Whitaker, the brother, and Benjamin West, the surviving executors, the value of the personal estate amounting to upwards of £40,000. The testator leaves to his wife, Mrs. Caroline Whitaker, his wines and consumable stores and £400, and for life his residence at Hessle, with the furniture and effects, and an annuity of £800; to his executor Mr. West, for his trouble, £100; and the residue of his real and personal estate to be equally divided between his brothers, John, Joseph, and Benjamin.

NEW BOOKS.

The author of the oft-repeated literary canon, had he not been a Frenchman, would doubtless have included the obscure as well as the wearisome style in the list of the inadmissible. Had he done so, we fear that Mr. H. Parker's Nature of the Fine Arts (London, Macmillan and Co.) must have come under the ban. We have honestly attempted to arrive at some clear idea of the author's aim; but without success. He explains at very great length how very modern is the limitation we now apply to the fine arts, and, after a still larger number of pages, leaves us as hopelessly vague as to the frontier lines of science and art as we were at the outset. Perhaps one of the most interesting and intelligible chapters of his work is that in which he discusses the value of artistic as compared with literary criticism of art. But even here, instead of keeping before us his own opinions, Mr. Parker overloads and obscures his views with long quotations from works which the world has been at some pains to forget. Nevertheless, the views he expresses on this point are often quaint. He puts very sensibly before us the question, "whether a pleasure in colours or combinations of colours and forms, of which no rational explanation is forthcoming, is or is not contemptible"; and he protests strongly, and we must also think with justice, against the claims put forward by painters that "the dignity of their art" is lowered if it is to be limited by intellectual restrictions. In discussing the origin and development of taste, Mr. Parker's theories are more startling; and although he seems to follow Shaftesbury in tracing it to physical causes, he does not subscribe wholly to that philosopher's view that all tastes have their seat in brutish pleasures. Colour-tastes, he thinks, were not originally strong among the race, but were the product of association. Green, for instance, which is the colour with which man in his earlier stages must have been most familiar, is not, Mr. Parker holds, "a very attractive colour." Blue, on the other hand, the colour of the sea and sky, is universally desirable; and its most harmonious blending with green is produced by the aid of gold or orange (the sun's rays), as seen in tropical countries. Whilst "yellow is the sacred colour of sun-worship, red is consecrated to the worship of humanity." In like manner, Mr. Parker speculates, almost at equal length, on the origin of the taste and sound, but seldom leads us to any definite results drawn from his use of the doctrine of evolution; but in treating the relations of Art and Nature, he speaks with some greater clearness, holding, with Shakspeare, the "works of art are new-born gawds . . . made and moulded of things past." They gratify that love of novelty which is part of our artificial nature; and it is this truth which gives force to the accusation that artists have the strongest propensity and the greatest interest in corrupting the Fine Arts. Mr. Parker ridicules the idea of its being possible to decide what is utterly bad or entirely noble in art, and holds that the science of taste, which has flourished so long unchallenged, has really no right to the name of science, but is a tangled skein of dogmas, moral principles, and scientific truths, out of which no science can be constructed.

The increased facilities offered by the British Museum for viewing specimens of its numismatic collection have already borne fruit. On the one hand, we hear of the foundation of a Medallists' society; and on the other, the rise of a popular literature. The want of some authoritative guide or help, long felt, has been now fairly met by a volume of papers, entitled Coins and Medals (London: Elliot Stock), edited by Mr. Stanley Lane-Poole. Each paper has been contributed by a well-known specialist, whose accurate knowledge of his subject may be accepted without discussion. In an interesting preliminary chapter on the study of coins in general, their application to the history and social life of nations is concisely urged by Mr. Reginald Stuart Poole, who shows that it is to coins that we owe the knowledge of many a lost town or king, of many a forgotten deity; whilst by them we obtain glimpses of an art which preceded all others. In the chapter on Greek coins, Mr. Barclay V. Head shows that from the earliest times down to the age of Alexander the Great Greek coins bore mythological or religious representations, being probably for the most part struck within the precincts of the temples. Philip of Macedon, though ruler of the greater part of the civilised world, in his reorganisation of the currency of his empire, stamped upon his gold money the head of the Pythian Apollo, and on the silver that of the Olympian Zeus. Under his son a change first becomes noticeable—the features of the god Herakles, under the graver of the courtier artist, assume more and more the likeness of Alexander, already in his lifetime the object of almost divine honours. Alexander's generals completed the revolution thus inaugurated, and thenceforwards the sequence of the Sovereigns who ruled over the ruins of the Macedonian Empire is unbroken. Roman coins, which are discussed by Mr. H. A. Grueber, date back, by tradition, to the age of Servius Tullius; but no specimens belonging to this period exist. The brick-shaped piece of copper, which for a long time seems to have been the chief if not only form of currency, continued to be issued far down in the Consular period, perhaps even after the introduction of the multiples and fractional parts of the as, which remained the unit of the monetary system. For a lengthy period no gold or silver coins were struck in Rome, the want being supplied by the gold and silver money of the Campania—the first silver coinage dating from B.C. 269, and the gold only from B.C. 84-82, when Sulla issued a money bearing his own name, and that of his proquæstor, L. Manlius. It is supposed that these coins, as well as those struck by Julius Cæsar in B.C. 49, were issued in Greece as rewards to their respective soldiers. Five years later, the head of Cæsar was, by order of the Senate, engraved upon the coins, and thenceforwards the head of some prominent person appeared. For instance, Brutus, immediately after the murder of Julius Cæsar, caused a coin to be struck having on one side his own head, and on the other a cap of Liberty between two daggers, and the inscription EID. MAR. We regret that space does not permit us to follow Professor Percy Gardner in his survey of Early Oriental and Indian coins, nor Mr. Stanley Lane-Poole himself in that of Mohammedan coins, a subject he has made his own, and in which his wide reading and research are brought to bear upon a very obscure branch of numismatics. Professor Terrien De La Couperie discourses pleasantly on the coins of China and Japan, and Mr. Warwick Wroth sums up with clearness and conciseness the development of medals as distinct from coins, a branch which Italian and French artists brought to the highest degree of perfection. We must not omit to mention, in conclusion, Mr. C. F. Keary's chapters on the coins of Christian Europe and English coins. They are, perhaps, somewhat sketchy, but students have the work of the late Mr. Edward Hawkins on the "Medallic History of Great Britain," just issued by the Trustees of the British Museum, and in it they will find all they need. It seems perhaps strange to us, who have for nearly fifty years lived in the contemplation of an unvarying type upon our Victorian shillings and half-crowns, to know that since the Restoration of Charles II., if not from an earlier date, the flight of years over our rulers' faces can be easily traced, as well as the various impressions conveyed by them to the different artists employed by the Mint authorities. It seems somewhat absurd to find that her Majesty's face, as now commonly circulated among her subjects, remains unchanged during nearly half a century, and that in colonies, whether of old standing or recent acquisition, no other effigy is known. We believe, too, that on more than one occasion fresh dies have been submitted for her approval, but without success.

In connection with this same subject we are glad to call attention to a work which has appeared almost simultaneously in France—M. F. Lenormant's Monnaies et Medailles (Paris, Quantin), forming another volume of that excellent series of art publications to which we have already called attention. M. Lenormant touches more upon the artistic part played by coins and medals from remote antiquity down to the present time, and whilst his work may sometimes fall short in the special knowledge which the contributors to Mr. Lane-Poole's work can bring to their subject, it has the advantage of having a definite aim worked out by a single hand. The two books, however, deserve to be taken together, more especially as, from his general point of view, the French author is able to devote more attention to the magnificent revival of medal engraving due to Vittorio Pisano and his immediate disciples, who not only found protection and encouragement in Rome and at the Courts of Italy, but were invited to foreign countries to celebrate in bronze the achievements of their hosts. In looking through the proofs of the rise and fall of the art of die-cutting, it is curious to observe that, in the coinage of both France and England, one family, that of the Roettiers—originally brought over from Holland by Charles—marked the period of the decline. If Louis XIV., who enticed away Joseph Roettiers, then engraver to the Mint, in the Tower of London, hoped by so doing to revenge himself upon the English, who had welcomed Nicolas Briot on his withdrawal from Paris, "Le Roi Soleil" must have been much disappointed. To Briot the English coinage is indebted to the designs in use during the last years of Charles I., and throughout the Commonwealth; whilst the four generations of Roettiers who succeeded each other at the Paris Monnaie destroyed in the French coinage all signs of individuality and artistic beauty.

Flower-painting will probably never lose its popularity, either as an art or an occupation, especially for ladies; and it is, therefore, not surprising that handbooks and aids to its acquirement should abound. At this moment two aspirants, Miss Blanche Hanbury and Miss Kate Sadler, put forward very well supported claims for a hearing. The Instructions for Flower-Painting (Winsor and Newton, London), by the former, form one of Mr. Vere Foster's "Advanced Series of Drawing-Books" (Blackie and Son, London, Edinburgh, &c.), are clearly expressed and simple in language. To the precepts given are added excellent examples by Miss Ada Hanbury, whose skill in flower-painting is too well recognised to need any expression of opinion on our part. Her cyclamens and narcissi are especially noteworthy, as showing the pitch of exact representation which may be acquired. Whether this be the result of the instructions, or whether the rules have been gathered from a careful study of the results obtained, matters very little, since both are placed before the reader. With Miss Sadler's Practical Instructions for Copying Flower-Studies (Winsor and Newton, London), a somewhat different plan is followed, each flower is hors texte in a portfolio apart, and can therefore be kept before the student's eye, whilst the handy book of instructions may be consulted at ease. We will not attempt to decide between the two methods, and as to the results, tastes will differ; but Miss Sadler, at all events, does not hesitate to lay down one general rule for painting after having drawn the outline of the flower. "Take some Chinese white in your brush, and fill in the whole of your outline with it . . . the foremost and lightest parts of the flowers should have two coats of white." In both books the particular colours requisite are carefully given and their use explained.

It is difficult to suppose that a work, even when as elaborately produced as is Mr. David Paton's Sketches in and Around Johnstone (Alex. Gardner, Paisley), is likely to have more than a local interest. Some of the places included, such as Merchistoun Castle, Craigends, and Barrochan, have either interesting associations or architectural beauty to commend them to tourists, as well as to neighbours; and Mr. Paton may be congratulated upon the care and skill he has displayed in making this volume attractive, in spite of the almost obtrusive simplicity of some of the buildings represented.

Miss A. M. Hopkinson's new novel, Sweet Christabel (J. and R. Maxwell), is an easy, pleasant story to read, without much romance or adventure, but without any taint of vulgarity. The heroine is not one of the mawkish girls so often called sweet because they have neither will nor opinion of their own, but a wholesome creature of flesh and blood, with a warm heart and strong feelings. All Christabel's troubles, and not a little of her strength, is caused by the fact that her father is the eminently respectable and highly cultured head of the elder branch of the Vanstone family, whose life is embittered by the accident of his only child being a girl, and his property entailed on distant cousins who for generations have been considerably worse than "ne'er-do-weels." He therefore condemns his daughter to lose her fortune if she should ever be so foolish as to marry a member of that part of the family; and the interest of the tale turns on Piers Vanstone, the eldest son of the hated heir to the ancestral acres, who is at least as good as his progenitors had been worthless. Of course, he meets and loves Christabel, and she reciprocates the feeling; and in the long-run, as honour forbids him to ask her to be his wife, she puts precedents behind her, and virtually makes the offer herself. Very cheerfully does the bride resign her wealth to her step-mother and go to India with her husband, where they live, in moderate comfort and much mutual love, till a somewhat eccentric connection leaves Piers sufficient money to enable him to leave the Army and take his wife and her children to live at Vanstone Abbey, the beloved home of her childhood. There are some very good studies of character in the book—Mrs. Gore, the pretty butterfly widow, who marries Christabel's father; Lord Henry Musgrave, who ultimately becomes her third spouse; and Mrs. Loftus, a kind-hearted woman with comical yet benevolent ideas, and a most erratic method of expressing them. It is something of a society novel, for the authoress writes of the class of people with whom she is familiar, and never ventures out of her depth.

In the month of February last Mr. David Masson delivered some lectures before the members of the Philosophical Institution of Edinburgh, which are now published in a small volume entitled Carlyle Personally and in his Writings (Macmillan and Co.). This is a vigorous but somewhat declamatory attack on Mr. Froude's notion of the duties of a biographer. "That I should have lived," exclaims the lecturer, "to hear the great and good man I had myself the privilege of knowing characterised off-hand by many immediately after his death as a boor or a brute . . . or even dismissed into oblivion more generously with the brief reflection what a noble phenomenon he had been all in all, and how much remained to be said of him when people should be at leisure! Here's a fine revolution! O the horror of it, and of the way in which it has come to pass!" And Mr. Masson attributes all the mischief to Carlyle's biographer. He holds Mr. Froude inexcusable for publishing "blistering scandals" about persons still living, and still less excusable for the "dissection" of Mrs. Carlyle. "Let it be supposed that Carlyle had given his sanction, had Mrs. Carlyle given hers? Sanction! I knew the lady; and if there can be such a thing as indignation in the unseen world over aught that passes here below; O what a face I see, what a voice I hear, as she looks down on this transaction!" Then Mr. Masson considers, with some justice, that the sayings of Carlyle assume in Mr. Froude's hands a solemnity, or fierceness of invective, not intended by the speaker, who "would dissolve his fiercest objurgations and tumults of wrath in some sudden phantasy of the sheerly absurd and a burst of uproarious laughter." And he instances the account of Carlyle's rectorial visit to Edinburgh as "a dull and dismalised blur of the facts and circumstances." But Mr. Masson, while maintaining that the life of the "Chelsea Philosopher" was happier than it is represented to be in Mr. Froude's pages, ends by calling him "the moody, agonised, and melancholy Carlyle." We may add that, in the course of an active literary life, Professor Masson has only known two men to whom he can conscientiously apply the supreme epithet of "great"—Chalmers and Carlyle. Possibly, a Scotchman's judgment of Scotchmen is not always free from partiality.

The great west window of St. Paul's Church, Margate, has been filled with painted glass from the studio of Mr. Taylor, of Berners-street, the gift of the fifteen schools attending the church: the subjects being St. Paul preaching at Athens, and St. Paul and St. Barnabas at Lystra.

C. A. A.'s New Patent Rubber-Lined Thimbles are the only really comfortable, easy fitting, and certainly the MOST PERFECT Thimbles in the market. They will neither PINCH THE FINGER, FALL OFF, nor produce that horrid feeling caused by other thimbles, when the nail comes into contact with the hard cold metal end. The Rubber lining, being pure and free from unhealthy substances, keeps the finger perfectly clean, and prevents it from being poisoned by verdigris or other dangerous metallic deposits, always found in common thimbles. They are well made, strong, of nice appearance, and will outwear three or four of the latter; in fact, they only require to be known to gain universal appreciation. Price 5d. each. Post-free, 6d. May be obtained from Drapers, Haberdashers, &c., or direct from C. A. ARBENZ, 107, 108, Great Charles-street, Birmingham.

DUTY.

DESTINY AND

SUCCESS IN LIFE.

PHYSICAL AND MENTAL TOIL.

IN A CRISIS, OR AT ANY TIME,
THE HIGHEST OF US IS BUT A SENTRY AT HIS POST.

WHAT HIGHER AIM CAN MAN
ATTAIN THAN CONQUEST
OVER HUMAN PAIN?

PHYSICAL AND MENTAL TOIL.—"I am working from between six and seven in the morning until ten and eleven, and very often twelve, o'clock at night the year round, and on a Sunday morning I wake up as usual a little after six o'clock, but I am glad that it is a day of rest. My head feels large and heavy. I take two teaspoonfuls of your FRUIT SALT about half an hour before breakfast, and after breakfast it has removed the load from my head, and I feel 'like a giant refreshed with wine.' For some years I have received much benefit from your FRUIT SALT. I have recommended it to many.—Yours, &c., A SON OF TOIL.—March, 1885.—Mr. J. C. ENO."

SUCCESS IN LIFE.—"A new invention is brought before the public, and commands success. A score of abominable imitations are immediately introduced by the unscrupulous, who, in copying the original closely enough to deceive the public, and yet not so exactly as to infringe upon legal rights, exercise an ingenuity that, employed in an original channel, could not fail to secure reputation and profit."—ADAMS.

CAUTION.—Examine each Bottle, and see that the Capsule is marked ENO'S FRUIT SALT. Without it, you have been imposed upon by a worthless imitation. Sold by all Chemists. Directions in Sixteen Languages How to Prevent Disease. Protection in every Country.

By J. C. ENO'S PATENT.

Accommodates 500 Guests.

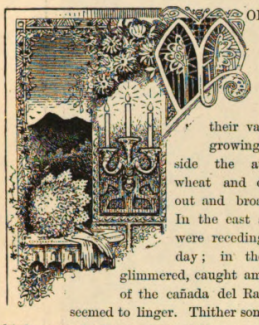
By Bret Harte.



For some moments man and beast kept an equal pace and gait with a strange similarity of appearance and expression.—CHAP. I.

M A R U J A.

By Bret Harte.

Author of "The Luck of Roaring Camp," "Gabriel Conroy," "Flip," &c.

MORNING was breaking on the high road to San José. The long lines of dusty, level track were beginning to extend their vanishing point in the growing light; on either side the awakening fields of wheat and oats were stretching out and broadening to the sky. In the east and south the stars were receding before the coming day; in the west a few still glimmered, caught among the bosky hills of the cañada del Raimundo, where night seemed to linger. Thither some obscure, low-flying birds were slowly winging; thither a grey coyote, overtaken by the morning, was awkwardly limping. And thither a tramping wayfarer turned, ploughing through the dust of the highway still unslaked by the dewless night, to climb the fence and likewise seek the distant cover.

For some moments man and beast kept an equal pace and gait with a strange similarity of appearance and expression; the coyote bearing that resemblance to his more civilised and harmless congener, the dog, which the tramp bore to the ordinary pedestrian, but both exhibiting the same characteristics of lazy vagabondage and semi-lawlessness; the coyote's slouching amble and uneasy stealthiness being repeated in the tramp's shuffling step and sidelong glances. Both were young, and physically vigorous, but both displayed the same vacillating and awkward disinclination to direct effort. They continued thus half a mile apart unconscious of each other, until the superior faculties of the brute warned him of the contiguity of aggressive civilisation, and he cantered off suddenly to the right, fully five minutes before the barking of dogs caused the man to make a detour to the left to avoid entrance upon a cultivated domain that lay before him.

The trail he took led to one of the scant water-courses that issued, half spent, from the cañada, to fade out utterly on the hot June plain. It was thickly bordered with willows and alders, that made an arboured and feasible path through the dense woods and undergrowth. He continued along it as if aimlessly; stopping from time to time to look at different objects in a dull mechanical fashion, as if rather to prolong his useless hours, than from any curious instinct, and to occasionally dip in the unfrequent pools of water the few crusts of bread he had taken from his pocket. Even this appeared to be suggested more by a coincidence of material in the bread and water, than from the promptings of hunger. At last he reached a cup-like hollow in the hills lined with wild clover and thick with resinous odours. Here he crept under a manzanita-bush and disposed himself to sleep. The act showed he was already familiar with the local habits of his class, who used the unfailing dry starlit nights for their wanderings, and spent the hours of glaring sunshine asleep or resting in some wayside shadow.

Meanwhile, the light quickened, and gradually disclosed the form and outline of the adjacent domain. An avenue cut through a park-like wood, carefully cleared of the undergrowth of gigantic ferns peculiar to the locality, led to the entrance of the cañada. Here began a vast terrace of lawn, broken up by enormous bouquets of flower-beds bewildering in colour and profusion, from which again rose the flowering vines and trailing shrubs that hid pillars, verandah, and even the long façade of a great and dominant mansion. But the delicacy of floral outlines running to the capitals of columns and at times mounting to the pediment of the roof, the opulence of flashing colour or the massing of tropical foliage, could not deprive it of the imperious dignity of size and space. Much of this was due to the fact that the original casa—an adobe house of no mean pretensions, dating back to the early Spanish occupation—had been kept intact, sheathed in a shell of dark-red wood, and still retaining its patio, or inner courtyard, surrounded by low galleries, while additions, greater in extent than the main building, had been erected—not as wings and projections, but massed upon it on either side, changing its rigid square outlines to a vague parallelogram. While the patio retained the Spanish conception of al fresco seclusion, a vast colonnade of verandah on the southern side was a concession to American taste, and its breadth gave that depth of shadow to the inner rooms which had been lost in the thinner shell of the new erection. Its cloistered gloom was lightened by the red fires of cardinal flowers dropping from the roof, by the yellow sunshine of the jessamine creeping up the columns, by billows of heliotropes, breaking over its base as a purple sea. Nowhere else did the opulence of this climate of blossoms show itself as vividly. Even the Castilian roses, that grew as vines along the east front, the fuchsias, that attained the dignity of trees, in the patio, or the four or five monster passion-vines that bestarred the low western wall, and told over and over again their mystic story—paled before the sensuous glory of the south verandah.

As the sun arose, that part of the quiet house first touched by its light seemed to waken. A few lounging peons and servants made their appearance at the entrance of the patio, occasionally reinforced by an earlier life from the gardens and stables. But the south façade of the building had not apparently gone to bed at all: lights were still burning dimly in the large ball-room; a tray with glasses stood upon the verandah near one of the open French windows, and further on, a half-shut yellow fan lay like a fallen leaf. The sound of carriage-wheels on the gravel terrace brought with it voices and laughter and the swiftly passing vision of a char-à-bancs filled with muffled figures bending low to avoid the direct advances of the sun.

As the carriage rolled away, four men lounged out of a window on the verandah, shading their eyes against the level beams. One was still in evening dress, and one in the uniform of a captain of artillery; the others had already changed their gala attire; the elder of the party having assumed those extravagant tweeds which the tourist from Great Britain usually offers as a gentle concession to inferior yet more florid civilisation. Nevertheless, he beamed back heartily on the sun, and remarked, in a pleasant Scotch accent, that: Did they know it was very extraordinary how clear the morning was, so free from clouds and mist and fog? The young man in evening dress fluently agreed to the facts, and suggested, in idiomatic French-English, that one comprehended that the bed was an insult to one's higher nature and an ingratitude to their gracious hostess, who had spread out this lovely garden and walks for their pleasure; that nothing was more beautiful than the dew sparkling on the rose, or the matin song of the little birds.

The other young man here felt called upon to point out the fact that there was no dew in California, and that the birds did not sing in that part of the country. The foreign young gentleman received this statement with pain and astonishment as to the fact, with passionate remorse as to his own ignorance. But still, as it was a charming day, would not his gallant friend, the Captain here, accept the challenge of the brave Englishman, and "walk him" for the glory of his flag and a thousand pounds?

The gallant Captain, unfortunately, believed that if he walked out in his uniform he would suffer some delay from being interrogated by wayfarers as to the locality of the circus he would be pleasantly supposed to represent, even if he escaped being shot as a rare California bird by the foreign sporting contingent. In these circumstances, he would simply lounge around the house until his carriage was ready.

Much as it pained him to withdraw from such amusing companions, the foreign young gentleman here felt that he, too, would retire for the present to change his garments, and glided back through the window at the same moment that the young officer carelessly stepped from the verandah and lounged towards the shrubbery.

"They've been watching each other for the last hour. I wonder what's up?" said the young man who remained.

The remark, without being confidential, was so clearly the first sentence of natural conversation that the Scotchman, although relieved, said, "Eh, man?" a little cautiously.

"It's as clear as this sunshine that Captain Carroll and Garnier are each particularly anxious to know what the other is doing or intends to do this morning."

"Why did they separate, then?" asked the other.

"That's a mere blind. Garnier's looking through his window now at Carroll, and Carroll is aware of it."

"Eh!" said the Scotchman, with good-humoured curiosity. "Is it a quarrel? Nothing serious, I hope. No revolvers and bowie-knives, man, before breakfast, eh?"

"No," laughed the younger man. "No! To do Maruja justice, she generally makes a fellow too preposterous to fight. I see, you don't understand. You're a stranger; I'm an old habitué of the house—let me explain. Both of these men are in love with Maruja; or, worse than that, they firmly believe her to be in love with them."

"But Miss Maruja is the eldest daughter of our hostess, is she not?" said the Scotchman; "and I understood from one of the young ladies that the Captain had come down from the Fort particularly to pay court to Miss Amita, the beauty."

"Possibly. But that wouldn't prevent Maruja from flirting with him."

"Eh! but are you not mistaken, Mr. Raymond? Certainly a more quiet, modest, and demure young lassie I never met."

"That's because she sat out two waltzes with you, and let you do the talking, while she simply listened."

The elder man's fresh colour for an instant heightened, but he recovered himself with a good-humoured laugh. "Likely—likely. She's a capital good listener."

"You're not the first man that found her eloquent. Stanton, your banking friend, who never talks of anything but mines and stocks, says she's the only woman who has any conversation; and we can all swear that she never said two words to him the whole time she sat next to him at dinner. But she looked at him as if she had. Why, man, woman, and child all give her credit for any grace that pleases themselves. And why? Because she's clever enough not to practise any one of them—as graces. I don't know the girl that claims less, and gets more. For instance, you don't call her pretty . . . ?"

"Wait a bit. Ye'll not get on so fast, my young friend: I'm not prepared to say that she's not," returned the Scotchman, with good-humoured yet serious caution.

"But you would have been prepared yesterday, and have said it. She can produce the effect of the prettiest girl here, and without challenging comparison. Nobody thinks of her—everybody experiences her."

"You're an enthusiast, Mr. Raymond. As an habitué of the house, of course, you"——

"Oh, my time came with the rest," laughed the young man, with unaffected frankness. "It's about two years ago now."

"I see—you were not a marrying man."

"Pardon me—it was because I was."

The Scotchman looked at him curiously.

"Maruja is an heiress. I am a mining engineer."

"But, my dear fellow, I thought that in your country"——

"In my country, yes. But we are standing on a bit of old Spain. This land was given to Doña Maria Saltonstall's ancestors by Charles V. Look around you. This verandah, this larger shell of the ancient casa, is the work of the old Salem whaling captain that she married, and is all that is American here. But the heart of the house, as well as the life that circles around the old patio, is Spanish. The Doña's family, the Estudillos and Guitierrez, always looked down upon this alliance with the Yankee captain, though it brought improvement to the land, and increased its value forty-fold, and since his death ever opposed any further foreign intervention. Not that that would weigh much with Maruja if she took a fancy to anyone; Spanish as she is throughout, in thought and grace and feature, there is enough of the old Salem witches' blood in her to defy law and authority in following an unhallowed worship. There are no sons; she is the sole heiress of the house and estate—though, according to the native custom, her sisters will be separately portioned from the other property, which is very large."

"Then the Captain might still make a pretty penny on Amita," said the Scotchman.

"If he did not risk and lose it all on Maruja. There is enough of the old Spanish jealousy in the blood to make even the gentle Amita never forgive his momentary defection."

Something in his manner made the Scotchman think that Raymond spoke from baleful experience. How else could this attractive young fellow, educated abroad and a rising man in his profession, have failed to profit by his contiguity to such advantages, and the fact of his being an evident favourite?

"But with this opposition on the part of the relatives to any further alliances with your countrymen, why does our hostess expose her daughters to their fascinating influence?" said the elder man, glancing at his companion. "The girls seem to have the usual American freedom."

"Perhaps they are therefore the less likely to give it up to the first man who asks them. But the Spanish duenna still survives in the family—the more awful because invisible. It's a mysterious fact that as soon as a fellow becomes particularly attached to any one—except Maruja—he receives some intimation from Perco."

"What! the butler? That Indian-looking fellow? A servant?"

"Pardon me—the mayordomo. The old confidential servitor who stands in loco parentis. No one knows what he says. If the victim appeals to the mistress, she is indisposed;—you know she has such bad health. If in his madness he makes a confidante of Maruja, that finishes him."

"How?"

"Why, he ends by transferring his young affections to her—with the usual result."

"Then you don't think our friend the Captain has had this confidential butler ask his intentions yet?"

"I don't think it will be necessary," said the other, drily.

"Umph! Meantime, the Captain has just vanished through yon shrubbery. I suppose that's the end of the mysterious espionage you have discovered. No! De'il take it! but there's that Frenchman popping out of the myrtle-bush. How did the fellow get there? And, bless me! here's our lassie, too!"

"Yes!" said Raymond, in a changed voice, "It's Maruja!"

She had approached so noiselessly along the bank that bordered the verandah, gliding from pillar to pillar as she paused before each to search for some particular flower, that both men felt an uneasy consciousness. But she betrayed no indication of their presence by look or gesture. So absorbed and abstracted she seemed that, by a common instinct, they both drew nearer the window, and silently waited for her to pass or recognise them.

She halted a few paces off to fasten a flower in her girdle. A small youthful figure, in a pale yellow dress, lacking even the maturity of womanly outline. The full oval of her face, the straight line of her back, a slight boyishness in the contour of her hips, the infantine smallness of her sandalled feet and narrow hands, were all suggestive of fresh, innocent, amiable youth—and nothing more.

Forgetting himself, the elder man mischievously crushed his companion against the wall in mock virtuous indignation. "Eh, Sir," he whispered, with an accent that broadened with his feelings. "Eh, but look at the puir wee lassie! Will ye no be ashamed o' yerself for putting the tricks of a Circe on sic a honest gentle bairn. Why, man, you 'll be seein' the sign of a limb of Satan in a bit thing with the mother's milk not yet out of her! She a flirt, speerin' at men, with that modest downcast air? I 'm ashamed of ye, Mister Raymond. She 's only thinking of her breakfast, puir thing, and not of yon callant. Another sacrilegious word and I'll expose you to her. Have ye no pity on youth and innocence?"

"Let me up," groaned Raymond, feebly, "and I 'll tell you how old she is. Hush—she 's looking."

The two men straightened themselves. She had, indeed, lifted her eyes towards the window. They were beautiful eyes, and charged with something more than their own beauty. With a deep brunette setting even to the darkened cornea, the pupils were blue as the sky above them. But they were lit with another intelligence. The soul of the Salem whaler looked out of the passion-darkened orbits of the mother, and was resistless.

She smiled recognition of the two men with sedate girlishness, and a foreign inclination of the head over the flowers she was holding. Her straight, curveless mouth became suddenly charming with the parting of her lips over her white teeth, and left the impress of the smile in a lighting of the whole face even after it had passed. Then she moved away. At the same moment Garnier approached her.

"Come away, man, and have our walk," said the Scotchman, seizing Raymond's arm. "We 'll not spoil that fellow's sport."

"No; but she will, I fear. Look, Mr. Buchanan, if she hasn't given him her flowers to carry to the house while she waits here for the Captain!"

"Come away, scoffer!" said Buchanan, good-humouredly, locking his arm in the young man's and dragging him from the verandah towards the avenue, "and keep your observations for breakfast."

CHAPTER II.

In the mean time, the young officer who had disappeared in the shrubbery, whether he had or had not been a spectator of the scene, exhibited some signs of agitation. He walked rapidly on, occasionally switching the air with a wand of willow, from which he had impatiently plucked the leaves, through an alley of ceanothus until he reached a little thicket of evergreens, which seemed to oppose his further progress. Turning to one side, however, he quickly found an entrance to a labyrinthine walk, which led him at last to an open space and a rustic summer-house that stood beneath a gnarled and venerable pear-tree. The summer-house was a quaint stockade of dark madroño boughs thatched with red-wood bark, strongly suggestive of deeper woodland shadow. But in strange contrast, the floor, table, and benches were thickly strewn with faded rose-leaves, scattered as if in some riotous play of children. Captain Carroll brushed them aside hurriedly with his impatient foot, glanced around hastily, then threw himself on the rustic bench at full length, and twisted his moustache between his nervous fingers. Then he rose as suddenly, with a few white petals impaled on his gilded spurs, and stepped quickly into the open sunlight.

He must have been mistaken! Everything was quiet around him, the far-off sound of wheels in the avenue came faintly, but nothing more.

His eye fell upon the pear-tree, and even in his preoccupation he was struck with the signs of its extraordinary age. Twisted out of all proportion, and knotted with excrescences, it was supported by iron bands and heavy stakes, as if to prop up its senile decay. He tried to interest himself in the various initials and symbols deeply carved in bark, now swollen and half obliterated. As he turned back to the summer-house, he for the first time noticed that the ground rose behind it into a long undulation, on the crest of which the same singular profusion of rose-leaves were scattered. It struck him as being strangely like a gigantic grave, and that the same idea had occurred to the fantastic dispenser of the withered flowers. He was still looking at it, when a rustle in the undergrowth made his heart beat expectantly. A slinking grey shadow crossed the undulation and disappeared in the thicket. It was a coyote. At any other time the extraordinary appearance of this vivid impersonation of the wilderness, so near a centre of human civilisation and habitation, would have filled him with wonder. But he had room for only a single thought now. Would she come?

Five minutes passed. He no longer waited in the summer-house, but paced impatiently before the entrance to the labyrinth. Another five minutes. He was deceived, undoubtedly. She and her sisters were probably waiting for him and laughing at him on the lawn. He ground his heel into the clover, and threw his switch into the thicket. Yet he would give her one—only one moment more.

"Captain Carroll!"

The voice had been and was to him the sweetest in the world; but even a stranger could not have resisted the spell of its musical inflection. He turned quickly. She was advancing towards him from the summer-house.

"Did you think I was coming that way—where everybody could follow me?" she laughed, softly. "No; I came through the thicket over there," indicating the direction with her flexible shoulder, "and nearly lost my slipper and my eyes—look!" She threw back the inseparable lace shawl from her blonde head, and showed a spray of myrtle clinging like a broken wreath to her forehead. The young officer remained gazing at her silently.

"I like to hear you speak my name," he said, with a slight hesitation in his breath. "Say it again."

"Car-roll, Car-roll, Car-roll," she murmured gently to herself two or three times, as if enjoying her own native trilling of the r's. "It 's a pretty name. It sounds like a song. Don Carroll, eh! El Capitan Don Carroll."

"But my first name is Henry," he said, faintly.

"'Enry—that 's not so good. Don Enrico will do. But El Capitan Carroll is best of all. I must have it always: El Capitan Carroll!"

"Always?" He coloured like a boy.

"Why not?" He was confusedly trying to look through her brown lashes; she was parrying him with the steel of her father's glance. "Come! Well! Captain Carroll! It was not to tell me your name—that I knew already was pretty—Car-roll!" she murmured again, caressing him with her lashes; "it was not for this that you asked me to meet you face to face in this—cold"—she made a movement of drawing her lace over her shoulders—"cold daylight. That belonged to the lights and the dance and the music of last night. It is not for this you expect me to leave my guests, to run away from Monsieur Garnier, who pays compliments, but whose name is not pretty—from Mr. Raymond, who talks of me when he can't talk to me. They will say, this Captain Carroll could say all that before them."

"But if they knew," said the young officer, drawing closer to her with a paling face but brightening eyes, "if they knew I had anything else to say, Miss Saltonstall—something—pardon me—did I hurt your hand?—something for her alone—is there one of them that would have the right to object? Do not think me foolish, Miss Saltonstall—but—I beg—I implore you to tell me before I say more."

"Who would have a right?" said Maruja, withdrawing her hand but not her dangerous eyes. "Who would dare forbid you talking to me of my sister? I have told you that Amita is free—as we all are."

Captain Carroll fell back a few steps and gazed at her with a troubled face. "Is it possible that you have misunderstood, Miss Saltonstall?" he faltered. "Do you still think it is Amita that I"——he stopped and added passionately, "Do you remember what I told you?—have you forgotten last night?"

"Last night was—last night!" said Maruja, slightly lifting her shoulders. "One makes love at night—one marries in daylight. In the music, in the flowers, in the moonlight, one says everything; in the morning one has breakfast—when one is not asked to have councils of war with captains and commandantes. You would speak of my sister, Captain Car-roll—go on. Doña Amita Carroll sounds very, very pretty. I shall not object." She held out both her hands to him, threw her head back, and smiled.

He seized her hands passionately. "No, no! you shall hear me—you shall understand me. I love you, Maruja—you, and you alone. God knows I cannot help it—God knows I would not help it if I could. Hear me. I will be calm. No one can hear us where we stand. I am not mad. I am not a traitor! I frankly admired your sister. I came here to see her. Beyond that, I swear to you, I am guiltless to her—to you. Even she knows no more of me than that. I saw you, Maruja. From that moment I have thought of nothing—dreamed of nothing else."

"That is—three, four, five days and one afternoon ago! You see, I remember. And now you want—what?"

"To let me love you, and you only. To let me be with you. To let me win you in time, as you should be won. I am not mad, though I am desperate. I know what is due to your station and mine—even while I dare to say I love you. Let me hope, Maruja, I only ask to hope."

She looked at him until she had absorbed all the burning fever of his eyes, until her ears tingled with his passionate voice, and then—she shook her head.

"It cannot be, Carroll—no! never!"

He drew himself up under the blow with such simple and manly dignity that her eyes dropped for the moment. "There is another, then?" he said, sadly.

"There is no one I care for better than you. No! Do not be foolish. Let me go. I tell you that because you can be nothing to me—you understand, to me. To my sister Amita, yes."

The young soldier raised his head coldly. "I have pressed you hard, Miss Saltonstall—too hard, I know, for a man who has already had his answer; but I did not deserve this. Good-bye."

"Stop," she said, gently. "I meant not to hurt you, Captain Carroll. If I had, it is not thus I would have done. I need not have met you here. Would you have loved me the less if I had avoided this meeting?"

He could not reply. In the depths of his miserable heart, he knew that he would have loved her the same.

"Come," she said, laying her hand softly on his arm, "do not be angry with me for putting you back only five days to where you were when you first entered our house. Five days is not much of happiness or sorrow to forget, is it, Carroll—Captain Carroll?" Her voice died away in a faint sigh. "Do not be angry with me, if—knowing you could be nothing more—I wanted you to love my sister, and my sister to love you. We should have been good friends—such good friends."

"Why do you say, 'Knowing it could be nothing more'?" said Carroll, grasping her hand suddenly. "In the name of Heaven, tell me what you mean!"

"I mean I cannot marry unless I marry one of my mother's race. That is my mother's wish, and the will of her relations. You are an American, not of Spanish blood."

"But surely this is not your determination?"

She shrugged her shoulders. "What would you? It is the determination of my people."

"But knowing this"—— he stopped; the quick blood rose to his face.

"Go on, Captain Carroll. You would say, Knowing this, why did I not warn you? Why did I not say to you when we first met 'You have come to address my sister; do not fall in love with me—I cannot marry a foreigner.'"

"You are cruel, Maruja. But, if that is all, surely this prejudice can be removed? Why, your mother married a foreigner—an American."

"Perhaps that is why," said the girl, quietly. She cast down her long lashes, and with the point of her satin slipper smoothed out the soft leaves of the clover at her feet. "Listen; shall I tell you the story of our house? Stop! some one is coming. Don't move; remain as you are. If you care for me, Carroll, collect yourself, and don't let that man think he has found us ridiculous." Her voice changed from its tone of slight caressing pleading to one of suppressed pride. "He will not laugh much, Captain Carroll; truly, no."

The figure of Garnier, bright, self-possessed, courteous, appeared at the opening of the labyrinth. Too well-bred to suggest, even in complimentary raillery, a possible sentimental situation, his politeness went further. It was so kind in them to guide an awkward stranger by their voices to the places where he could not stupidly intrude!

"You are just in time to interrupt or to hear a story that I have been threatening to tell," she said, composedly; "an old Spanish legend of this house. You are in the majority now, you two, and can stop me if you choose. Thank you. I warn you it is stupid; it isn't new; but it has the excuse of being suggested by this very spot." She cast a quick look of subtle meaning at Carroll, and throughout her recital appealed more directly to him, in a manner delicately yet sufficiently marked to partly soothe his troubled spirit.

"Captain Carroll!" He turned quickly. She was advancing towards him from the summer-house.—CHAP. II.

"Far back, in the very old times, Caballeros," said Maruja, standing by the table in mock solemnity, and rapping upon it with her fan, "this place was the home of the coyote. Big and little, father and mother, Señor and Señora Coyotes, and the little muchacho coyotes, had their home in the dark cañada, and came out over these fields, yellow with wild oats and red with poppies, to seek their prey. They were happy. For why? They were the first; they had no history, you comprehend, no tradition. They married as they liked" (with a glance at Carroll), "nobody objected; they increased and multiplied. But the plains were fertile; the game was plentiful; it was not fit that it should be for the beasts alone. And so, in the course of time, an Indian chief, a heathen, Koorotora, built his wigwam here."

"I beg your pardon," said Garnier, in apparent distress, "but I caught the gentleman's name imperfectly."

Fully aware that the questioner only wished to hear again her musical enunciation of the consonants, she repeated "Koorotora" with an apologetic glance at Carroll and went on. "This gentleman had no history or tradition to bother him either; whatever Señor Coyote thought of the matter, he contented himself with robbing Señor Koorotora's wigwam when he could, and skulking around the Indian's camp at night. The old chief prospered, and made many journeys round the country, but always kept his camp here. This lasted until the time when the holy Fathers came from the South and Portala, as you have all read, uplifted the wooden Cross on the seacoast over there, and left it for the heathens to wonder at. Koorotora saw it on one of his journeys, and came back to the cañada full of this wonder. Now, Koorotora had a wife."

"Ah, we shall commence now. We are at the beginning. This is better than Señora Coyota," said Garnier, cheerfully.

"Naturally, she was anxious to see the wonderful object. She saw it, and she saw the holy Fathers, and they converted her against the superstitious heathenish wishes of her husband. And more than that, they came here"——

"And converted the land also; is it not so? It was a lovely site for a mission," interpolated Garnier, politely.

"They built a mission and brought as many of Koorotora's people as they could into the sacred fold. They brought them in in a queer fashion sometimes, it is said; dragoons from the Presidio, Captain Carroll, lassooing them and bringing them in at the tails of their horses. All except Koorotora. He defied them; he cursed them and his wife in his wicked heathenish fashion, and said that they too should lose the mission through the treachery of some woman, and that the coyote should yet prowl through the ruined walls of the church. The holy Fathers pitied the wicked man—and built themselves a lovely garden. Look at that pear-tree! There is all that is left of it!"

She turned with a mock heroic gesture, and pointed her fan to the pear-tree. Garnier lifted his hands in equally simulated wonder. A sudden recollection of the coyote of the morning recurred to Carroll uneasily. "And the Indians," he said, with an effort to shake off the feeling; "they too have vanished."

"All that remained of them is in yonder mound. It is the grave of the chief and his people. He never lived to see the fulfilment of his prophecy. For it was a year after his death that our ancestor, Mañuel Guitierrez, came from old Spain to the Presidio with a grant of twenty leagues to settle where he chose. Doña Maria Guitierrez took a fancy to the cañada. But it was a site already in possession of the Holy Church. One night, through treachery, it was said, the guards were withdrawn and the Indians entered the mission, slaughtered the lay brethren, and drove away the priests. The Commandant at the Presidio retook the place from the heathens, but on representation to the Governor that it was indetensible for the peaceful Fathers without a large military guard, the official ordered the removal of the mission to Santa Cruz, and Don Mañuel settled his twenty leagues grant in the cañada. Whether he or Doña Maria had anything to do with the Indian uprising no one knows, but Father Pedro never forgave them. He is said to have declared at the foot of the altar that the curse of the Church was on the land, and that it should always pass into the hands of the stranger."

"And that was long ago, and the property is still in the family," said Carroll, hurriedly, answering Maruja's eyes.

"In the last hundred years there have been no male heirs," continued Maruja, still regarding Carroll. "When my mother, who was the eldest daughter, married Don José Saltonstall against the wishes of the family, it was said that the curse would fall. Sure enough, Caballeros, it was that year that the forged grants of Michelторrena were discovered; and in our lawsuit your Government, Captain, handed over ten leagues of the llano land to the Doctor West, our neighbour."

"Ah, the grey-headed gentleman who lunched here the other day? You are friends, then? You bear no malice?" said Garnier.

"What would you?" said Maruja, with a slight shrug of her shoulders. "He paid his money to the forger. Your corregidores upheld him, and said it was no forgery," she continued, to Carroll.

In spite of the implied reproach, Carroll felt relieved. He began to be impatient of Garnier's presence, and longed to renew his suit. Perhaps his face showed something of this, for Maruja added, with mock demureness, "It 's always dreadful to be the eldest sister; but think what it is to be in the direct line of a curse! Now, there 's Amita—she 's free to do as she likes, with no family responsibility; while poor me!" She dropped her eyes, but not until they had again sought and half-reproved the brightening eyes of Carroll.

"But," said Garnier, with a sudden change from his easy security and courteous indifference to an almost harsh impatience, "you do not mean to say, Mademoiselle, that you have the least belief in this rubbish, this ridiculous canard?"

Maruja's straight mouth quickly tightened over her teeth. She shot a significant glance at Carroll, but instantly resumed her former manner.

"It matters little what a foolish girl like myself believes. The rest of the family, even the servants and children, all believe it. It is a part of their religion. Look at these flowers around the pear-tree and scattered on that Indian mound. They regularly find their way there on saints' days and festas. They are not rubbish, Monsieur Garnier; they are propitiatory sacrifices. Pereo would believe that a temblor would swallow up the casa if we should ever forego these customary rites. Is it a mere absurdity that forced my father to build these modern additions around the heart of the old adobe house, leaving it untouched, so that the curse might not be fulfilled even by implication?"

She had assumed an air of such pretty earnestness and passion; her satin face was illuminated as by some softly sensuous light within more bewildering than mere colour, that Garnier, all devoted eyes and courteous blandishment, broke out—"But this curse must fall harmlessly before the incarnation of blessing; Miss Saltonstall has no more to fear than the angels. She is the one predestined through her charm, through her goodness, to lift it for ever."

Carroll could not have helped echoing the aspirations of his rival, had not the next words of his mistress thrilled him with superstitious terror.

"A thousand thanks, Señor. Who knows? But I shall have warning when it falls. A day or two before the awful invader arrives, a coyote suddenly appears in broad daylight, mysteriously, near the casa. This midnight marauder, now banished to the thickest cañon, comes again to prowl around the home of his ancestors. Caramba! Señor Captain, what are you staring at? You frighten me! Stop it, I say!"

She had turned upon him, stamping her little foot in quite a frightened, childlike way.

"Nothing," laughed Carroll, the quick blood returning to his cheek. "But you must not be angry with one for being quite carried away with your dramatic intensity. By Jove! I thought I could see the whole thing while you were speaking; the old Indian, the priest and the coyote!" His eyes sparkled. The wild thought had occurred to him that perhaps, in spite of himself, he was the young woman's predestined fate, and in the very selfishness of his passion he smiled at the mere material loss of lands and prestige that would follow it. "Then the coyote has always preceded some change in the family fortunes?" he asked boldly.

"On my mother's wedding-day," said Maruja, in a lower voice, "after the party had come from church to supper in the old casa, my father asked, 'What dog is that under the table?' When they lifted the cloth to look, a coyote rushed from the very midst of the guests and dashed out across the patio. No one knew how or when he entered."

"Heaven grant that we do not find he has eaten our breakfast!" said Garnier, gaily, "for I judge it is waiting us. I hear your sister's voice among the others crossing the lawn. Shall we tear ourselves away from the tombs of our ancestors, and join them?"

"Not as I am looking now, thank you," said Maruja, throwing the lace over her head. "I shall not submit myself to a comparison of their fresher faces and toilettes by you two gentlemen. Go you both and join them. I shall wait and say an Ave for the soul of Koorotora and slip back alone the way I came."

She had steadily evaded the pleading glance of Carroll, and though her bright face and unblemished toilette showed the inefficiency of her excuse, it was evident that her wish to be alone was genuine and without coquetry. They could only lift their hats and turn regretfully away.

As the red cap of the young officer disappeared amidst the evergreen foliage, the young woman uttered a faint sigh, which she repeated a moment after as a slight nervous yawn. Then she opened and shut her fan once or twice, striking the sticks against her little pale palm, and then, gathering the lace under her oval chin with one hand and catching her fan and skirt with the other, bent her head and dipped into the bushes. She came out on the other side near a low fence, that separated the park from a narrow lane which communicated with the high road beyond. As she neared the fence a slinking figure limped along the lane before her. It was the tramp of the early morning.

They raised their heads at the same moment and their eyes met. The tramp, in that clearer light, showed a spare, but bent figure, roughly clad in a miner's shirt and canvas trousers, splashed and streaked with soil, and half hidden in a ragged blue cast-off army overcoat lazily hanging from one shoulder. His thin sun-burnt face was not without a certain sullen suspicious intelligence, and a look of half-sneering defiance. He stopped, as a startled, surly animal might have stopped at some unusual object, but did not exhibit any other discomposure. Maruja stopped at the same moment on her side of the fence.

The tramp looked at her deliberately, and then slowly lowered his eyes. "I 'm looking for the San José road, hereabouts. Ye don't happen to know it?" he said, addressing himself to the top of the fence.

It had been said that it was not Maruja's way to encounter man, woman, or child, old or young, without an attempt at subjugation. Strong in her power and salient with fascination, she leaned gently over the fence, and with the fan raised to her delicate ear, made him repeat his question under the soft fire of her fringed eyes. He did so, but incompletely, and with querulous laziness.

"Lookin'—for—San José road—here'bouts."

"The road to San José," said Maruja, with gentle slowness, as if not unwilling to protract the conversation, "is about two miles from here. It is the high road to the left fronting the plain. There is another way, if"——

"Don't want it! Mornin'."

He dropped his head suddenly forward, and limped away in the sunlight.

CHAPTER III.

BREAKFAST, usually a movable feast at La Mision Perdida, had been prolonged until past mid-day; the last of the dance guests had flown, and the home party—with the exception of Captain Carroll, who had returned to duty at his distant post—were dispersing; some as riding cavalcades to neighbouring points of interest; some to visit certain remarkable mansions which the wealth of a rapid civilisation had erected in that fertile valley. One of these in particular, the work of a breathless millionaire, was famous for the spontaneity of its growth and the reckless extravagance of its appointments.

"If you go to Aladdin's Palace," said Maruja, from the top step of the south porch, to a waggonette of guests, "after you 've seen the stables with mahogany fittings for one hundred horses, ask Aladdin to show you the enchanted chamber, inlaid with California woods and paved with gold quartz."

"We would have a better chance if the Princess of China would only go with us," pleaded Garnier, gallantly.

"The Princess will stay at home with her mother, like a good girl," returned Maruja, demurely.

"A bad shot of Garnier's this time," whispered Raymond to Buchanan, as the vehicle rolled away with them. "The Princess is not likely to visit Aladdin again."

"Why?"

"The last time she was there, Aladdin was a little too Persian in his extravagance: offered her his house, stables, and himself."

"Not a bad catch—why, he 's worth two millions, I hear."

"Yes; but his wife is as extravagant as himself."

"His wife, eh? Ah, are you serious; or must you say something derogatory of the lassie's admirers too?" said Buchanan, playfully threatening him with his cane. "Another word, and I 'll throw you from the waggon."

After their departure, the outer shell of the great house fell into a profound silence, so hollow and deserted that one might have thought the curse of Koorotora had already descended upon it. Dead leaves of roses and fallen blossoms from the long line of vine-wreathed columns lay thick on the empty stretch of brown verandah, or rustled and crept against the sides of the house, where the regular breath of the afternoon "trades" began to arise. A few cardinal flowers fell like drops of blood before the open windows of the vacant ball-room, in which the step of a solitary servant echoed faintly. It was Maruja's maid, bringing a note to her young mistress, who, in a flounced morning dress, leaned against the window. Maruja took it, glanced at it quietly, folded it in a long fold, and put it openly in her belt. Captain Carroll, from whom it came, might have carried one of his despatches as methodically. The waiting-woman noticed the act, and was moved to suggest some more exciting confidences.

"The Doña Maruja has, without doubt, noticed the bouquet on her dressing-room table from the Señor Garnier?"

The Doña Maruja had. The Doña Maruja had also learned with pain that, bribed by Judas-like coin, Faquita had betrayed the secrets of her wardrobe to the extent of furnishing a ribbon from a certain yellow dress to the Señor Buchanan to match with a Chinese fan. This was intolerable!

Faquita writhed in remorse, and averred that through this solitary act she had dishonoured her family.

The Doña Maruja, however, since it was so, felt that the only thing left to do was to give her the polluted dress, and trust that the Devil might not fly away with her.

Leaving the perfectly consoled Faquita, Maruja crossed the large hall and, opening a small door, entered a dark passage through the thick adobe wall of the old casa, and apparently left the present century behind her. A peaceful atmosphere of the past surrounded her not only in the low vaulted halls terminating in grilles or barred windows; not only in the square chambers whose dark rich but scanty furniture was only a foil to the central elegance of the lace-bordered bed and pillows; but in a certain mysterious odour of dried and dessicated religious respectability that penetrated everywhere, and made the grateful twilight redolent of the generations of forgotten Guitierrez who had quietly exhaled in the old house. A mist as of incense and flowers that had lost their first bloom veiled the vista of the long corridor, and made the staring blue sky, seen through narrow windows and loopholes, glitter like mirrors let into the walls. The chamber assigned to the young ladies seemed half oratory and half sleeping-room, with a strange mingling of the convent in the bare white walls, hung only with crucifixes and religious emblems, and of the seraglio in the glimpses of lazy figures, reclining in the deshabille of short silken saya, low camisa, and dropping slippers. In a broad angle of the corridor giving upon the patio, its balustrade hung with brightly coloured serapes and shawls, surrounded by voluble domestics and relations, the mistress of the casa half reclined in a hammock and gave her noonday audience.

Maruja pushed her way through the clustered stools and cushions to her mother's side, kissed her on the forehead, and then lightly perched herself like a white dove on the railing. Mrs. Saltonstall, a dark, corpulent woman, redeemed only from coarseness by a certain softness of expression and refinement of gesture, raised her heavy brown eyes to her daughter's face.

"You have not been to bed, Mara?"

"No, dear. Do I look it?"

"You must lie down presently. They tell me that Captain Carroll returned suddenly this morning."

"Do you care?"

"Who knows?" Amita does not seem to fancy José, Estéban, Jorge, or any of her cousins. She won't look at Juan Estudillo. The Captain is not bad. He is of the Government. He is"——

"Not more than ten leagues from here," said Maruja, playing with the Captain's note in her belt. "You can send for him, dear little mother. He will be glad."

"You will ever talk lightly—like your father! She was not then grieved—our Amita—eh?"

"She and Dorotea and the two Wilsons went off with Raymond and your Scotch friend in the waggonette. She did not cry—to Raymond."

"Good," said Mrs. Saltonstall, leaning back in her hammock. "Raymond is an old friend. You had better take your siesta now, child, to be bright for dinner. I expect a visitor this afternoon—Dr. West."

"Again! What will Pereo say, little mother?"

"Pereo," said the widow, sitting up again in her hammock, with impatience, "Pereo is becoming intolerable. The man is as mad as Don Quixote; it is impossible to conceal his eccentric impertinence and interference from strangers, who cannot understand his confidential position in our house or his long service. There are no more mayordomos, child. The Vallejos, the Briones, the Castros, do without them now. Dr. West says, wisely, they are ridiculous survivals of the patriarchal system."

"And can be replaced by intelligent strangers," interrupted Maruja, demurely.

"The more easily if the patriarchal system has not been able to preserve the respect due from children to parents. No, Maruja! No; I am offended. Do not touch me! And your hair is coming down, and your eyes have rings like owls. You uphold this fanatical Pereo because he leaves you alone and stalks your poor sisters and their escorts like the Indian, whose blood is in his veins. The saints only can tell if he did not disgust this Captain Carroll into flight. He believes himself the sole custodian of the honour of our family—that he has a sacred mission from this Don Fulano of Koorotora to avert its fate. Without doubt he keeps up his delusions with aguardiente, and passes for a prophet among the silly peons and servants. He frightens the children with his ridiculous stories, and teaches them to decorate that heathen mound as if it were a shrine of Our Lady of Sorrows. He was almost rude to Dr. West yesterday."

"But you have encouraged him in his confidential position here," said Maruja. "You forget, my mother, how you got him to 'dueña' Enriquita with the Colonel Brown, how you let him frighten the young Englishman who was too attentive to Dorotea, how you set him even upon poor Raymond, and failed so dismally that I had to take him myself in hand."

"But if I choose to charge him with explanations that I cannot make myself without derogating from the time-honoured hospitality of the casa, that is another thing. It is not," said Doña Maria, with a certain massive dignity that, inconsistent as it was with the weakness of her argument, was not without impressiveness, "it is not yet, Blessed Santa Maria, that we are obliged to take notice ourself of the pretensions of every guest beneath our roof like the match-making, daughter-selling English and Americans. And then Pereo had tact and discrimination. Now he is mad! There are strangers and strangers. The whole valley is full of them—one can discriminate, since the old families year by year are growing less."

"Surely not," said Maruja, innocently. "There is the excellent Ramierrez, who has lately almost taken him a wife from the singing-hall in San Francisco; he may yet be snatched from the fire. There is the youthful José Castro, the sole padroño of our national bull-fight at Soquel, the famous horse-breaker, and the winner of I know not how many races. And have we not Vincente Peralta, who will run, it is said, for the American Congress. He can read and write—truly I have a letter from him here." She turned back the folded slip of Captain Carroll's note and discovered another below.

Mrs. Saltonstall tapped her daughter's hand with her fan. "You jest at them, yet you uphold Pereo! Go, now, and sleep yourself into a better frame of mind. Stop! I hear the Doctor's horse. Run and see that Pereo receives him properly."

Maruja had barely entered the dark corridor when she came upon the visitor—a grey, hard-featured man of sixty—who had evidently entered without ceremony. "I see you did not wait to be announced," she said, sweetly. "My mother will be flattered by your impatience. You will find her in the patio."

"Pereo did not announce me, as he was probably still under the effect of the aguardiente he swallowed yesterday," said the Doctor, drily. "I met him outside the Tienda on the highway the other night, talking to a pair of cut-throats that I would shoot on sight."

"The mayordomo has many purchases to make, and must meet a great many people," said Maruja. "What would you? We cannot select his acquaintances; we can hardly choose our own," she added, sweetly.

The Doctor hesitated, as if to reply, and then, with a grim "Good-morning," passed on towards the patio. Maruja did not follow him. Her attention was suddenly absorbed by a hitherto unnoticed motionless figure, that seemed to be hiding in the shadow of an angle of the passage, as if waiting for her to pass. The keen eyes of the daughter of Joseph Saltonstall were not deceived. She walked directly towards the figure, and said, sharply, "Pereo!"

The figure came hesitatingly forward into the light of the grated window. It was that of an old man, still tall and erect, though the hair had disappeared from his temples, and hung in two or three straight, long dark elf-locks on his neck. His face, over which one of the bars threw a sinister shadow, was the yellow of a dried tobacco-leaf, and veined as strongly. His garb was a strange mingling of the vaquero and the ecclesiastic—velvet trousers, open from the knee down, and fringed with bullion buttons; a broad red sash around his waist, partly hidden by a long, straight chaqueta; with a circular sacerdotal cape of black broadcloth slipped over his head through a slit-like opening braided with gold. His restless yellow eyes fell before the young girl's; and the stiff, varnished, hard-brimmed sombrero he held in his wrinkled hands trembled.

"You are spying again, Pereo," said Maruja, in another dialect than the one she had used to her mother. "It is unworthy of my father's trusted servant."

"It is that man—that coyote, Doña Maruja, that is unworthy of your father, of your mother, of you!" he gesticulated, in a fierce whisper. "I, Pereo, do not spy. I follow, follow the track of the prowling, stealing brute until I run him down. Yes, it was I, Pereo, who warned your father he would not be content with the half of the land he stole! It was I, Pereo, who warned your mother that each time he trod the soil of La Mision Perdida he measured the land he could take away!" He stopped pantingly, with the insane abstraction of a fixed idea glittering in his eyes.

"And it was you, Pereo," she said, caressingly, laying her soft hand on his heaving breast, "you who carried me in your arms when I was a child. It was you, Pereo, who took me before you on your pinto horse to the rodeo, when no one knew it but ourselves, my Pereo, was it not?" He nodded his head violently. "It was you who showed me the gallant caballeros, the Pachecos, the Castros, the Alvarados, the Estudillos, the Peraltas, the Vallejos." His head kept time with each name as the fire dimmed in his wet eyes. "You made me promise I would not forget them for the Americanos who were here. Good! That was years ago! I am older now. I have seen many Americans. Well, I am still free!"

He caught her hand, and raised it to his lips with a gesture almost devotional. His eyes softened; as the exaltation of passion passed, his voice dropped into the querulousness of privileged age. "Ah, yes!—you, the first-born, the heiress—of a verity, yes! You were ever a Guitierrez. But the others? Eh, where are they now? And it was always: 'Eh, Pereo, what shall we do to-day? Pereo, good Pereo, we are asked to ride here and there; we are expected to visit the new people in the valley—what say you, Pereo? Who shall we dine to-day?' Or: 'Enquire me of this or that strange caballero—and if we may speak.' Ah, it is but yesterday that Amita would say: 'Lend me thine own horse, Pereo, that I may outstrip this swaggering Americano that clings ever to my side,' ha! ha! Or the grave Dorotea would whisper: 'Convey to this Señor Presumptuous Pomposo that the daughters of Guitierrez do not ride alone with strangers!' Or even the little Liseta would say, he! he! 'Why does the stranger press my foot in his great hand when he helps me into the saddle? Tell him that is not the way, Pereo.' Ha! ha!" He laughed childishly, and stopped. "And why does Señorita Amita now—look—complain that Pereo, old Pereo, comes between her and this Señor Raymond—the maquinista? Eh, and why does she, the lady mother, the Castellaña, shut Pereo from her councils?" he went on, with rising excitement. "What are these secret meetings, eh?—what these appointments, alone with this Judas—without the family—without me!"

"Hearken, Pereo," said the young girl, again laying her hand on the old man's shoulder; "you have spoken truly—but you forget—the years pass. These are no longer strangers; old friends have gone—these have taken their place. My father forgave the Doctor—why cannot you? For the rest, believe in me—me—Maruja"—she dramatically touched her heart over the international complications of the letters of Captain Carroll and Peralta. "I will see that the family honour does not suffer. And now, good Pereo, calm thyself. Not with aguardiente, but with a bottle of old wine from the Mision refectory that I will send to thee. It was given to me by thy friend, Padre Miguel, and is from the old vines that were here. Courage, Pereo! And thou sayest that Amita complains that thou comest between her and Raymond. So! What matter? Let it cheer thy heart to know that I have summoned the Peraltas, the Pachecos, the Estudillos, all thy old friends, to dine here to-day. Thou wilt hear the old names, even if the faces are young to thee. Courage! Do thy duty, old friend; let them see that the hospitality of La Mision Perdida does not grow old, if its mayordomo does. Faquita will bring thee the wine. No; not that way; thou needest not pass the patio, nor meet that man again. Here, give me thy hand, I will lead thee. It trembles, Pereo! These are not the sinews that only two years ago pulled down the bull at Soquel with thy single lasso! Why, look! I can drag thee; see!" and with a light laugh and a boyish gesture, she half pulled, half dragged him along, until their voices were lost in the dark corridor.

Maruja kept her word. When the sun began to cast long shadows along the verandah, not only the outer shell of La Mision Perdida, but the dark inner heart of the old casa, stirred with awakened life. Single horsemen and carriages began to arrive; and, mingled with the modern turn-outs of the home party and the neighbouring Americans, were a few of the cumbrous vehicles and chariots of fifty years ago, drawn by gaily trapped mules with bizarre postillions, and occasionally an outrider. Dark faces looked from the balcony of the patio, a light cloud of cigarette-smoke made the dark corridors the more obscure, and mingled with the forgotten incense. Bare-headed pretty women, with roses starring their dark hair, wandered with childish curiosity along the broad verandah and in and out of the French windows that opened upon the grand saloon. Scrupulously shaved men with olive complexion, stout men with accurately curving whiskers meeting at their dimpled chins, lounged about with a certain unconscious dignity that made them contentedly indifferent to any novelty of their surroundings. For a while the two races kept mechanically apart; but, through the tactful gallantry of Garnier, the cynical familiarity of Raymond, and the impulsive recklessness of Aladdin, who had forsaken his enchanted Palace on the slightest of invitations, and returned with the party in the hope of again seeing the Princess of China, an interchange of civilities, of gallantries, and even of confidences, at last took place. Jovita Castro had heard (who had not?) of the wonders of Aladdin's Palace, and was it of actual truth that the ladies had a bouquet and a fan to match their dress presented to them every morning, and that the gentlemen had a champagne cocktail sent to their rooms before breakfast? "Just you come, Miss, and bring your father and your brothers, and stay a week and you'll see," responded Aladdin, gallantly. "Hold on! What's your father's first name? I'll send a team over there for you to-morrow." "And is it true that you frightened the handsome Captain Carroll away from Amita?" said Dolores Briones, over the edge of her fan to Raymond. "Perfectly," said Raymond, with ingenuous frankness. "I made it a matter of life or death. He was a soldier, and naturally preferred the former as giving him a better chance for promotion." "Ah! we thought it was Maruja you liked best." "That was two years ago," said Raymond, gravely. "And you Americanos can change in that time?" "I have just experienced that it can be done in less," he responded, over the fan, with bewildering significance. Nor were these confidences confined to only one nationality. "I always thought you Spanish gentlemen were very dark, and wore long moustaches and a cloak," said pretty little Miss Walker, gazing frankly into the smooth round face of the eldest Pacheco—"why, you are as fair as I am." "Eaf I tink that, I am for ever mizzarable," he replied, with grave melancholy. In the dead silence that followed he was enabled to make his decorous point. "Because I shall not ezcape ze fate of Narcissus." Mr. Buchanan, with the unrestrained and irresponsible enjoyment of a traveller, entered fully into the spirit of the scene. He even found words of praise for Aladdin, whose extravagance had at first seemed to him almost impious. "Eh, but I'm not prepared to say he is a fool, either," he remarked to his friend the San Francisco banker. "Those who try to pick him up for one," returned the banker, "will find themselves mistaken. His is the prodigality that loosens others' purse-strings besides his own. Everybody contents himself with criticising his way of spending money, but is ready to follow his way of making it."

The dinner was more formal, and when the mistress of the house, massive in black silk, velvet and gold embroidery, moved like a pageant to the head of her table, where she remained like a sacerdotal effigy, not even the presence of the practical Scotchman at her side could remove the prevailing sense of restraint. For a while the conversation of the relatives might have been brought with them in their antique vehicles of fifty years ago, so faded, so worn, and so springless it was. General Pico related the festivities at Monterey, on the occasion of the visit of Sir George Simpson early in the present century, of which he was an eye-witness, with great precision of detail. Don Juan Estudillo was comparatively frivolous, with anecdotes of Louis Philippe, whom he had seen in Paris. Far-seeing Pedro Guitierrez was gloomily impressed with a Mongolian invasion of California by the Chinese, in which the prevailing religion would be supplanted by heathen temples, and polygamy engrafted on the Constitution. Everybody agreed, however, that the vital question of the hour was the settlement of land titles—Americans who claimed under pre-emption and the native holders of Spanish grants were equally of the opinion. In the midst of this the musical voice of Maruja was heard asking, "What is a tramp?"

Raymond on her right, was ready but not conclusive. A tramp, if he could sing, would be a troubadour; if he could pray, would be a pilgrim friar—in either case a natural object of womanly solicitude. But as he could do neither, he was simply a curse.

"And you think that is not an object of womanly solicitude? But that does not tell me what he is."

A dozen gentlemen, swept in the radius of those softly-inquiring eyes, here started to explain. From them it appeared that there was no such thing in California as a tramp, and there were also a dozen varieties of tramp in California.

"But is he always very uncivil?" asked Maruja.

Again there were conflicting opinions. You might have to shoot him on sight, and you might have him invariably run from you. When the question was finally settled, Maruja was found to have become absorbed in conversation with someone else.

Amita, a taller copy of Maruja, and more regularly beautiful, had built up a little pile of bread crumbs between herself and Raymond, and was listening to him with a certain shy, girlish interest that was as inconsistent with the serene regularity of her face as Maruja's self-possessed, subtle intelligence was incongruous to her youthful figure. Raymond's voice, when he addressed Amita, was low and earnest; not from any significance of matter, but from its frank confidential quality.

"They are discussing the new railroad project, and your relations are all opposed to it; to-morrow they will each apply privately to Aladdin for the privilege of subscribing." "I have never seen a railroad," said Amita, slightly colouring; "but you are an engineer, and I know they must be something very clever."

Notwithstanding the coolness of the night, a full moon drew the guests to the verandah, where coffee was served, and where, mysteriously muffled in cloaks and shawls, the party took upon itself the appearance of groups of dominoed masqueraders, scattered along the verandah and on the broad steps of the porch in gipsy-like encampments, from whose cloaked shadow the moonlight occasionally glittered upon a varnished boot or peeping satin slipper. Two or three of these groups had resolved themselves into detached couples, who wandered down the acacia walk to the sound of a harp in the grand saloon or the occasional uplifting of a thin Spanish tenor. Two of these couples were Maruja and Garnier followed by Amita and Raymond.

"You are restless to-night, Maruja," said Amita, shyly endeavouring to make a show of keeping up with her sister's boyish stride, in spite of Raymond's reluctance. "You are paying for your wakefulness to-day."

The same idea passed through the minds of both men. She was missing the excitement of Captain Carroll's presence.

"The air is so refreshing away from the house," responded Maruja, with a bright energy that belied any suggestion of fatigue or moral disquietude. "I'm tired of running against those turtle-doves in the walks and bushes. Let us keep on to the lane. If you are tired, Mr. Raymond will give you his arm."

They kept on, led by the indomitable little figure who, for once, did not seem to linger over the attentions, both piquant and tender, with which Garnier improved his opportunity. Given a shadowy lane, a lovers' moon, a pair of bright and not unkindly eyes, a charming and not distant figure—what more could he want? Yet he wished she hadn't walked so fast. One might be vivacious, audacious, brilliant, at an Indian trot; but impassioned—never! The pace increased; they were actually hurrying. More than that, Maruja had struck into a little trot; her lithe body swaying from side to side, her little feet straight as an arrow before her; accompanying herself with a quaint musical chant, which she obligingly explained had been taught her as a child by Pereo. They stopped only at the hedge, where she had that morning encountered the tramp.

There is little doubt that the rest of the party was disconcerted: Amita, whose figure was not adapted to this Camilla-like exercise; Raymond, who was annoyed at the poor girl's discomfiture; and Garnier, who had lost a golden opportunity, with the faint suspicion of having looked ridiculous. Only Maruja's eyes, or rather the eyes of her lamented father, seemed to enjoy it.

"You are too effeminate," she said, leaning against the fence, and shading her eyes with her fan, as she glanced around in the staring moonlight. "Civilisation has taken away your legs. A man ought to be able to trust to his feet all day, and to nothing else."

"In fact—a tramp," suggested Raymond.

"Possibly. I think I should like to have been a gipsy, and to have wandered about, finding a new home every night."

"And a change of linen on the early morning hedges," said Raymond. "But do you think seriously that you and your sister are suitably clad to commence to-night? It is bitterly cold," he added, turning up his collar. "Could you begin by showing a pal the nearest haystack or hen-roost?"

"Sybarite!" She cast a long look over the fields and down the lane. Suddenly she started. "What is that?"

She pointed to a tall erect figure slowly disappearing on the other side of the hedge.

"It's Pereo, only Pereo. I knew him by his long serape," said Garnier, who was nearest the hedge, complacently. "But what is surprising, he was not there when we came, nor did he come out of that open field. He must have been walking behind us on the other side of the hedge."

The eyes of the two girls sought each other simultaneously, but not without Raymond's observant glance. Amita's brow darkened as she moved to her sister's side, and took her arm with a confidential pressure that was returned. The two men, with a vague consciousness of some contretemps, dropped a pace behind, and began to talk to each other, leaving the sisters to exchange a few words in a low tone as they slowly returned to the house.

Meanwhile, Pereo's tall figure had disappeared in the shrubbery, to emerge again in the open area by the summer-house and the old pear-tree. The red sparks of two or three cigarettes in the shadow of the summer-house, and the crouching forms of two shawled women came forward to greet him.

"And what hast thou heard, Pereo?" said one of the women.

"Nothing," said Pereo, impatiently. "I told thee I would answer for this little primogenita with my life. She is but leading this Frenchman a dance, as she has led the others, and the Doña Amita and her Raymond are but wax in her hands. Besides, I have spoken with the little 'Ruja to-day, and spoke my mind, Pepita, and she says there is nothing."

"And whilst thou wert speaking to her, my poor Pereo, the devil of an American Doctor was speaking to her mother, thy mistress—our mistress, Pereo! Would'st thou know what he said? Oh, it was nothing."

"Now, the curse of Koorotora on thee, Pepita!" said Pereo, excitedly. "Speak, fool, if thou knowest anything!"

"Of a verity, no. Let Faquita, then, speak: she heard it." She reached out her hand, and dragged Maruja's maid, not unwilling, before the old man.

"Good! 'Tis Faquita, daughter of Gomez, and a child of the land. Speak, little one. What said this coyote to the mother of thy mistress?"

"Truly, good Pereo, it was but accident that befriended me."

"Truly, for thy mistress's sake, I heped it had been more. But let that go. Come, what said he, child?"

"I was hanging up a robe behind the curtain in the oratory when Pepita ushered in the Americano. I had no time to fly."

"Why should'st thou fly from a dog like this?" said one of the cigarette-smokers who had drawn near.

"Peace!" said the old man.

"When the Doña Maria joined him they spoke of affairs. Yes, Pereo, she, thy mistress, spoke of affairs to this man—ay, as she might have talked to thee. And, could he advise this? and could he counsel that? and should the cattle be taken from the lower lands, and the fields turned to grain? and had he a purchaser for Los Osos?"

"Los Osos! It is the boundary land—the frontier—the line of the arroyo—older than the Mision," muttered Pereo.

"Ay, and he talked of the—the—I know not what it is!—the r-r-rail-r-road."

"The railroad," gasped the old man. "I will tell thee what it is! It is the cut of a burning knife through La Mision Perdida—as long as eternity, as dividing as death. On either side of that gash life is blasted; wherever that cruel steel is laid the track of it is livid and barren; it cuts down all barriers; leaps all boundaries, be they cañada or cañon; it is a torrent in the plain, a tornado in the forest; its very pathway is destruction to whoso crosses it—man or beast; it is the heathenish God of the Americanos; they build temples for it, and flock there and worship it whenever it stops, breathing fire and flame like a very Moloch."

"Eh! St. Anthony preserve us!" said Faquita, shuddering; "and yet they spoke of it as 'shares' and 'stocks,' and said it would double the price of corn."

"Now, Judas pursue thee and thy railroad, Pereo," said Pepita, impatiently. "It is not such bagatela that Faquita is here to relate. Go on child, and tell all that happened."

"And then," continued Faquita, with a slight affectation of maiden bashfulness, in the closer-drawing circle of cigarettes, "and then they talked of other things and of themselves; and, of a verity, this grey-bearded Doctor will play the goat and utter gallant speeches, and speak of a life-long devotion and of the time he should have a right to protect"——

"The right, girl! Did'st thou say the right? No, thou did'st mistake. It was not that he meant?"

"Thy life to a quarter peso that the little Faquita does not mistake," said the evident satirist of the household. "Trust to Gomez' muchacha to understand a proposal."

When the laugh was over, and the sparks of the cigaretto, cleverly whipped out of the speaker's lips by Faquita's fan, had disappeared in the darkness, she resumed, pettishly, "I know not what you call it when he kissed her hand and held it to his heart."

"Judas!" gasped Pereo. "But," he added, feverishly, "she, the Doña Maria, thy mistress, she summoned thee at once to call me to cast out this dust into the open air; thou didst fly to her assistance? What! thou sawest this, and did nothing—eh?" He stopped, and tried to peer into the girl's face. "No! Ah, I see; I am an old fool. Yes; it was Maruja's own mother that stood there. He! he! he!" he laughed piteously; "and she smiled and smiled and broke the coward's heart, as Maruja might. And when he was gone, she bade thee bring her water to wash the filthy Judas stain from her hand."

"Santa Ana!" said Faquita, shrugging her shoulders. "She did what the veriest muchacha would have done. When he had gone, she sat down and cried."

The old man drew back a step, and steadied himself by the table. Then, with a certain tremulous audacity, he began: "So! that is all you have to tell—nothing! Bah! A lazy slut sleeps at her duty, and dreams behind a curtain! Yes, dreams!—you understand—dreams! And for this she leaves her occupations, and comes to gossip here! Come," he continued, steadily working himself into a passion, "come, enough of this! Get you gone!—you, and Pepita, and Andreas, and Victor—all of you—back to your duty. Away! Am I not master here? Off! I say!"

There was no mistaking the rising anger of his voice. The cowed group rose in a frightened way and disappeared one by one silently through the labyrinth. Pereo waited until the last had vanished, and then, cramming his stiff sombrero over his eyes with an ejaculation, brushed his way through the shrubbery in the direction of the stables.

Later, when the full glory of the midnight moon had put out every straggling light in the great house, when the long verandah slept in massive bars of shadow, and even the trade winds were hushed to repose, Pereo silently issued from the stable-yard in vaquero's dress, mounted and caparisoned. Picking his way cautiously along the turf-bordered edge of the gravel path, he noiselessly reached a gate that led to the lane. Walking his spirited mustang with difficulty until the house had at last disappeared in the intervening foliage, he turned with an easy canter into a border bridle-path that seemed to lead to the cañada. In a quarter of an hour he had reached a low amphitheatre of meadows, shut in a half circle of grassy treeless hills.

Here, putting spurs to his horse, he entered upon a singular exercise. Twice he made a circuit of the meadow at a wild gallop with flying serape and loosened rein and twice returned. The third time his speed increased, the ground seemed to stream from under him; in the distance the limbs of his steed became invisible in their furious action, and, lying low forward on his mustang's neck, man and horse passed like an arrowy bolt around the circle. Then something like a light ring of smoke up curved from the saddle before him and, slowly uncoiling itself in mid air, dropped gently to the ground as he passed. Again, and once again, the shadowy coil sped upward and onward, slowly detaching its snaky rings with a weird deliberation that was in strange contrast to the impetuous onset of the rider, and yet seemed a part of his fury. And then turning, Perco trotted gently to the centre of the circle.

Here he divested himself of his serape and, securing it in a cylindrical roll, placed it upright on the ground and once more sped away on his furious circuit. But this time he wheeled suddenly before it was half completed and bore down directly upon the unconscious object. Within a hundred feet he swerved slightly; the long detaching rings again writhed in mid air and softly descended as he thundered past. But when he had reached the line of circuit again he turned and made directly for the road he had entered. Fifty feet behind his horse's heels at the end of a shadowy cord, the luckless serape was dragging and bounding after him!

"The old man is quiet enough this morning," said Andreas, as he groomed the sweat-dried skin of the mustang the next day. "It is easy to see, friend Pinto, that he has worked off his madness on thee."

CHAPTER IV.

THE Rancho of San Antonio might have been a characteristic asylum for its blessed patron, offering as it did a secure retreat from temptations for the carnal eye, and affording every facility for uninterrupted contemplation of the sky above, unbroken by tree or elevation. Unlike La Mision Perdida, of which it had been part, it was a level plain of rich adobe, half the year presenting a billowy sea of tossing verdure breaking on the far-off horizon line, half the year presenting a dry and dusty shore, from which the vernal sea had ebbed, to the low sky that seemed to mock it with a visionary sea beyond. A row of rough, irregular, and severely practical sheds and buildings housed the machinery and the fifty or sixty men employed in the cultivation of the soil, but neither residential mansion nor farmhouse offered any nucleus of rural comfort or civilisation in the midst of this wild expanse of earth and sky. The simplest adjuncts of country life were unknown: milk and butter were brought from the nearest town; weekly supplies of fresh meat and vegetables came from the same place; in the harvest season, the labourers and harvesters lodged and boarded in the adjacent settlement and walked to their work. No cultivated flower bloomed beside the unpainted tenement, though the fields were starred in early spring with poppies and daisies—the humblest garden plant or herb had no place in that prolific soil. The serried ranks of wheat pressed closely round the straggling sheds and barns and hid the lower windows. But the sheds were fitted with the latest agricultural machinery; a telegraphic wire connected the nearest town with an office in the wing of one of the buildings, where Dr. West sat, and in the midst of the wilderness severely checked his accounts with nature.

Whether this strict economy of domestic outlay arose from an ostentatious contempt of country life and the luxurious habits of the former landholders, or whether it was a purely business principle of Dr. West, did not appear. Those who knew him best declared that it was both. Certain it was that unqualified commercial success crowned and dignified his method. A few survivors of the old native families came to see his strange machinery that did the work of so many idle men and horses. It is said that he offered to "run" the distant estate of Joaquin Padilla from his little office amidst the grain of San Antonio. Some shook their heads, and declared that he only sucked the juices of the land for a few brief years to throw it away again; that in his fierce haste he skimmed the fatness of ages of gentle cultivation on a soil that had been barely tickled with native oaken ploughshares.

His own personal tastes and habits were as severe and practical as his business; the little wing he inhabited contained only his office, his living room or library, his bed-room, and a bath-room. This last inconsistent luxury was due to a certain cat-like cleanliness which was part of his nature. His iron-grey hair—a novelty in this country of young Americans—was always scrupulously brushed, and his linen spotless. A slightly professional and somewhat old-fashioned respectability in his black clothes was also characteristic. His one concession to the customs of his neighbours was the possession of two or three of the half-broken and spirited mustangs of the country, which he rode with the fearlessness, if not the perfect security and ease, of a native. Whether the subjection of this lawless and powerful survival of a wild and unfettered nature around him was part of his plan, or whether it was only a lingering trait of some younger prowess, no one knew; but his grim and decorous figure, contrasting with the picturesque and flowing freedom of the horse he bestrode, was a frequent spectacle in road and field.

It was the second day after his visit to La Mision Perdida. He was sitting by his desk at sunset in the faint afterglow of the western sky, which flooded the floor through the open door. He was writing, but presently lifted his head, with an impatient air, and called out, "Harrison!"

The shadow of Dr. West's foreman appeared at the door.

"Who 's that you 're talking to?"

"Tramp, Sir."

"Hire him, or send him about his business. Don't stand gabbling there."

"That 's just it, Sir. He won't hire for a week or a day. He says he 'll do an odd job for his supper and a shakedown, but no more."

"Pack him off! . . . Stay. . . . What 's he like?"

"Umph! Fetch him in."

The foreman disappeared, and returned with the tramp already known to the reader. He was a little dirtier and grimier than on the morning he had addressed Maruja at La Mision Perdida; but he wore the same air of sullen indifference, occasionally broken by furtive observation. His laziness—or weariness—if the term could describe the lassitude of perfect physical condition, seemed to have increased; and he leaned against the door as the Doctor regarded him with slow contempt. The silence continuing, he deliberately allowed himself to slip down into a sitting position in the doorway, where he remained.

"You seem to have been born tired," said the Doctor, grimly.

"Yes."

"What have you got to say for yourself?"

"I told him," said the tramp, nodding his head towards the foreman, "what I 'd do for a supper and a bed. I don't want anything but that."

"And if you don't get what you want on your own conditions, what 'll you do?" asked the Doctor, drily.

"Go."

"Where did you come from?"

"States."

"Where are you going?"

"On."

"Leave him to me," said Dr. West to his foreman. The man smiled, and withdrew.

The Doctor bent his head again over his accounts. The tramp, sitting in the doorway, reached out his hand, pulled a young wheat-stalk that had sprung up near the doorstep, and slowly nibbled it. He did not raise his eyes to the Doctor, but sat, a familiar culprit awaiting sentence, without fear, without hope, yet not without a certain philosophical endurance of the situation.

"Go into that passage," said the Doctor, lifting his head as he turned a page of his ledger, "and on the shelf you 'll find some clothing stores for the men. Pick out something to fit you."

The tramp arose, moved towards the passage, and stopped. "It 's for the job only, you understand?" he said.

"For the job," answered the Doctor.

The tramp returned in a few moments with overalls and woollen shirt hanging on his arm and a pair of boots and socks in his hand. The Doctor had put aside his pen. "Now go into that room and change. Stop! First wash the dust from your feet in that bath-room."

The tramp obeyed, and entered the room. The Doctor walked to the door, and looked out reflectively on the paling sky. When he turned again he noticed that the door of the bath-room was opened, and the tramp, who had changed his clothes by the fading light, was drying his feet. The Doctor approached, and stood for a moment watching him.

"What 's the matter with your foot?"* he asked, after a pause.

"Born so."

The first and second toe were joined by a thin membrane.

"Both alike?" asked the Doctor.

"Yes," said the young man, exhibiting the other foot.

"What did you say your name was?"

"I didn't say it. It 's Henry Guest, same as my father's."

"Where were you born?"

"Dentville, Pike County, Missouri."

"What was your mother's name?"

"Spalding, I reckon."

"Where are your parents now?"

"Mother got divorced from father, and married again down South, somewhere. Father left home twenty years ago. He 's somewhere in California—if he aint dead."

"He isn't dead."

"How do you know?"

"Because I am Henry Guest, of Dentville: and"—he stopped, and shading his eyes with his hand as he deliberately examined the tramp, added coldly—"your father, I reckon."

There was a slight pause. The young man put down the boot he had taken up. "Then I 'm to stay here?"

"Certainly not. Here my name is only West, and I have no son. You 'll go on to San José, and stay there until I look into this thing. You haven't got any money, of course?" he asked, with a scarcely suppressed sneer.

"I 've got a little," returned the young man.

"How much?"

The tramp put his hand into his breast, and drew out a piece of folded paper containing a single gold coin.

"Five dollars. I 've kept it a month; it doesn't cost much to live as I do," he added, drily.

"There 's fifty more. Go to some hotel in San José, and let me know where you are. You 've got to live, and you don't want to work. Well, you don't seem to be a fool; so I needn't tell you that if you expect anything from me, you must leave this matter in my hands. I have chosen to acknowledge you to-day of my own free will—I can as easily denounce you as an impostor to-morrow, if I choose. Have you told your story to anyone in the valley?"

"No."

"See that you don't, then. Before you go, you must answer me a few more questions."

He drew a chair to his table, and dipped a pen in the ink, as if to take down the answers. The young man, finding the only chair thus occupied, moved the Doctor's books aside, and sat down on the table beside him.

The questions were repetitions of those already asked, but more in detail, and thoroughly practical in their nature. The answers were given straightforwardly and unconcernedly, as if the subject was not worth the trouble of invention or evasion. It was difficult to say whether questioner or answerer took least pleasure in the interrogation, which might have referred to the concerns of a third party. Both, however, spoke disrespectfully of their common family with almost an approach to sympathetic interest.

"You might as well be going now," said the Doctor, finally rising. "You can stop at the fonda, about two miles further on, and get your supper and bed, if you like."

The young man slipped from the table, and lounged to the door. The Doctor put his hands in his pockets and followed him. The young man, as if in unconscious imitation, had put his hands in his pockets also, and looked at him.

"I 'll hear from you, then, when you are in San José?" said Dr. West, looking past him into the grain with a slight approach to constraint in his indifference.

"Yes—if that 's agreed upon," returned the young man, pausing on the threshold. A faint sense of some purely conventional responsibility in their position affected them both. They would have shaken hands if either had offered the initiative. A sullen consciousness of gratuitous rectitude in the selfish mind of the father; an equally sullen conviction of twenty years of wrong in the son, withheld them both. Unpleasantly observant of each other's awkwardness, they parted with a feeling of relief.

Dr. West closed the door, lit his lamp, and, going to his desk, folded the paper containing the memoranda he had just written and placed it in his pocket. Then he summoned his foreman. The man entered, and glanced around the room as if expecting to see the Doctor's guest still there.

"Tell one of the men to bring round 'Buckeye.'"

The foreman hesitated. "Going to ride to-night, Sir?"

"Certainly; I may go as far as Saltonstall's. If I do, you needn't expect me back till morning."

"Buckeye 's mighty fresh to-night, boss. Regularly bucked his saddle clean off an hour ago, and there aint a man dare exercise him."

"I 'll bet he don't buck his saddle off with me on it," said the Doctor, grimly. "Bring him along."

The man turned to go. "You found the tramp pow'ful lazy, didn't ye?"

"I found a heap more in him than in some that call themselves smart," said Dr. West, unconsciously setting up an irritable defence of the absent one. "Hurry up that horse!"

The foreman vanished. The Doctor put on a pair of leather leggings, large silver spurs, and a broad soft-brimmed hat, but made no other change in his usual half-professional conventional garb. He then went to the window and glanced in the direction of the highway. Now that his son was gone, he felt a faint regret that he had not prolonged the interview. Certain peculiarities in his manner, certain suggestions of expression in his face, speech, and gesture, came back to him now with unsatisfied curiosity. "No matter," he said to himself; "he 'll turn up soon again—as soon as I want him, if not sooner. He thinks he 's got a mighty soft thing here, and he isn't going to let it go. And there 's that same d——d sullen dirty pride of his mother, for all he doesn't cotton to her. Wonder I didn't recognise it at first. And hoarding up that five dollars! That 's Jane's brat, all over! And, of course," he added, bitterly, "nothing of me in him. No; nothing! Well, well, what 's the difference?" He turned towards the door with a certain sullen defiance in his face, so like the man he believed he did not resemble that his foreman coming upon him suddenly might have been startled at the likeness. Fortunately, however, Harrison was too much engrossed with the antics of the irrepressible Buckeye, which the ostler had just brought to the door, to notice anything else. The arrival of the horse changed the Doctor's expression to one of more practical and significant resistance. With the assistance of two men at the head of the restive brute he managed to vault into the saddle. A few wild plunges only seemed to settle him the firmer in his seat—each plunge leaving its record in a thin red line on the animal's flanks, made by the cruel spurs of its rider. Any lingering desire of following his son's footsteps was quickly dissipated by Buckeye, who promptly bolted in the opposite direction, and before Dr. West could gain active control over him they were half a mile on their way to La Mision Perdida.

Dr. West did not regret it. Twenty years ago he had voluntarily abandoned a legal union of mutual unfaithfulness and misconduct, and allowed his wife to get the divorce he might have obtained for equal cause. He had abandoned to her the issue of that union—an infant son. Whatever he chose to do now was purely gratuitous; the only hold which this young stranger had on his respect was that he also recognised that fact with a cold indifference equal to his own. At present the half-savage brute he bestrode occupied all his attention. Yet he could not help feeling his advancing years tell upon him more heavily that evening; fearless as he was, his strength was no longer equal when measured with the untiring youthful malevolence of his unbroken mustang: for a moment he dwelt regretfully on the lazy half-developed sinews of his son; for a briefer instant there flashed across him the thought that those sinews ought to replace his own; ought to be his to lean upon—that thus, and thus only, could he achieve the old miracle of restoring his lost youth by perpetuating his own power in his own blood, and he, whose profound belief in personality had rejected all hereditary principle, felt this with a sudden exquisite pain. But his horse, perhaps recognising a relaxing grip, took that opportunity to "buck." Curving his back like a cat and throwing himself into the air with an unexpected bound, he came down with four stiff, inflexible legs, and a shock that might have burst the saddle-girths, had not the wily old man as quickly brought the long rowels of his spurs together and fairly locked his heels under Buckeye's collapsing barrel. It was the mustang's last rebellious struggle. The discomfited brute gave in, and darted meekly and apologetically forward, and, as it were, left all its rider's doubts and fears far behind in the vanishing distance.

CHAPTER V.

MEANWHILE, the subject of Dr. West's meditations was slowly making his way along the high road towards the fonda. He walked more erect and with less of a shuffle in his gait; but whether this was owing to his having cast the old skin of garments adapted to his slouch, and because he was more securely shod, or whether it was from the sudden straightening of some warped moral quality, it would have been difficult to say. The expression of his face certainly gave no evidence of actual and prospective good fortune; if anything, the lines of discontent around his brow and mouth were more strongly drawn. Apparently, his interview with his father had only the effect of reviving and stirring into greater activity a certain dogged sentiment that, through long years, had become languidly mechanical. He was no longer a beaten animal, but one roused by a chance success into a dangerous knowledge of his power. In his honest workman's dress, he was infinitely more to be feared than in his rags; in the lifting of his downcast eye, there was the revelation of a baleful intelligence. In his changed condition civilisation only seemed to have armed him against itself.

The fonda, a long low building, with a red-tiled roof extending over a porch or white-washed verandah, in which drunken vaqueros had been known to occasionally disport their mustangs, did not offer a very reputable appearance to the eye of young Guest as he approached it in the gathering shadows. One or two half-broken horses were securely fastened to the stout cross-beams of some heavy posts driven in the roadway before it, and a primitive trough of roughly excavated stone stood near it. Through a broken gate at the side there was a glimpse of a grass-grown and deserted court-yard piled with the disused packing-cases and barrels of the tienda or general country shop which huddled under the same roof at the other end of the building. The opened door of the fonda showed a low studded room fitted up with a rude imitation of an American bar on one side, and containing a few small tables, at which half a dozen men were smoking, drinking, and playing cards. The faded pictorial poster of the last bull-fight at Monterey, and an American "Sheriff's notice" were hung on the wall and in the doorway. A thick yellow atmosphere of cigaretto smoke, through which the inmates appeared like brown shadows, pervaded the room.

The young man hesitated before this pestilential interior, and took a seat on a bench on the verandah. After a moment's interval, the yellow landlord came to the door with a look of inquiry, which Guest answered by a demand for lodging and supper. When the landlord had vanished again in the cigaretto fog, the several other guests, one after the other, appeared at the doorway, with their cigarettes in their mouths and their cards still in their hands, and gazed upon him.

There may have been some excuse for their curiosity. As before hinted, Guest's appearance in his overalls and woollen shirt was somewhat incongruous, and, for some inexplicable reason, the same face and figure which did not look inconsistent in rags and extreme poverty now at once suggested a higher social rank both of intellect and refinement than his workman's dress indicated. This, added to his surliness of manner and expression, strengthened a growing suspicion in the mind of the party that he was a fugitive from justice—a forger, a derelict banker, or possibly a murderer. It is only fair to say that the moral sense of the spectators was not shocked at the suspicion, and that a more active sympathy was only withheld by his reticence. An unfortunate incident seemed to complete the evidence against him. In impatiently responding to the landlord's curt demand for prepayment of his supper, he allowed three or four pieces of gold to escape from his pocket on the verandah. In the quick glances of the party, as he stooped to pick them up, he read the danger of his carelessness.

His sullen self-possession did not seem to be shaken. Calling to the keeper of the tienda, who had appeared at his door in time to witness the Danaë-like shower, he bade him approach, in English.

"What sort of knives have you got?"

"Knives, Señor?"

"Yes; bowie-knives or dirks. Knives like that," he said, making an imaginary downward stroke at the table before him.

The shopkeeper entered the tienda, and presently reappeared with three or four dirks in red leather sheaths. Guest selected the heaviest, and tried its point on the table.

"How much?"

"Tres pesos."

The young man threw him one of his gold pieces, and slipped the knife and its sheath in his boot. When he had received his change from the shopkeeper, he folded his arms and leaned back against the wall in quiet indifference.

The simple act seemed to check aggressive, but not insinuating, interference. In a few moments one of the men appeared at the doorway.

"It is fine weather for the road, little comrade!"

Guest did not reply.

"Ah! the night, it ess splendid," he repeated, in broken English, rubbing his hands, as if washing in the air.

Still no reply.

"You shall come from Sank Hosay?"

"I sha'ant."

The stranger muttered something in Spanish, but the landlord, who reappeared to place Guest's supper on a table on the verandah, here felt the obligation of interfering to protect a customer apparently so aggressive and so opulent. He pushed the inquisitor aside with a few hasty words, and, after Guest had finished his meal, offered to show him his room. It was a dark vaulted closet on the ground-floor, gaining light from the stable-yard through a barred iron grating. At the first glimpse it looked like a prison cell; looking more deliberately at the black tresselled bed, and the votive images hanging on the wall, it might have been a tomb.

"It is the best," said the landlord. "The Padre Vincento will have none other on his journey."

"I suppose God protects him," said Guest; "that door don't." He pointed to the worm-eaten door, without bolt or fastening.

"Ah, what matter! Are we not all friends?"

"Certainly," responded Guest, with his surliest manner, as he returned to the verandah. Nevertheless, he resolved not to occupy the cell of the reverend Padre; not from any personal fear of his disreputable neighbours, though he was fully alive to their peculiarities, but from the nomadic instinct which was still strong in his blood. He felt he could not yet bear the confinement of a close room or the propinquity of his fellow-man. He would rest on the verandah until the moon was fairly up, and then he would again take to the road.

He was half reclining on the bench, with the slowly closing and opening lids of some tired but watchful animal, when the sound of wheels, voices, and clatter of hoofs on the highway arrested his attention, and he sat upright. The moon was slowly lifting itself over the limitless stretch of grain-fields before him on the other side of the road, and dazzling him with its level lustre. He could barely discern a cavalcade of dark figures and a large vehicle rapidly approaching, before it drew up tumultuously in front of the fonda. It was a pleasure party of ladies and gentlemen on horseback and in a four-horsed char-à-bancs returning to La Mision Perdida. Buchanan, Raymond, and Garnier were there; Amita and Dorotea in the body of the char-à-bancs, and Maruja seated on the box. Much to his own astonishment and that of some others of the party, Captain Carroll was among the riders. Only Maruja and her mother knew that he was recalled to refute a repetition of the gossip already circulated regarding his sudden withdrawal; only Maruja alone knew the subtle words which made that recall so potent yet so hopeless.

Maruja's quick eyes, observant of everything, even under the double fire of Captain Carroll and Garnier, instantly caught those of the erect figure on the bench in the verandah. Surely that was the face of the tramp she had spoken to! and yet there was a change, not only in the dress but in the general resemblance. After the first glance, Guest withdrew his eyes and gazed at the other figures in the char-à-bancs without moving a muscle.

"It is a very singular thing that a disease of such significance as corpulency, entailing as it does so many inconveniences and vexations, to say nothing of the more serious consequent dangers, should have been allowed to work mischief in the world all these years almost unheeded; so strange, indeed, that one is almost forced to the opinion that corpulency must be a disease of recent times, which has only now assumed sufficient importance to be classed as a disease, and to receive the serious attention of scientific men.

"That corpulency is a disease, is very clear, and there is no reason why it should not be regarded in an equally serious light as consumption or any other disease. Yet it is made light of and ridiculed, and the unfortunate possessor of too much fat, instead of securing the sympathy of his fellow men and women, gets the credit of being a person of gross and intemperate habits, a glutton in fact. Thus, when we see a picture of a fat monk or squire, there is almost invariably present also a big venison pasty, a fat capon, and flagon of wine; so it is that, unconsciously, and, as it seems, unjustly, we always associate a big corporation with big feeding. In a work on the subject of corpulence, recently published by Mr. F. C. Russell, of Woburn House, Store-street, Bedford-square (formerly of Gower-street), London, whose treatment for the cure of corpulency has, as we have said, become so popular that "doing Russell" has become almost a household word, he clearly proves from his experiences in a vast number of cases brought under his notice, that stout persons are usually the most temperate. He also makes it very clear that corpulency is a disease, and a dangerous one too, and while insisting that it should be treated as such, strongly disapproves of the system of attempting to remove superfluous fat by a course of emaciating drugs; pointing out with truth that even where it is possible to get rid of a few pounds of fat by this dangerous means, the reduction is only temporary, and the fat returns more rapidly than it left, and one does not want to be taking physic for ever. In contrast to this doubtful method of procedure, Mr. Russell attacks the disease, as it were, at the fountain head. The medicine he prescribes does not lower, but builds up and tones the system; in short, Mr. Russell's aim is to eradicate, to cure the disease, and that his treatment is the true one seems beyond all doubt. We have now before us many hundreds of communications from persons of all ranks of life, including among them many well-known noblemen, gentlewomen, and professional men, all testifying in the most grateful terms as to great and lasting benefit derived from Mr. Russell's remedy. Want of space does not permit us to quote largely from these letters, but we gather that in one severe case as much as eight pounds of superfluous fat has been got rid of in one week, the writer of the letter going on to say that he never felt in such health and spirits in his life. Three pounds, however, seems to be about the average reduction, depending apparently upon the severity of the case. Mr. Russell's remedy consists of a medicine which has the advantage of being agreeable to take, besides being entirely vegetable in its composition, and perfectly harmless; and from the letters referred to above we may sum up the chief points of Mr. Russell's remedy as follows:—

"Firstly. It is beyond all doubt efficacious.

"Secondly. It is perfectly harmless, on which point all seem to be unanimous. The expressions, 'admirable tonic,' 'splendid stuff,' &c., occurring frequently in the letters referred to.

"Thirdly. It is agreeable to take—a great consideration, for not everybody can take nauseous medicines.

"Fourthly. It does not necessitate semi-starvation.

"Fifthly. The effects are permanent.

"Sixthly. It is a most exhilarating and strengthening tonic.

"Seventhly. It appears that it is particularly beneficial in cases where obesity is accompanied with gout and rheumatism. All this we gather from the unsolicited testimony of a vast number of respectable people, and it is evident that the British public has not been slow to avail itself of Mr. Russell's treatment; indeed, we may look to see in a few years a marked diminution in the number of corpulent persons in England, and then there seems no longer any necessity to carry about with us the incubus of corpulency when it may so easily be got rid of; and we advise those who have not done so, to send to Mr. Russell, Woburn House, Store-street, Bedford-square, London, for his interesting book, which, it seems, is to be had by forwarding eight stamps, sufficient to cover cost of postage and printing. The book contains, among other useful information, the Recipe, showing the harmless nature of the drugs used.

"We understand, by-the-way, that a slight modification of the original formula has made the remedy, if possible, even more certain in its effects than formerly."

For the satisfaction of Stout Persons, who may not be constitutionally robust, it should be mentioned that the Medicine is also a most invigorating tonic. Being also agreeable to the taste, makes a capital drink when largely diluted.

The Recipe referred to above, with other useful information, may be obtained, on receipt of eight stamps, letter rate, of

J. B. CRAMER and CO.'S PUBLICATIONS.

THE BEAUTEOUS SONG. By ODOARDO BARRI. This sublime inspiration has raised the reputation of its well-known composer to the highest pinnacle; it has been sung with success by innumerable artistes; but we have everywhere been received with the greatest favour.
It is published in four keys, and can be sung by Soprano, Contralto, Tenor, or Baritone.

ONCE MORE. By HENRY PARKER. A New Song, by the Composer of "Jerusalem" and "Close to the Threshold." "The Song and the Singer" and "Always True," is bound to attract public attention, and the one in question has been no exception to this rule; it will be found as worthy of the attention of all vocalists as its predecessors have proved. It is published in three keys, and in style and design it may be said to follow in the footsteps of "Close to the Threshold," to which it was intended to be a sequel.

PEACE, TROUBLED HEART.—CIRO PINSUTI. The well-spring of pure and sympathetic melody possessed by this Composer is seemingly inexhaustible, as the same hand that penned "The touch of a vanished hand" and "A voice that is still" has now given us another gem of the purest water, set to words by H. L. D'Arcy Jaxone, of which the following is the last verse:—

Oh, troubled heart! now take thy rest;
Oh, weary head! sleep on His breast;
Oh, darkened life, resplendent shine,
Lit with a radiance all divine;
Each cross and care that life hath given
Are stepping-stones from earth to Heaven.

Published in B flat, C and D; highest compass, D to F.

THE SHILLING. Mr. F. E. Weatherly's story of the innocent deception practised upon Nancy by her Jack, upon his return from sea, has been appropriately set to music by Signor Barri. The melody trips to a lively tune, in the most ear-catching fashion. Published in three keys—B flat, C, and D.

AFTERWARDS, by J. W. MULLEN, the work of a rising young composer, has been steadily growing in the public favour since its first appearance, thanks to a very tuneful melody which it possesses. It is published in three keys—B flat, G, and C.

THORN OR ROSE. By WALTER SLAUGHTER. A graceful and sympathetic song. Published in three keys—C, D, and E flat.

TWO YOUNG FOLKS. ERNEST BUCALOSSI'S New Song. An arch and lively little ditty, which is sure to please. Published in E flat and F.

FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.
A few drops of the FRAGRANT FLORILINE on a wet toothbrush produces a delightful foam, which cleanses the Teeth from all impurities, strengthens and hardens the gums, prevents tartar, and arrests the progress of decay. It gives to the teeth a peculiar and beautiful whiteness, and imparts a delightful fragrance to the breath. It removes all unpleasant odour arising from decayed teeth, a disordered stomach, or tobacco smoke. The FRAGRANT FLORILINE is purely vegetable and equally adapted to old and young.
The FRAGRANT FLORILINE should be used in all cases of bad breath, and particularly by gentlemen after smoking. The Florilline combines, in a concentrated form, the most desirable, cleansing, and astringent properties. At the same time, it contains nothing which can possibly injure the most sensitive and delicate organisation, and imparts a delightful fragrance to the breath. It removes all unpleasant odour arising from decayed teeth, a disordered stomach, or tobacco smoke. The FRAGRANT FLORILINE is purely vegetable and equally adapted to old and young.

FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.
Sweet as the ambrosial air,
With its perfume rich and rare;
Sweet as violets at the morn,
Which the emerald nooks adorn;
Sweet as rosebuds bursting forth
From the richly-laden earth,
Is the "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

The teeth it makes a pearly white,
So pure and lovely to the sight;
The gums assume a rosy hue,
The breath is sweet as violets blue;
While scented as the flowers of May,
Which cast their sweetness from each spray,
Is the "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

Sure, some fairy with its hand
Cast around its mystic wand,
And produced from fairy's bower
Scented perfumes from each flower;
For in this liquid gem we trace—
All that can beauty add and grace—

FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.
Is the best liquid dentifrice in the world; it thoroughly cleanses partially decayed teeth from all parasites or living "animalculæ," leaving them pearly white, imparting a delightful fragrance to the breath. Price 2s. 6d. per Bottle. The Fragrant Florilline removes instantly all odours arising from a foul stomach or tobacco smoke.
For children and adults whose teeth show marks of decay its advantages are paramount. The "Florilline" should be thoroughly brushed into all the cavities; no one need fear using it too often or too much at a time. Among the ingredients being soda, honey, spirits of wine, borax, and extracts from sweet herbs and plants, it forms not only the very best dentifrice for cleansing ever discovered, but one that is perfectly delicious to the taste and as harmless as sherry. The taste is so pleasing that, instead of taking up the toothbrush with dislike, as is often the case, children will on no account allow the "Florilline" regularly each morning, if only left to their own choice. Children cannot be taught the use of the toothbrush too young; early neglect invariably produces premature decay of the teeth. "Florilline" is sold by all Chemists and Perfumers throughout the world, at 2s. 6d. per Bottle.

FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.
If teeth are white and beautiful,
It keeps them so intact;
If they're discoloured in the least,
It brings their whiteness back;
And by its use what good effects
Are daily to be seen;
Thus hence it is that general praise
Greets "FRAGRANT FLORILINE!"

One trial proves conclusive quite,
That by inadequate use
The very best effects arise
That science can produce.
It is the talk of every one,
An all-absorbing theme;
Whilst general now becomes the use
Of "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

It makes the breath as sweet as flowers,
The teeth a pearly white;
The gums it hardens, and it gives
Sensations of delight.
All vile secretions it removes,
However long they've been;
The enamel, too, it will preserve,
The "FRAGRANT FLORILINE."

FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.
It may or may not be generally known that microscopical examinations have proved that animal or vegetable parasites gather, unobserved by the naked eye, upon the teeth and gums of at least nine persons in every ten; any individual may easily satisfy himself in this matter by placing a powerful microscope over a partially-decayed tooth, when the living animalculæ will be found to resemble a partially-decayed cheese more than anything else we can compare it to. We may also state that the FRAGRANT FLORILINE is the only remedy yet discovered able perfectly to free the teeth and gums from these parasites without the slightest injury to the teeth or the most tender gums.
Read this.—From the "Weekly Times," March 26, 1871.—"There are so many toilet articles which obtain all their celebrity from being constantly and extensively advertised that it makes it necessary when anything new and good is introduced to the public that special attention should be called to it. The most delightful and effective dentifrice for cleansing and beautifying the teeth that we in a long experience have ever used is the new Fragrant Florline. It is a pleasure to use it, and its properties of imparting a fragrance to the breath and giving a pearly whiteness to the teeth make it still more valuable. Of all the numerous nostrums for cleansing the teeth which from time to time have been fashionable and popular, nothing to be compared with the Florilline has hitherto been produced, whether considered as a beautifier or a valuable cleanser and preserver of the teeth and gums."
From the "Young Ladies' Journal":—"An agreeable dentifrice is always a luxury. As one of the most agreeable may be reckoned the Florilline. It cleanses the teeth and imparts a pleasant odour to the breath. It has been analysed by several eminent professors of chemistry, and they concur in their testimony to its usefulness. We are frequently asked to recommend a dentifrice to our readers; therefore we cannot do better than advise them to try the Fragrant Florline."

FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.
I have heard a strange statement, dear Fanny, to-day,
That the reason that teeth do decay
Is traced to some objects that form in the gums,
And eat them in time quite away.
Animalcules, they say, are engendered—that is,
If the mouth is not wholesome and clean;
And I also have heard to preserve them the best
Is the fragrant, the sweet "FLORILINE!"

Oh, yes; itis true that secretions will cause
Living objects to form on your teeth,
And certainly and slientiy do they gnaw on
In cavities made underneath;
But a certain preservative has now been found
To keep your mouth wholesome and clean;
And you're perfectly right, for your teeth to preserve,
There's nothing like sweet "FLORILINE!"

'Tis nice and refreshing, and pleasant to use,
And no danger its use can attend;
For clever physicians and dentists as well
Their uniform praises now lend.
They say it 's the best preparation that's known,
And eviden proofs have they seen,
That nothing can equal the virtues that dwell
In the fragrant, the sweet "FLORILINE!"

FLORILINE.
For the TEETH and BREATH.
The "Christian World" of March 17, 1871, says, with respect to Florline:—"Florline bids fair to become a household word in England, and one of peculiarly pleasant meaning. It would be difficult to conceive a more efficacious and agreeable preparation for the teeth. Those who once begin to use it will certainly never willingly give it up."
"I consider 'Fragrant Florline' is, without exception, an excellent preparation for the teeth and gums."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.
Dr. J. C. BROWNE (late Army Medical Staff) DISCOVERED a REMEDY to denote which he coined the word CHLORODYNE. Dr. Browne is the SOLE INVENTOR, and, as the composition of Chlorodyne cannot possibly be discovered by analysis (organic substances defying elimination), and since the formula has never been published, it is evident that any statement to the effect that a compound is identical with Dr. Browne's Chlorodyne must be false.
This caution is necessary, as many persons deceive purchasers by false representations.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.
Vice-Chancellor Sir W. PAGE WOOD stated publicly in Court that Dr. J. COLLIS BROWNE was UNDOUBTEDLY the INVENTOR of CHLORODYNE; that the whole story of the defendant Freeman was deliberately untrue, and he regretted to say it had been sworn to.—See the "Times," July 13, 1864.

From SYMES and CO., Pharmaceutical Chemists, Simla.
"Jan. 5, 1880.
"To J. T. Davenport, London.
"Dear Sir,—We congratulate you upon the widespread reputation this justly-esteemed medicine has earned for itself all over the East, as the remedy of general utility, we much question whether a better is imported, and we shall be glad to hear of its finding a place in every Anglo-Indian home. The other brands, we are happy to say, are now relegated to the native bazaars, and, judging from their sale, we fancy their sojourn there will be evanescent. We could multiply instances ad infinitum of the extraordinary efficacy of DR. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE in Diarrhœa and Dysentery, Spasms, Cramps, Neuralgia, the Vomiting of Pregnancy, and as a general sedative, that have occurred under our personal observation during many years. In Choleraic Diarrhœa, and even in the more terrible forms of Cholera itself, we have witnessed its surprisingly controlling power. We have never used any other form of this medicine than Collis Browne's, from a firm conviction that it is decidedly the best, and also from a sense of duty we owe to the profession and the public, who are of opinion that the substitution of any other than Collis Browne's is a deliberate breach of faith on the part of the chemist to patient and patient alike.—We are, Sir, faithfully yours.

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.
From Dr. B. J. BOULTON and CO., Horncastle.
"We have made pretty extensive use of Chlorodyne in our practice late y, and look upon it as an excellent direct Sedative and Anti-Spasmodic. It seems to allay pain and irritation in whatever organ, and from whatever cause. It induces a feeling of comfort and quietude not obtainable by any other remedy, and it seems to possess this great advantage over all other sedatives, that it leaves no unpleasant after-effects."

DR. J. COLLIS BROWNE'S CHLORODYNE.
From W. VESALIUS PETTEGREW, M.D., Hon. F.R.C.S., England; Lecturer on Anatomy and Physiology at St. George's School of Medicine.
"I have no hesitation in stating that I have never met with any medicine so efficacious as an anti-spasmodic and sedative. I have used it in consumption, asthma, diarrhœa, and other diseases, and am perfectly satisfied with the results."

VALUABLE DISCOVERY for the HAIR.
If your hair is turning grey or white, or falling off, use THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER; for it will positively restore, in every case, grey or white hair to its original colour, without leaving the disagreeable smell of most "Restorer." It makes the hair charmingly beautiful, as well as promoting the growth of the hair on bald spots, where the glands are not decayed.
This preparation has never been known to fail in restoring the hair to its natural colour and gloss in from eight to twelve days.
It promotes growth, and prevents the hair falling out, eradicating dandruff, and leaving the scalp in a clean, healthy condition.
It imparts peculiar vitality to the roots of the hair, restoring it to its youthful freshness and vigour. Daily applications of this preparation for a week or two will surely restore faded, grey, or white hair to its natural colour and richness.
It is not a dye, nor does it contain any colouring matter or offensive substance whatever. Hence it does not soil the hands, the scalp, or even white linen, but produces the colour within the substance of the hair.
It may be had of any respectable Chemist, Perfumer, or Dealer in Toilet Articles in the Kingdom, at 3s. 6d. per Bottle. In case the dealer has not "The Mexican Hair Renewer" in stock and will not procure it for you, it will be sent direct by rail, carriage paid, on receipt of 4s. in stamps, to any part of England.

THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.
WHAT BEAUTIFIES THE HAIR?

What gives luxuriance to each tress,
And praises each one's fancies?
What adds a charm of perfect grace,
And Nature's gift enhances?
What gives a bright and beauteous gloss,
And what says each reviewer?
"That quite successful is the use
Of 'THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER!'"

What gives luxuriance to each tress,
And makes it bright and glowing?
What keeps it free from dandruff, too,
And healthy in its growing?
What does each wonders? Ask the press,
And what says each reviewer?
"That none can equal or approach
'THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER!'"

What gives luxuriance to each tress,
Like some bright halo beaming?
What makes the hair a perfect mass
Of splendid ringlets teeming?
What gives profusion in excess?
Why, what says each reviewer?
"The choicest preparation is
'THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER!'"

What gives luxuriance to each tress,
And makes it so delightful?
Because to speak the honest truth
Is only just and rightful.
What say the people and the press,
And what says each reviewer?
"That most superb for ladies' use
Is 'THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER!'"

has gained for itself the highest reputation, and a decided preference over all other "hair dressings," as evinced from certificates and testimonials from the most respectable sources. Being compounded with the greatest care—combining, as it does, all the most desirable qualities of the best hair preparations of the day, without the objectionable ones—it may be relied on as the very best known to chemistry for restoring the natural colour to the hair, and causing new hair to grow on bald spots, unless the hair glands are decayed; for, if the glands are dead and gone, no stimulant can restore them; but if, as is often the case, the glands are only torpid, THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER will renew their vitality, and a new growth of hair will follow. Read the following Testimonial:—
Messrs. Wm. Hayes and Co., Chemists, 12, Grafton-street, Dublin, write:—"We are recommending THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER to all our customers as the best of the kind, as we have been told by several of our friends who tried it that it has a wonderful effect in restoring and strengthening their Hair."

THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.
AN IMPORTANT QUESTION FOR LADIES.

Would you have luxuriant hair,
Beautiful, and rich, and rare;
Would you have it soft and bright,
And attractive to the sight?
This you really can produce
If you put in constant use
THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

The hair it strengthens and preserves,
And thus a double purpose serves;
It beautifies—improves it, too,
And gives it a most charming hue,
And thus in each essential way,
It public favour gains each day.
THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

If a single thread of hair
Of a greyish tint is there,
This "Renewer" will restore
All its colour as before,
And thus it is that vast renown
Does daily now its virtues crown—
THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

No matter whether faded grey,
Or falling like the leaves away,
It will renew the human hair,
And make it like itself appear.
It will revive it, beautify,
And every ardent wish supply—
THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.

THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER.
The constitution of the person and the condition of the scalp have much to do with the length of time it requires for the hair to grow; also thin or thick hair will depend much upon the vital force remaining in the hair-glands. New hairs are first seen to start around the margin of the bald spots near the unscarred hair, and extending upwards until the spots are covered more or less thickly with short hair. Excessive brushing should be guarded against as soon as the small hairs make their appearance; but the scalp may be sponged with rain water to advantage occasionally. The scalp may be pressed and moved on the bone by the finger ends, which quickens the circulation and softens the spots which have remained hard. On applying this hair-dressing it enlivens the scalp, and in cases where the hair begins to fall a few applications will arrest it, and the new growth presents the luxuriance and colour of youth. It may be relied on as the best hair-dressing known for restoring grey or faded hair to its original colour without dyeing it, producing the colour within the substance of the hair, impar ing a peculiar vitality to the roots, preventing the hair from falling, keeping the head cool, clean, and free from dandruff, causing new hairs to grow, unless the hair-glands are entirely decayed. THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER makes the hair soft, glossy, and luxuriant.

THE WORDS "THE MEXICAN HAIR RENEWER" are a Trade-Mark; and the public will please see the words are on every case surrounding the Bottle, and the name is blown in the Bottle.
The Mexican Hair Renewer, Price 3s. 6d. Directions in German, French, and Spanish.
May be had of most respectable Dealers in all parts of the World.

SPORT.
By W. BROMLEY-DAVENPORT, late M.P. for North Warwickshire.
Fox-hunting. Covert-shooting.
Salmon-fishing. Deer-stalking.
With Twenty-one Full-page and Twenty-four smaller Illustrations by Lieutenant-General Henry Hope Crealocke, C.B.
In a handsome crown 4to volume, 21s.
A few copies of a Large Paper Edition will be issued, with extra Full-page Illustrations by Lieutenant-General Crealocke, forming a handsome volume in demy 4to.
"Whether for the library shelf or the drawing-room table, whether we consider the quality of the writing or the excellence of the illustrations, Mr. Davenport's book is thoroughly satisfactory. It has been long expected, and, unlike many things which are anxiously awaited, performance here exceeds anticipation. His friends can possess no more pleasant memorial of the author."—Athenæum, March 14.

A NEW AND REVISED EDITION (FIFTH THOUSAND) OF ENGLAND: Its People, Polity, and Pursuits.
By T. H. S. ESCOTT.
"Few works are more necessary to that privileged but not always well-informed person, the British citizen. . . . Here is all that men do—their fears, angers, passions, pleasures, labours—reduced into a portable compass, and full of excellent reading as well as of useful knowledge."—Daily News (Leader), Feb. 4.
"It is remarkable to find how well Mr. Escott has succeeded, and with what grasp he has handled the unwieldy mass of materials before him."—Standard (Leader), Feb. 9.

ANCIENT RELIGION AND MODERN THOUGHT.
By W. S. LILLY.
A New Edition, with Additions. Demy 8vo, 12s.
"This is a book which evinces not only wide knowledge and much subtlety of thought but a very high dialectic power. . . . A more powerful statement of the case against the sceptical school, and especially against the school which accounts for conscience as the product of social conditions, impressing themselves on the individual life, it would be difficult to find."—Spectator.

GENERAL GORDON'S LETTERS FROM THE CRIMEA, THE DANUBE, AND ARMENIA, Aug. 18, 1854, to Nov. 17, 1858. HIS OWN WRITING. Crown 8vo, 5s. New Edition, now ready.
"These letters have not heretofore been published. . . . The present volume will be eagerly sought and read by large numbers of his countrymen. Young as he was when these letters were written, the character of the man stands clearly revealed in them. His warm affections, his indomitable cheerfulness of disposition, his patient endurance, his trustful fatalism, his simple courage and faith, his professional ardour, his genial sense of fun, his keen eye for the humorous side of life, his love of activity, and his single-hearted devotion to duty, are all as clearly shown in these letters as in any of the records of his subsequent career. . . . The title of the book, and the fact that it consists almost exclusively of letters written by Gordon himself, are its best and sufficient recommendation to the public favour."—Times.

London: CHATTO and WINDUS,
PICCADILLY, W.

Maruja's whims and caprices were many and original, and when, after a sudden little cry and a declaration that she could stand her cramped position no longer, she leaped from the box into the road, no one was surprised. Garnier and Captain Carroll quickly followed.

"I should like to look into the fonda while the horses are being watered," she said, laughingly, "just to see what it is that attracts Pereo there so often." Before anyone could restrain this new caprice, she was already upon the verandah.

To reach the open door, she had to pass so near Guest that her soft white flounces brushed his knees, and the flowers in her girdle left their perfume in his face. But he neither moved nor raised his eyes. When she had passed, he rose quietly and stepped into the road.

On her nearer survey, Maruja was convinced it was the same man. She remained for an instant with a little hand on the door-post. "What a horrid place, and what dreadful people!" she said in audible English as she glanced quickly after Guest. "Really, Pereo ought to be warned against keeping such company. Come, let us go."

She contrived to pass Guest again in regaining the carriage; but in the few moments' further delay he walked on down the road before them, and by the time they were ready to start he was slowly sauntering some hundred yards ahead. They passed him at a rapid trot, but the next moment the char-à-bancs was suddenly pulled up.

"My fan!" cried Maruja. "Blessed Santa Maria!—my fan!"

A small black object, seen distinctly in the moonlight, was lying on the road, directly in the track of the sauntering stranger. Garnier attempted to alight; Carroll reined in his horse.

"Stop, all of you!" said Maruja; "that man will bring it to me."

It seemed as if he would. He stopped and picked it up, and approached the carriage. Maruja stood up in her seat with her veil thrown back, her graceful hand extended, her eyes and mouth tremulous with an irresistible smile. The stranger came nearer, singled out Captain Carroll, tossed the fan to him with a slight nod, and passed on the other side.

"One moment," said Maruja, almost harshly, to the driver. "One moment," she continued, drawing her purse from her pocket brusquely. "Let me reward this civil gentleman of the road! Here, Sir;" but, before she could continue, Carroll wheeled to her side, and interposed. "Pray collect yourself, Miss Saltonstall," he said, hurriedly; "you cannot tell who this man may be. He does not seem to be one who would insult you, or whom you would insult gratuitously."

"Give me the fan, Captain Carroll," she said, with a soft and caressing smile. "Thank you." She took it, and, breaking it through the middle between her gloved hands, tossed it into the highway. "You are right—it smells of the fonda—and the road. Thank you, again. You are so thoughtful for me, Captain Carroll," she murmured, raising her eyes gently to his, and then suddenly withdrawing them with a half sigh. "But I am keeping you all. Go on."

The carriage rolled away and Guest returned from the hedge to the middle of the road. San José lay in the opposite direction from the disappearing cavalcade; but on leaving the fonda he had determined to lead his inquisitors astray by doubling and making a circuit of the hostelry through the fields hidden in the tall grain. This he did, securely passing them within sound of their voices, and was soon well on his way again. He avoided the highway, and striking a trail through the meadows, diverged to the right, where the low towers and brown walls of a ruined mission church rose above the plain. This would enable him to escape any direct pursuit on the high road, besides, from its slight elevation, giving him a more extended view of the plain. As he neared it, he was surprised to see that, although it was partly dismantled, and the roof had fallen in the central aisle, a part of it was still used as a chapel, and a light was burning behind a narrow opening, partly window and partly shrine. He was almost upon it, when the figure of a man who had been kneeling beneath, with his back towards him, rose, crossed himself devoutly, and stood upright. Before he could turn, Guest disappeared round the angle of the wall, and the tall erect figure of the solitary worshipper passed on without heeding him.

But if Guest had been successful in evading the observation of the man he had come so suddenly upon, he was utterly unconscious of another figure that had been tracking him for the last ten minutes through the tall grain, and had even succeeded in gaining the shadow of the wall behind him; and it was this figure, and not his own, that eventually attracted the attention of the tall stranger. The pursuing figure was rapidly approaching the unconscious Guest: in another moment it would have been upon him, when it was suddenly seized from behind by the tall devotee. There was a momentary struggle, and then it freed itself, with the exclamation, "Pereo!"

"Yes—Pereo!" said the old man, panting from his exertions. "And thou art Miguel. So thou wouldst murder a man for a few pesos!" he said, pointing to the knife which the desperado had hurriedly hid in his jacket, "and callest thyself a Californian!"

"'Tis only an Americano—a runaway, with some ill-gotten gold," said Miguel, sullenly, yet with unmistakable fear of the old man. "Besides, it was only to frighten him, the braggart. But since thou fearest to touch a hair of those interlopers"——

"Fearest!" said Pereo, fiercely, clutching him by the throat, and forcing him against the wall. "Fearest! sayest thou. I, Pereo, fear? Dost thou think I would soil these hands, that might strike a higher quarry, with blood of thy game?"

"Forgive me, padrono," gasped Miguel, now thoroughly alarmed at the old man's awakened passion; "pardon; I meant that, since thou knowest him"——

"I know him?" repeated Pereo, scornfully, contemptuously throwing Miguel aside, who at once took that opportunity to increase his distance from the old man's arm. "I know him? Thou shalt see. Come hither, child," he called, beckoning to Guest. "Come hither, thou hast nothing to fear now."

Guest, who had been attracted by the sound of altercation behind him, but who was utterly unconscious of its origin or his own relation to it, came forward impatiently. As he did so, Miguel took to his heels. The act did not tend to mollify Guest's surly suspicions, and pausing a few feet from the old man, he roughly demanded his business with him.

Pereo raised his head with the dignity of years and habits of command. The face of the young man confronting him was clearly illuminated by the moonlight. Pereo's eyes suddenly dilated, his mouth stiffened, he staggered back against the wall.

"Who are you?" he gasped, in uncertain English.

Believing himself the subject of some drunkard's pastime, Guest replied, savagely, "One who has enough of this d——d nonsense, and will stand no more of it from anyone, young or old," and turned abruptly on his heel.

"Stay, one moment, Señor, for the love of God!"

Some keen accent of agony in the old man's voice touched even Guest's selfish nature. He halted.

"You are—a stranger here?"—faltered Pereo. "Yes?"

"I am."

"You do not live here?—you have no friends?"

"I told you I am a stranger. I never was here before in my life," said Guest, impatiently.

"True; I am a fool," said the old man, hurriedly, to himself. "I am mad—mad! It is not his voice. No! It is not his look, now that his face changes. I am crazy." He stopped, and passed his trembling hands across his eyes. "Pardon, Señor," he continued, recalling himself with a humility that was almost ironical in its extravagance. "Pardon, pardon! Yet, perhaps it is not too much to have wanted to know who was the man one has saved."

"Saved!" repeated Guest, with incredulous contempt.

"Ay!" said Pereo, haughtily, drawing his figure erect; "ay, saved! Señor." He stopped and shrugged his shoulders. "But let it pass—I say—let it pass. Take an old man's advice, friend; show not your gold hereafter to strangers lightly, no matter how lightly you have come by it. Good-night!"

Guest for a moment hesitated whether to resent the old man's speech, or to let it pass as the incoherent fancy of a brain maddened by drink. Then he ended the discussion by turning his back abruptly and continuing his way to the high road.

"So!" said Pereo, looking after him with abstracted eyes, "so! it was only a fancy. And yet—even now, as he turned away, I saw the same cold insolence in his eye. Caramba! Am I mad—mad—that I must keep for ever before my eyes, night and day, the image of that dog in every outcast, every ruffian, every wayside bully that I meet? No, no, good Pereo! Softly! this is mere madness, good Pereo," he murmured to himself; "thou wilt have none of it; none, good Pereo. Come, come!" He let his head fall slowly forward on his breast, and in that action, seeming to take up again the burden of a score more years upon his shoulders, he moved slowly away.

When he entered the fonda half an hour later, the awe in which he was held by the half superstitious ruffians appeared to have increased. Whatever story the fugitive Miguel had told his companions regarding Pereo's protection of the young stranger, it was certain that it had its full effect. Obsequious to the last degree, the landlord was so profoundly touched, when Pereo, not displeased with this evidence of his power over his countrymen, condescendingly offered to click glasses with him, that he endeavoured to placate him still further.

"It is a pity your worship was not here earlier," he began, with a significant glance at the others, "to have seen a gallant young stranger that was here. A spice of wickedness about him, truly—a kind of Don Cæsar—but bearing himself like a very caballero always. It would have pleased your worship, who likes not those canting Puritans such as our neighbour yonder."

"Ah," said Pereo, reflectively, warming under the potent fires of flattery and aguardiente, "possibly I have seen him. He was like"——

"Like none of the dogs thou hast seen about San Antonio," interrupted the landlord. "Scarcely did he seem Americano, though he spoke no Spanish."

The old man chuckled to himself viciously. "And thou, thou old fool, Pereo, must needs see a likeness to thine enemy in this poor runaway child—this fugitive Don Juan! He! he!" Nevertheless, he still felt a vague terror of the condition of mind which had produced this fancy, and drank so deeply to dispel his nervousness that it was with difficulty he could mount his horse again. The exaltation of liquor, however, appeared only to intensify his characteristics; his face became more lugubrious and melancholy, his manner more ceremonious and dignified; and, erect and stiff in his saddle from the waist upwards, but leaning from side to side with the motion of his horse, like the tall mast of some labouring sloop, he "loped" away towards the House of the Lost Mission. Once or twice he broke into sentimental song. Strangely enough, his ditty was a popular Spanish refrain of some matador's aristocratic inamorata:—

Do you see my black eyes?
I am Mañuel's Duchess, sang Pereo, with infinite gravity. His horse's hoofs seemed to keep time with the refrain, and he occasionally waved in the air the long leather thong of his bridle-rein.

It was quite late when he reached La Mision Perdida. Turning into the little lane that led to the stable-yard, he dismounted at a gate in the hedge which led to the summer house of the old Mision garden, and, throwing his reins on his mustang's neck, let the animal precede him to the stables. The moon shone full on the inclosure as he emerged from the labyrinth. With uncovered head he approached the Indian mound, and sank on his knees before it.

The next moment he rose with an exclamation of terror, and his hat dropped from his trembling hand. Directly before him, a small, grey, wolfish-looking animal had stopped halfway down the mound on encountering his motionless figure. Frightened by his outcry, and unable to retreat, the shadowy depredator had fallen back on his slinking haunches with a snarl, and bared teeth that glittered in the moonlight.

In an instant the expression of terror on the old man's ashen face turned into a fixed look of insane exaltation. His white lips moved; he advanced a step further, and held out both hands towards the crouching animal.

"So! It is thou—at last! And comest thou here thy tardy Pereo to chide? Comest thou, too, to tell the poor old man his heart is cold, his limbs are feeble, his brain weak and dizzy?—that he is no longer fit to do thy master's work? Ay, gnash thy teeth at him! Curse him!—curse him in thy throat! But listen!—listen, good friend—I will tell thee a secret—ay, good grey friar, a secret—such a secret! A plan, all mine—fresh from this old grey head; ha! ha!—all mine! To be wrought by these poor old arms; ha! ha! All mine! Listen!"

He stealthily made a step nearer the affrighted animal. With a sudden sidelong snap, it swiftly bounded by his side, and vanished in the thicket; and Pereo, turning wildly, with a moan sank down helplessly on the grave of his forefathers.

CHAPTER VI.

To the open chagrin of most of the gentlemen and the unexpected relief of some of her own sex, Maruja, after an evening of more than usual caprice and wilfulness, retired early to her chamber. Here she beguiled Enriquita, a younger sister, to share her solitude for an hour, and with a new and charming melancholy presented her with mature counsel and some younger trinkets and adornments.

"Thou wilt find them but folly, 'Riquita; but thou art young, and wilt outgrow them as I have. I am sick of the Indian beads, everybody wears them; but they seem to suit thy complexion. Thou art not yet quite old enough for jewellery; but take thy choice of these."

"'Ruja," replied Enriquita, eagerly, "surely thou wilt not give up this necklace of carved amber, that was brought thee from Manilla?—it becomes thee so! Everybody says it. All the caballeros, Raymond and Victor, swear that it sets off thy beauty like nothing else." "When thou knowest men better," responded Maruja, in a deep voice, "thou wilt care less for what they say, and despise what they do. Besides, I wore it to-day—and—I hate it." "But what fan wilt thou keep thyself? The one of sandal-wood thou hadst to-day?" continued Enriquita, timidly eyeing the pretty things upon the table. "None," responded Maruja, didactically, "but the simplest, which I shall buy myself. Truly, it is time to set oneself against this extravagance. Girls think nothing of spending as much upon a fan as would buy a horse and saddle for a poor man." "But why so serious to-night, my sister?" said the little Enriquita, her eyes filling with ready tears. "It grieves me," responded Maruja, promptly, "to find thee, like the rest, giving thy soul up to the mere glitter of the world. However, go, child, take the beads, but leave the amber; it would make thee yellower than thou art, which the blessed Virgin forbid! Good-night."

"Stop, all of you," said Maruja; "that man will bring it to me."—CHAP. V.

She kissed her affectionately, and pushed her from the room. Nevertheless, after a moment's survey of her lonely chamber, she hastily slipped on a pale satin dressing-gown, and, darting across the passage, dashed into the bed-room of the youngest Miss Wilson, haled that sentimental brunette from her night toilette, dragged her into her own chamber, and, enwrapping her in a huge mantle of silk and grey fur, fed her with chocolates and chestnuts, and, reclining on her sympathetic shoulder, continued her arraignment of the world and its follies until nearly daybreak.

It was past noon when Maruja awoke, to find Faquita standing by her bedside with ill-concealed impatience.

"I ventured to awaken the Doña Maruja," she said, with vivacious alacrity, "for news! Terrible news! The American, Dr. West, is found dead this morning in the San José road!"

"Dr. West dead!" repeated Maruja, thoughtfully, but without emotion.

"Surely dead—very dead. He was thrown from his horse and dragged by the stirrups—how far, the Blessed Virgin only knows. But he is found dead—this Dr. West—his foot in the broken stirrup, his hand holding a piece of the bridle! I thought I would waken the Doña Maruja, that no one else should break it to the Doña Maria."

"That no one else should break it to my mother?" repeated Maruja, coldly. "What mean you, girl?"

"I mean that no stranger should tell her," stammered Faquita, lowering her bold eyes.

"You mean," said Maruja, slowly, "that no silly, staring, tongue-wagging gossip should dare to break upon the morning devotions of the lady mother with open-mouthed tales of horror! You are wise, Faquita! I will tell her myself. Help me to dress."

But the news had already touched the outer shell of the great house, and little groups of the visitors were discussing it upon the verandah. For once, the idle badinage of a pleasure-seeking existence was suspended; stupid people with facts came to the fore; practical people with inquiring minds became interesting; servants were confidentially appealed to; the local express man became a hero, and it was even noticed that he was intelligent and good-looking.

"What makes it more distressing," said Raymond, joining one of the groups, "is, that it appears the Doctor visited Mrs. Saltonstall last evening, and left the casa at eleven. Sanchez, who was perhaps the last person who saw him alive, says that he noticed his horse was very violent, and the Doctor did not seem able to control him. The accident probably happened half an hour later, as he was picked up about three miles from here, and from appearances must have been dragged with his foot in the stirrup fully half a mile before the girth broke and freed the saddle and stirrup together. The mustang, with nothing on but his broken bridle, was found grazing at the rancho as early as four o'clock, an hour before the body of his master was discovered by the men sent from the rancho to look for him."

"Eh, but the man must have been clean daft to have trusted himself to one of those savage beasts of the country," said Mr. Buchanan. "And he was no so young either—about sixty, I should say. It didna look even respectable, I remember, when we met him the other day, careering over the country for all the world like one of those crazy Mexicans. And yet he seemed steady and sensible enough when he didna let his schemes of 'improvements' run away with him like you furious beastie. Eh well, puir man—it was a sudden ending! And his family—eh?"

"I don't think he has one—at least here," said Raymond. "You can't always tell in California. I believe he was a widower."

"Ay, man, but the heirs; there must be considerable property?" said Buchanan, impatiently.

"Oh, the heirs. If he's made no will, which doesn't look like so prudent and practical a man as he was—the heirs will probably crop up some day."

"Probably! crop up some day," repeated Buchanan, aghast.

"Yes. You must remember that we don't take heirs quite as much into account as you do in the old country. The loss of the man and how to replace him, is much more to us than the disposal of his property. Now, Doctor West was a power far beyond his actual possessions—and we will know very soon how much those were dependent upon him."

"What do you mean?" asked Buchanan, anxiously.

"I mean that five minutes after the news of the Doctor's death was confirmed, your friend Mr. Stanton sent a messenger with a despatch to the nearest telegraphic office, and that he himself drove over to catch Aladdin before the news could reach him."

Buchanan looked uneasy; so did one or two of the native Californians who composed the group, and who had been listening attentively. "And where is this same telegraphic office?" asked Buchanan, cautiously.

"I'll drive you over there presently," responded Raymond, grimly. "There'll be nothing doing here to day. As Dr. West was a near neighbour of the family, his death suspends our pleasure-seeking until after the funeral."

Mr. Buchanan moved away. Captain Carroll and Garnier drew nearer the speaker. "I trust it will not withdraw from us the society of Miss Saltonstall," said Garnier, lightly—"at least, that she will not be inconsolable."

"She did not seem to be particularly sympathetic with Dr. West the other day," said Captain Carroll, colouring slightly with the recollection of the morning in the summer-house, yet willing, in his hopeless passion, even to share that recollection with his rival. "Did you not think so, Monsieur Garnier?"

"Very possibly; and, as Miss Saltonstall is quite artless and childlike in the expression of her likes and dislikes," said Raymond, with the faintest touch of irony, "you can judge as well as I can."

Garnier parried the thrust lightly. "You are no kinder to our follies than you are to the grand passions of these gentlemen. Confess, you frightened them horribly. You are—what is called—a bear—eh? You depreciate in the interests of business."

Raymond did not at first appear to notice the sarcasm. "I only stated," he said, gravely, "that which these gentlemen will find out for themselves before they are many hours older. Dr. West was the brain of the county, as Aladdin is its life-blood. It only remains to be seen how far the loss of that brain affects the county. The Stock Exchange market in San Francisco will indicate that to-day in the shares of the San Antonio and Soquel Railroad and the West Mills and Manufacturing Co. It is a matter that may affect even our friends here. Whatever West's social standing was in this house, lately he was in confidential business relations with Mrs. Saltonstall." He raised his eyes for the first time to Garnier as he added, slowly, "It is to be hoped that if our hostess has no social reasons to deplore the loss of Dr. West, she at least will have no other."

With a lover's instinct, conscious only of some annoyance to Maruja in all this, Carroll anxiously looked for her appearance among the others. He was doomed to disappointment, however. His half-timid inquiries only resulted in the information that Maruja was closeted with her mother. The penetralia of the casa was only accessible to the family; yet, as he wandered uneasily about, he could not help passing once or twice before the quaint low archway with its grated door that opened from the central hall. His surprise may be imagined when he suddenly heard his name uttered in a low voice; and, looking up, he beheld the soft eyes of Maruja at the grating.

She held the door partly open with one little hand, and made a sign for him to enter with the other. When he had done so, she said, "Come with me," and preceded him down the dim corridor. His heart beat thickly; the incense of this sacred inner life, with its faint suggestion of dead rose-leaves, filled him with a voluptuous languor; his breath was lost, as if a soft kiss had taken it away; his senses swam in the light mist that seemed to suffuse everything. His step trembled as she suddenly turned aside, and, opening a door, ushered him into a small vaulted chamber.

In the first glance it seemed to be an oratory or chapel. A large gold and ebony crucifix hung on the wall. There was a prie-dieu of heavy dark mahogany in the centre of the tiled floor; there was a low ottoman or couch, covered with a mantle of dark violet velvet, like a pall; there were two quaintly carved stiff chairs; a religious, almost ascetic, air pervaded the apartment; but no dreamy eastern seraglio could have affected him with an intoxication so profoundly and mysteriously sensuous.

Maruja pointed to a chair, and then, with a peculiarly feminine movement, placed herself sideways upon the ottoman, half reclining on her elbow on a high cushion, her deep billowy flounces partly veiling the funereal velvet below. Her oval face was pale and melancholy, her eyes moist as if with recent tears; an expression as of troubled passion lurked in their depths and in the corners of her mouth. Scarcely knowing why, Carroll fancied that thus she might appear if she were in love, and the daring thought made him tremble.

"I wanted to speak with you alone," she said, gently, as if in explanation; "but don't look at me so. I have had a bad night, and now this calamity"—she stopped and then added, softly, "I want you to do a favour for—my mother?"

Captain Carroll with an effort at last found his voice. "But you are in trouble, you are suffering. I had no idea this unfortunate affair came so near to you."

"Nor did I," said Maruja, closing her fan with a slight snap. "I knew nothing of it until my mother told me this morning. To be frank with you, it now appears that Dr. West was her most intimate business adviser. All her affairs were in his hands. I cannot explain how, or why, or when; but it is so."

"And is that all?" said Carroll, with boyish openness of relief. "And you have no other sorrow?"

In spite of herself, a tender smile, such as she might have bestowed on an impulsive boy, broke on her lips. "And is that not enough? What would you? No—sit where you are! We are here to talk seriously. And you do not ask what is this favour my mother wishes?"

"No matter what it is, it shall be done," said Carroll, quickly. "I am your mother's slave if she will but let me serve at your side. Only," he paused, "I wish it was not business—I know nothing of business."

"If it were only business, Captain Carroll," said Maruja slowly, "I would have spoken to Raymond or the Señor Buchanan; if it were only confidence, Pereo, our mayordomo, would have dragged himself from his sick bed this morning to do my mother's bidding. But it is more than that—it is the functions of a gentleman—and my mother, Captain Carroll, would like to say of—a friend."

He seized her hand and covered it with kisses. She withdrew it gently.

"What have I to do?" he asked, eagerly.

She drew a note from her belt. "It is very simple. You must ride over to Aladdin with that note. You must give it to him alone—more than that, you must not let anyone who may be there, think you are making any but a social call. If he keeps you to dine—you must stay—you will bring back anything he may give you and deliver it to me secretly for her."

"Is that all?" asked Carroll, with a slight touch of disappointment in his tone.

"No," said Maruja, rising impulsively. "No, Captain Carroll—it is not all! And you shall know all, if only to prove to you how we confide in you—and to leave you free, after you have heard it, to do as you please." She stood before him, quite white, opening and shutting her fan quickly, and tapping the tiled floor with her little foot. "I have told you Dr. West was my mother's business adviser. She looked upon him as more—as a friend. Do you know what a dangerous thing it is for a woman who has lost one protector to begin to rely upon another? Well, my mother is not yet old. Dr. West appreciated her—Dr. West did not depreciate himself—two things that go far with a woman, Captain Carroll, and my mother is a woman." She paused, and then, with a light toss of her fan, said: "Well, to make an end, but for this excellent horse and this too ambitious rider, one knows not how far the old story of my mother's first choice would have been repeated, and the curse of Koorotora again fallen on the land."

"And you tell me this—you, Maruja—you who warned me against my hopeless passion for you?"

"Could I foresee this?" she said, passionately; "and are you mad enough not to see that this very act would have made your suit intolerable to my relations."

"Then you did think of my suit, Maruja?" he said, grasping her hand.

"Or anyone's suit," she continued hurriedly, turning away with a slight increase of colour in her cheeks. After a moment's pause, she added, in a gentler and half-reproachful voice, "Do you think I have confided my mother's story to you for this purpose only? Is this the help you proffer?"

"Forgive me, Maruja," said the young officer, earnestly. "I am selfish, I know—for I love you. But you have not told me yet how I could help your mother by delivering this letter, which anyone could do."

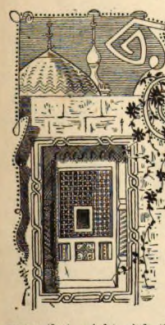
"Let me finish, then," said Maruja. "It is for you to judge what may be done. Letters have passed between my mother and Dr. West. My mother is imprudent; I know not what she may have written or what she might not write in confidence. But you understand, they are not letters to be made public nor to pass into any hands but hers. They are not be left to be bandied about by his American friends; to be commented upon by strangers; to reach the ears of the Guitierrez. They belong to that grave which lies between the Past and my mother; they must not rise from it to haunt her."

"I understand," said the young officer, quietly. "This letter, then, is my authority to recover them?"

"Partly, though it refers to other matters. This Mr. Prince, whom you Americans call Aladdin, was a friend of Dr. West; they were associated in business, and he will probably have access to his papers. The rest we must leave to you."

"I think you may," said Carroll, simply.

Maruja stretched out her hand. The young man bent over it respectfully and moved towards the door.



She had expected him to make some protestation—perhaps even to claim some reward. But the instinct which made him forbear even in thought to take advantage of the duty laid upon him, which dominated even his miserable passion for her, and made it subservient to his exaltation of honour; this epaulette of the officer, and blood of the gentleman, this simple possession of knighthood not laid on by perfunctory steel, but springing from within—all this, I grieve to say, was partly unintelligible to Maruja, and not entirely satisfactory. Since he had entered the room they seemed to have changed their situations; he was no longer the pleading lover that trembled at her feet. For one base moment she thought it was the result of his knowledge of her mother's weakness; but the next instant, meeting his clear glance, she coloured with shame. Yet she detained him vaguely a moment before the grated door in the secure shadow of the arch. He might have kissed her there! He did not.

In the gloomy stagnation of the great house, it was natural that he should escape from it for a while, and the saddling of his horse for a solitary ride attracted no attention. But it might have been noticed that his manner had lost much of that nervous susceptibility and anxiety which indicates a lover; and it was with a return of his professional coolness and precision that he rode out of the patio as if on parade. Erect, observant, and self-possessed, he felt himself "on duty," and, putting spurs to his horse, cantered along the high road, finding an inexpressible relief in motion. He was doing something in the interest of helplessness and of her. He had no doubt of his right to interfere. He did not bother himself with the rights of others. Like all self-contained men, he had no plan of action, except what the occasion might suggest.

He was more than two miles from La Mision Perdida, when his quick eye was attracted by a saddle-blanket lying in the roadside ditch. A recollection of the calamity of the previous night made him rein in his horse and examine it. It was without doubt the saddle-blanket of Dr. West's horse, lost when the saddle came off, after the Doctor's body had been dragged by the runaway beast. But a second fact forced itself equally upon the young officer. It was lying nearly a mile from the spot where the body had been picked up. This certainly did not agree with the accepted theory that the accident had taken place further on, and that the body had been dragged until the saddle came off where it was found. His professional knowledge of equitation and the technique of accoutrements exploded the idea that the saddle could have slipped here, the saddle-blanket fallen, and the horse have run nearly a mile hampered by the saddle hanging under him. Consequently, the saddle, blanket, and unfortunate rider must have been precipitated together, and at the same moment, on or near this very spot. Captain Carroll was not a detective; he had no theory to establish, no motive to discover, only as an officer, he would have simply rejected any excuse offered on those terms by one of his troopers to account for a similar accident. He troubled himself with no further deduction. Without dismounting, he gave a closer attention to the marks of struggling hoofs near the edge of the ditch, which had not yet been obliterated by the daily travel. In doing so, his horse's hoof struck a small object partly hidden in the thick dust of the highway. It seemed to be a leather letter or memorandum case adapted for the breast pocket. Carroll instantly dismounted and picked it up. The name and address of Dr. West were legibly written on the inside. It contained a few papers and notes, but nothing more. The possibility that it might disclose the letters he was seeking was a hope quickly past. It was only a corroborative fact that the accident had taken place on the spot where he was standing. He was losing time; he hurriedly put the book in his pocket, and once more spurred forward on his road.

CHAPTER VII.

THE exterior of Aladdin's Palace, familiar as it already was to Carroll, struck him that afternoon as looking more than usually unreal, ephemeral and unsubstantial. The Moorish arches, of the thinnest white pine, the arabesque screens and lattices that looked as if made of pierced cardboard, the golden minarets that seemed to be glued to the shell-like towers, and the hollow battlements that visibly warped and cracked in the fierce sunlight—all appeared more than ever like a theatrical scene that might sink through the ground or vanish on either side to the sound of the prompter's whistle. Recalling Raymond's cynical insinuations, he could not help fancying that the house had been built by a conscientious genie with a view to the possibility of the lamp and the ring passing, with other effects, into the hands of the sheriff.

Nevertheless, the servant who took Captain Carroll's horse summoned another domestic, who preceded him into a small waiting-room off the gorgeous central hall, which looked not unlike the private bar-room of a first-class hotel, and presented him with a sherry cobbler. It was a peculiarity of Aladdin's Palace that the host seldom did the honours of his own house, but usually deputed the task to some friend, and generally the last newcomer. Carroll was consequently not surprised when he was presently joined by an utter stranger, who again pressed upon him the refreshment he had just declined. "You see," said the transitory host, "I'm a stranger myself here, and haven't got the ways of the regular customers; but call for anything you like, and I'll see it got for you. Jim" (the actual Christian name of Aladdin) "is headin' a party through the stables. Would you like to join 'em—they aint more than half through now—or will you come right to the billiard-room—the latest thing out in stained glass and iron—ez pretty as fresh paint? or will you meander along to the bridal suite, and see the bamboo and silver dressing-room, and the white satin and crystal bed that cost fifteen thousand dollars as it stands. Or," he added, confidentially, "would you like to cut the whole cussed thing, and I'll get out Jim's 2.32 trotter and his spider-legged buggy, and we'll take a spin over to the Springs afore dinner?" It was, however, more convenient to Carroll's purpose to conceal his familiarity with the Aladdin treasures, and to politely offer to follow his guide through the house. "I reckon Jim's pretty busy just now," continued the stranger; "what with old Doc West going under so suddent, just ez he'd got things boomin' with that railroad and his manufactory company. The stocks went down to nothing this morning; and, 'twixt you and me, the boys say," he added, mysteriously sinking his voice, "it was jest the tightest squeeze there whether there wouldn't be a general burst up all round. But Jim was over at San Antonio afore the Doctor's body was laid out, just ran that telegraph himself for about two hours; had a meeting of trustees and directors afore the Coroner came; had the Doctor's books and papers brought over here in a buggy, and another meeting before luncheon. Why, by the time the other fellows began to drop in to know if the Doctor was really dead, Jim Prince had discounted the whole affair two years ahead. Why, bless you, nearly everybody is in it. That Spanish woman over there, with the pretty daughter—that high-toned Greaser with the big house—you know who I mean . . ."

"I don't think I do," said Carroll, coldly. "I know a lady named Saltonstall, with several daughters."

"That's her; thought I'd seen you there once. Well, the Doctor's got her into it, up to the eyes. I reckon she's mortgaged everything to him."

It required all Carroll's trained self-possession to prevent his garrulous guide from reading his emotion in his face. This, then, was the secret of Maruja's melancholy. Poor child! how bravely she had borne up under it; and he, in his utter selfishness, had never suspected it. Perhaps that letter was her delicate way of breaking the news to him, for he should certainly now hear it all from Aladdin's lips. And this man, who evidently had succeeded to the control of Dr. West's property, doubtless had possession of the letters too! Humph! He shut his lips firmly together, and strode along by the side of his innocent guide, erect and defiant.

He did not have long to wait. The sound of voices, the opening of doors, and the trampling of feet indicated that the other party were being "shown over" that part of the building Carroll and his companion were approaching. "There's Jim and his gang now," said his cicerone; "I'll tell him you're here, and step out of this show business myself. So long! I reckon I'll see you at dinner." At this moment Prince and a number of ladies and gentlemen appeared at the further end of the hall; his late guide joined them, and apparently indicated Carroll's presence, as, with a certain lounging, off-duty, officer-like way the young man sauntered on.

Aladdin, like others of his class, objected to the military, theoretically and practically; but he was not above recognising their social importance in a country of no society, and of even being fascinated by Carroll's quiet and secure self-possession and self-contentment in a community of restless ambition and aggressive assertion. He came forward to welcome him cordially; he introduced him with an air of satisfaction; he would have preferred if he had been in uniform, but he contented himself with the fact that Carroll, like all men of disciplined limbs, carried himself equally well in mufti.

"You have shown us everything," said Carroll, smiling, "except the secret chamber where you keep the magic lamp and ring. Are we not to see the spot where the incantation that produces these marvels is held, even if we are forbidden to witness the ceremony? The ladies are dying to see your sanctum—your study—your workshop—where you really live."

"You 'll find it a mere den, as plain as my bed-room," said Prince, who prided himself on the Spartan simplicity of his own habits, and was not averse to the exhibition. "Come this way." He crossed the hall, and entered a small, plainly furnished room, containing a table piled with papers, some of which were dusty and worn-looking. Carroll instantly conceived the idea that these were Dr. West's property. He took his letter quietly from his pocket; and when the attention of the others was diverted, laid it on the table, with the remark, in an undertone, audible only to Prince, "From Mrs. Saltonstall."

Aladdin had that sublime audacity which so often fills the place of tact. Casting a rapid glance at Carroll, he cried, "Hallo!" and wheeling suddenly round on his following guests, with a bewildering extravagance of playful brusqueness, actually bundled them from the room. "The incantation is on!" he cried, waving his arms in the air; "the geni is at work. No admittance except on business! Follow Miss Wilson," he added, clapping both hands on the shoulders of the prettiest and shyest young lady of the party, with an irresistible paternal familiarity. "She's your hostess. I'll honour her drafts to any amount;" and before they were aware of his purpose, or that Carroll was no longer among them, Aladdin had closed the door, that shut with a spring lock, and was alone with the young man. He walked quickly to his desk, took up the letter, and opened it.

His face of dominant, self-satisfied good-humour became set and stern. Without taking the least notice of Carroll, he rose, and, stepping to a telegraphic instrument at a side table, manipulated half a dozen ivory knobs with a sudden energy. Then he returned to the table, and began hurriedly to glance over the memoranda and indorsements of the files of papers piled upon it. Carroll's quick eye caught sight of a small packet of letters in a writing of unmistakable feminine delicacy, and made certain they were the ones he was in quest of. Without raising his eyes, Mr. Prince asked, almost rudely,

"Who else has she told this to?"

"If you refer to the contents of that letter, it was written and handed to me about three hours ago. It has not been out of my possession since then."

"Humph! Who 's at the casa? There 's Buchanan, and Raymond, and Victor Guitierrez, eh?"

"I think I can say almost positively that Mrs. Saltonstall has seen no one but her daughter since the news reached her, if that is what you wish to know," said Carroll, still following the particular package of letters with his eyes, as Mr. Prince continued his examination. Prince stopped.

"Are you sure?"

"Almost sure."

Prince rose, this time with a greater ease of manner, and, going to the table, ran his fingers over the knobs, as if mechanically. "One would like to know at once all there is to know about a transaction that changes the front of four millions of capital in about four hours, eh, Captain?" he said, for the first time really regarding his guest. "Just four hours ago, in this very room, we found out that the widow Saltonstall owed Dr. West about a million, tied up in investments, and we calculated to pull her through with perhaps the loss of half. If she 's got this assignment of the Doctor's property that she speaks of in her letter, as collateral security, and it's all regular, and she—so to speak—steps into Dr. West's place, by G—d, Sir, we owe him about three millions, and we've got to settle with her—and that's all about it. You've dropped a little bombshell in here, Captain, and the splinters are flying round as far as San Francisco, now. I confess it beats me regularly. I always thought the old man was a little keen over there at the casa—but she was a woman, and he was a man for all his sixty years, and that combination I never thought of. I only wonder she hadn't gobbled him up before."

Captain Carroll's face betrayed no trace of the bewilderment and satisfaction at this news of which he had been the unconscious bearer, nor of resentment at the coarseness of its translation.

"There does not seem to be any memorandum of this asssignment," continued Prince, turning over the papers.

"Have you looked here?" said Carroll, taking up the packet of letters.

"No—they seem to me some private letters she refers to in this letter, and that she wants back again."

"Let us see," said Carroll, untying the packet. There were three or four closely written notes in Spanish and English.

"Love-letters, I reckon," said Prince—"that 's why the old girl wants 'em back. She don't care to have the wheedling that fetched the Doctor trotted out to the public."

"Let us look more carefully," said Carroll, pleasantly, opening each letter before Prince, yet so skilfully as to frustrate any attempt of the latter to read them. "There does not seem to be any memorandum here. They are evidently only private letters."

"Quite so," said Prince.

Captain Carroll retied the packet and put it in his pocket. "Then I 'll return them to her," he said, quietly.

"Hullo!—here—I say," said Prince, starting to his feet.

"I said I would return them to her," repeated Carroll, calmly.

"But I never gave them to you! I never consented to their withdrawal from the papers."

"I 'm sorry you did not," said Carroll, coldly; "it would have been more polite."

"Polite! D——n it, Sir! I call this stealing."

"Stealing, Mr. Prince, is a word that might be used by the person who claims these letters to describe the act of anyone who would keep them from her. It really cannot apply to you or me."

"Once for all, do you refuse to return them to me?" said Prince, pale with anger.

"Decidedly."

"Very well, Sir! We shall see." He stepped to the corner and rang a bell. "I have summoned my manager, and will charge you with the theft in his presence."

"I think not."

"And why, Sir?"

"Because the presence of a third party would enable me to throw this glove in your face, which, as a gentleman, I couldn't do without witnesses." Steps were heard along the passage;

The pursuing figure was rapidly approaching the unconscious Guest: in another moment it would have been upon him.—CHAP. V.

Carroll suddenly heard his name uttered in a low voice; and, looking up, he beheld the soft eyes of Maruja at the grating.—CHAP. VI.

Prince was no coward in a certain way; neither was he a fool. He knew that Carroll would keep his word; he knew that he should have to fight him; that whatever the issue of the duel was, the cause of the quarrel would be known, and scarcely redound to his credit. At present there were no witnesses to the offered insult and none would be wiser. The letters were not worth it. He stepped to the door, opened it, said: "No matter," and closed it again.

He returned with an affectation of carelessness. "You are right. I don't know that I'm called upon to make a scene here which the law can do for me as well elsewhere. It will settle pretty quick whether you've got the right to those letters, and whether you've taken the right way to get them, Sir."

"I have no desire to evade any responsibility in this matter, legal or otherwise," said Carroll, coldly, rising to his feet.

"Look here," said Prince, suddenly, with a return of his brusque frankness, "you might have asked me for those letters, you know."

"And you wouldn't have given them to me," said Carroll.

Prince laughed. "That's so! I say, Captain. Did they teach you this sort of strategy at West Point?"

"They taught me that I could neither receive nor give an insult under a white flag," said Carroll, pleasantly. "And they allowed me to make exchanges under the same rule. I picked up this pocket-book on the spot where the accident occurred to Dr. West. It is evidently his. I leave it with you, who are his executor."

The instinct of reticence before a man with whom he could never be confidential kept him from alluding to his other discovery.

Prince took the pocket-book, and opened it mechanically. After a moment's scrutiny of the memoranda it contained, his face assumed something of the same concentrated attention it wore at the beginning of the interview. Raising his eyes suddenly to Carroll, he said quickly,

"You have examined it?"

"Only so far as to see that it contained nothing of importance to the person I represent," returned Carroll, simply.

The capitalist looked at the young officer's clear eyes. Something of embarrassment came into his own as he turned them away.

"Certainly. Only memorandums of the Doctor's business. Quite important to us, you know. But nothing referring to your principal." He laughed. "Thank you for the exchange. I say—take a drink!"

"Thank you—no!" returned Carroll, going to the door.

"Well, good-bye."

He held out his hand. Carroll, with his clear eyes still regarding him, passed quietly by the outstretched hand, opened the door, bowed, and made his exit.

A slight flush came into Prince's cheek. Then, as the door closed, he burst into a half laugh. Had he been a dramatic villain, he would have added to it several lines of soliloquy, in which he would have rehearsed the fact that the opportunity for revenge had "come at last"; that the "haughty victor who had just left with his ill-gotten spoil had put into his hands the weapon of his friend's destruction"; that the "hour had come"; and possibly he might have said, "Ha! ha!" But, being a practical, good-natured, selfish rascal, not much better or worse than his neighbours, he sat himself down at his desk and began to carefully consider how he could best make use of this memoranda jotted down by Dr. West of the proofs of the existence of his son, and the consequent discovery of a legal heir to his property.

CHAPTER VIII.

WHEN Faquita had made sure that her young mistress was so securely closeted with Doña Maria that morning as to be inaccessible to curious eyes and ears, she saw fit to bewail to her fellow-servants this further evidence of the decay of the old feudal and patriarchal mutual family confidences. "Time was, thou rememberest, Pepita, when an affair of this kind was openly discussed at chocolate with everybody present, and before us all. When Joaquin Padilla was shot at Monterey, it was the Doña herself who told us, who read aloud the letters describing it and the bullet-holes in his clothes, and made it quite a gala-day—and he was a first-cousin of Guitierrez. And now, when this American goat of a doctor is kicked to death by a mule, the family must shut themselves up, that never a question is asked or answered." "Ay," responded Pepita; "and as regards that, Sanchez there knows as much as they do, for it was he that almost saw the whole affair."

"How?—sawest it?" inquired Faquita, eagerly.

"Why, was it not he that was bringing home Pereo, who had been lying in one of his trances or visions—blessed St. Antonio preserve us!" said Pepita, hastily crossing herself—"on Koorotora's grave, when the Doctor's mustang charged down upon them like a wild bull, and the Doctor's foot half out of the stirrups, and he not yet fast in his seat? And Pereo laughs a wild laugh and says: 'Watch if the coyote does not drag yet at his mustang's heels'; and Sanchez ran and watched the Doctor out of sight, careering and galloping to his death!—ay, as Pereo prophesied. For it was only half an hour afterwards that Sanchez again heard the tramp of his hoofs—as if it were here—and knowing it two miles away—thou understandest, he said to himself 'it is over.'"

The two women shuddered and crossed themselves.

"And what says Pereo of the fulfilment of his prophecy?" asked Faquita, hugging herself in her shawl with a certain titillating shrug of fascinating horror.

"It is even possible he understands it not. Thou knowest how dazed and dumb he ever is after these visions—that he comes from them as one from the grave, remembering nothing. He has lain like a log all the morning."

"Ay; but this news should awaken him, if aught can. He loved not this sneaking Doctor. Let us seek him; mayhap, Sanchez may be there. Come! The mistress lacks us not just now; the guests are provided for. Come!"

She led the way to the eastern angle of the casa communicating by a low corridor with the corral and stables. This was the old "gate-keep" or quarters of the mayordomo, who, among his functions, was supposed to exercise a supervision over the exits and entrances of the house. A large steward's room or office, beyond it a room of general assembly, half guard-room, half servants' hall, and Pereo's sleeping-room, constituted his domain. A few peons were gathered in the hall near the open door of the apartment where Pereo lay.

Stretched on a low pallet, his face yellow as wax, a light burning under a crucifix near his head, and a spray of blessed palm, popularly supposed to avert the attempts of evil spirits to gain possession of his suspended faculties, Pereo looked not unlike a corpse. Two muffled and shawled domestics, who sat by his side, might have been mourners, but for their voluble and incessant chattering.

"So thou art here, Faquita," said a stout virago. "It is a wonder thou couldst spare time from prayers for the repose of the American Doctor's soul to look after the health of thy superior, poor Pereo! Is it, then, true that Doña Maria said she would have nought more to do with the drunken brute of her mayordomo?"

The awful fascination of Pereo's upturned face did not prevent Faquita from tossing her head as she replied, pertly, that she was not there to defend her mistress from lazy gossip. "Nay, but what said she?" asked the other attendant.

"She said Pereo was to want for nothing; but at present she could not see him."

A murmur of indignation and sympathy passed through the company. It was followed by a long sigh from the insensible man. "His lips move," said Faquita, still fascinated by curiosity. "Hush! he would speak."

"His lips move, but his soul is still asleep," said Sanchez, oracularly. "Thus they have moved since early morning, when I came to speak with him, and found him lying here in a fit upon the floor. He was half dressed, thou seest, as if he had risen to go forth, and had been struck down so"——

"Hush! I tell thee he speaks," said Faquita.

The sick man was faintly articulating through a few tiny bubbles that broke upon his rigid lips. "He—dared—me! He—said—I was old—too old."

"Who dared thee? Who said thou wast too old?" asked the eager Faquita, bending over him.

"He, Koorotora himself! in the shape of a coyote."

Faquita fell back with a little giggle, half of shame, half of awe.

"It is ever thus," said Sanchez, sententiously; "it is what he said last night, when I picked him up on the mound. He will sleep now—thou shalt see. He will get no further than Koorotora and the coyote—and then he will sleep."

And to the awe of the group, and the increased respect for Sanchez's wisdom, Pereo seemed to fall again into a lethargic slumber. It was late in the evening when he appeared to regain perfect consciousness. "Ah—what is this?" he said, roughly, sitting up in bed, and eyeing the watchers around him, some of whom had succumbed to sleep, and others were engaged in playing cards. "Caramba! are ye mad? Thou, Sanchez, here; who shouldst be at thy work in the stables! Thou, Pepita, is thy mistress asleep or dead, that thou sittest here? Blessed San Antonio! would ye drive me mad?" He lifted his hand to his head with a dull movement of pain, and attempted to rise from the bed.

"Softly, good Pereo; lie still," said Sanchez, approaching him. "Thou hast been ill—so ill. These, thy friends, have been waiting only for this moment to be assured that thou art better. For this idleness there is no blame—truly none. The Doña Maria has said that thou shouldst lack no care; and truly, since the terrible news there has been little to do."

"The terrible news?" repeated Pereo.

Sanchez cast a meaning glance upon the others, as if to indicate this confirmation of his diagnosis.

"Ay, terrible news! The Doctor West was found this morning dead two miles from the casa."

"Dr. West dead!" repeated Pereo, slowly, as if endeavouring to master the real meaning of the words. Then, seeing the vacuity of his question reflected on the faces of those around him, he added, hurriedly, with a feeble smile, "O—ay—dead! Yes! I remember. And he has been ill—very ill, eh?"

"It was an accident. He was thrown from his horse, and so killed," returned Sanchez, gravely.

"Killed—by his horse! sayest thou?" said Pereo, with a sudden fixed look in his eye.

"Ay, good Pereo. Dost thou not remember when the mustang bolted with him down upon us in the lane, and then thou didst say he would come to evil with the brute? He did—blessed San Antonio!—within half an hour!"

"How—thou sawest it?"

"Nay; for the mustang was running away and I did not follow. Bueno! it happened all the same. The Alcalde, coroner, who knows all about it, has said so an hour ago! Juan brought the news from the rancho where the inquest was. There will be a funeral the day after to-morrow! and so it is that some of the family will go. Fancy Pereo, a Guitierrez at the funeral of the Americano Doctor! Nay, I doubt not that the Doña Maria will ask thee to say a prayer over his bier."

"Peace, fool! and speak not of thy lady mistress," thundered the old man, sitting upright. "Begone to the stables. Dost thou hear me? Go!"

"Now, by the Mother of Miracles," said Sanchez, hastening from the room as the gaunt figure of the old man rose, like a sheeted spectre, from the bed, "that was his old self again! Blessed San Antonio! Pereo has recovered."

The next day he was at his usual duties, with perhaps a slight increase of sternness in his manner. The fulfilment of his prophecy related by Sanchez, added to the superstitious reputation in which he was held, although Faquita voiced the opinions of a growing sceptical party in the statement that it was easy to prophesy the Doctor's accident, with the spectacle of the horse actually running away before the prophet's eyes. It was even said that Doña Maria's aversion to Pereo since the accident arose from a belief that some assistance might have been rendered by him. But it was pointed out by Sanchez that Pereo had, a few moments before, fallen under one of those singular epileptic-like strokes to which he was subject, and not only was unfit, but even required the entire care of Sanchez at the time. He did not attend the funeral, nor did Mrs. Saltonstall; but the family was represented by Maruja and Amita, accompanied by one or two dark-faced cousins, Captain Carroll, and Raymond. A number of friends and business associates from the neighbouring towns, Aladdin and a party from his house, the farm labourers, and a crowd of working men from his mills in the foothills, swelled the assemblage, that met in and around the rude agricultural sheds and outhouses which formed the only pastoral habitation of the rancho of San Antonio. It had been a characteristic injunction of the deceased that he should be buried in the midst of one of his most prolific grain fields, as a grim return to that nature he was impoverishing, with neither mark nor monument to indicate the spot, and that even the temporary mound above him should at the fitting season of the year be levelled with the rest of the field by the obliterating ploughshares. A grave was accordingly dug about a quarter of a mile from his office amidst a "volunteer" crop so dense that the large space mown around the narrow opening to admit of the presence of the multitude seemed like a golden amphitheatre.

A distinguished clergyman from San Francisco officiated. A man of tact and politic adaptation, he dwelt upon the blameless life of the deceased, on his practical benefit for civilisation in the county, and even treated his grim Pantheism in the selection of his grave as a formal recognition of the text "dust to dust." He paid a not ungrateful compliment to the business associates of the deceased, and without actually claiming in the usual terms "a continuance of past favours" for their successors, managed to interpolate so strong a recommendation of the late Doctor's commercial projects as to elicit from Aladdin the expressive commendation that his sermon was "as good as five per cent in the stock."

Maruja, who had been standing near the carriage, languidly silent and abstracted even under the tender attentions of Carroll, suddenly felt the consciousness of another pair of eyes fixed upon her. Looking up, she was surprised to find herself regarded by the man she had twice met, once as a tramp and once as a wayfarer at the fonda, who had quietly joined a group not far from her. At once impressed by the idea that this was the first time that he had really looked at her, she felt a singular shyness creeping over her, until, to her own astonishment and indignation, she was obliged to lower her eyes before his gaze. In vain she tried to lift them with her old supreme power of fascination. If she had ever blushed, she felt she would have done so now. She knew that her face must betray her consciousness; and at last she—Maruja, the self-poised and all-sufficient goddess—actually turned in half-hysterical and girlish bashfulness to Carroll for relief in an affected and exaggerated absorption of his attentions. She scarcely knew that the clergyman had finished speaking, when Raymond approached them softly from behind. "Pray don't believe," he said, appealingly, "that all the human virtues are about to be buried—I should say sown—in that wheat-field. A few will still survive, and creep about above the Doctor's grave. Listen to a story just told me, and disbelieve—if you dare—in human gratitude. Do you see that picturesque young ruffian over there?"

Maruja did not lift her eyes. She felt herself breathlessly hanging on the speaker's next words.

"Why, that's the young man of the fonda, who picked up your fan," said Carroll, "isn't it?"

"Perhaps," said Maruja, indifferently. She would have given worlds to have been able to turn coldly and stare at him at that moment with the others, but she dared not. She contented herself with softly brushing some dust from Captain Carroll's arm with her fan, and a feminine suggestion of tender care which thrilled that gentleman.

"Well," continued Raymond, "that Robert Macaire over yonder, came here some three or four days ago as a tramp, in want of everything but honest labour. Our lamented friend consented to parley with him, which was something remarkable in the Doctor; still more remarkable, he gave him a suit of clothes and, it is said, some money, and sent him on his way. Now, more remarkable than all, our friend, on hearing of his benefactor's death, actually tramps back here to attend his funeral. The Doctor being dead, his executors not of a kind to emulate the Doctor's spasmodic generosity, and there being no chance of future favours, the act must be recorded as purely and simply gratitude. By Jove! I don't know but that he is the only one here who can be called a real mourner. I'm here because your sister is here; Carroll comes because you do, and you come because your mother cannot."

"And who tells you these pretty stories?" asked Maruja, with her face still turned towards Carroll.

"The foreman, Harrison, who, with an extensive practical experience of tramps, was struck with this exception to the general rule."

"Poor man; one ought to do something for him," said Amita, compassionately.

"What!" said Raymond, with affected terror, "and spoil this perfect story? Never! If I should offer him ten dollars, I'd expect him to kick me; if he took it, I'd expect to kick him."

"He is not so bad-looking, is he, Maruja?" asked Amita of her sister. But Maruja had already moved a few paces off with Carroll, and seemed to be listening to him only. Raymond smiled at the pretty perplexity of Amita's eyebrows over this pronounced indiscretion.

"Don't mind them," he whispered; "you really cannot expect to dueña your elder sister. Tell me, would you actually like me to see if I could assist the virtuous tramp? You have only to speak." But Amita's interest appeared to be so completely appeased with Raymond's simple offer that she only smiled, blushed, and said "No."

Maruja's quick ears had taken in every word of these asides, and for an instant she hated her sister for her aimless declination of Raymond's proposal. But becoming conscious—under her eyelids—that the stranger was moving away with the dispersing crowd, she rejoined Amita with her usual manner. The others had re-entered the carriage, but Maruja took it into her head to proceed on foot to the rude building whence the mourners had issued. The foreman Harrison, flushed and startled by this apparition of inaccessible beauty at his threshold, came eagerly forward. "I shall not trouble you now, Mr. Har-r-r-rison," she said, with a polite exaggeration of the consonants; "but some day I shall ride over here, and ask you to show me your wonderful machines."

She smiled, and turned back to seek her carriage. But before she had gone many yards she found that she had completely lost it in the intervening billows of grain. She stopped with an impatient little Spanish ejaculation. The next moment the stalks of wheat parted before her and a figure emerged. It was the stranger.

She fell back a step in utter helplessness. He, on his side, retreated again into the wheat, holding it back with extended arms to let her pass. As she moved forward mechanically, without a word he moved backward, making a path for her until she was able to discern the coachman's whip above the bending heads of the grain just beyond her. He stopped here and drew to one side, his arms still extended, to give her free passage. She tried to speak, but could only bow her head, and slipped by him with a strange feeling—suggested by his attitude—that she was evading his embrace. But the next moment his arms were lowered, the grain closed around him and he was lost to her view. She reached the carriage almost unperceived by the inmates, and pounced upon her sister with a laugh.

"Blessed Virgin!" said Amita, "where did you come from?"

"From there!" said Maruja, with a slight nervous shiver, pointing to the clustering grain.

"We were afraid you were lost."

"So was I," said Maruja, raising her pretty lashes heavenwards, as she drew a shawl tightly round her shoulders.

"Has anything happened? You look strange," said Carroll, drawing closer to her.

Her eyes were sparkling, but she was very pale.

"Nothing, nothing!" she said, hastily, glancing at the grain again.

"If it were not that the haste would have been absolutely indecent, I should say that the late Doctor had made you a ghostly visit," said Raymond, looking at her curiously.

"He would have been polite enough not to have commented on my looks," said Maruja. "Am I really such a fright?"

Carroll thought he had never seen her so beautiful. Her eyelids were quivering over their fires as if they had been brushed by the passing wing of a strong passion.

"What are you thinking of?" said Carroll, as they drove on.

She was thinking that the stranger had looked at her admiringly, and that his eyes were blue. But she looked quietly into her lover's face, and said, sweetly, "Nothing, I fear, that would interest you!"

CHAPTER IX.

THE news of the assignment of Dr. West's property to Mrs. Saltonstall was followed by the still more astonishing discovery that the Doctor's will further bequeathed to her his entire property, after payment of his debts and liabilities. It was given in recognition of her talents and business integrity during their late association, and as an evidence of the confidence and "undying affection" of the testator. Nevertheless, after the first surprise, the fact was accepted by the community as both natural and proper under that singular instinct of humanity which acquiesces without scruple in the union of two large fortunes, but sharply questions the conjunction of poverty and affluence, and looks only for interested motives where there is disparity of wealth. Had Mrs. Saltonstall been a poor widow instead of a rich one; had she been the Doctor's housekeeper instead of his business friend, the bequest would have been strongly criticised—if not legally tested. But this combination, which placed the entire valley of San Antonio in the control of a single individual, appeared to be perfectly legitimate. More than that, some vague rumour of the Doctor's past, and his early entanglements, only seemed to make this eminently practical disposition of his property the more respectable, and condoned for any moral irregularities of his youth.

The effect upon the collateral branches of the Guitierrez family and the servants and retainers was even more impressive. For once, it seemed that the fortunes and traditions of the family were changed; the female Guitierrez, instead of impoverishing the property, had augmented it; the foreigner and intruder had been despoiled; the fate of La Mision Perdida had been changed; the curse of Koorotora had proved a blessing; his prophet and descendant, Pereo, the mayordomo, moved in an atmosphere of superstitious adulation and respect among the domestics and common people. This recognition of his power he received at times with a certain exaltation of grandiloquent pride beyond the conception of any but a Spanish servant, and at times with a certain dull, pained vacancy of perception and an expression of frightened bewilderment which also went far to establish his reputation as an unconscious seer and thaumaturgist. "Thou seest," said Sanchez to the partly sceptical Faquita, "he does not know more than an infant what is his power. That is the proof of it." The Doña Maria alone did not participate in this appreciation of Pereo, and when it was proposed that a feast or celebration of rejoicing should be given under the old pear-tree by the Indian's mound, her indignation was long remembered by those that witnessed it. "It is not enough that we have been made ridiculous in the past," she said to Maruja, "by the interference of this solemn fool, but that the memory of our friend is to be insulted by his generosity being made into a triumph of Pereo's idiotic ancestor. One would have thought those coyotes and Koorotora's bones had been buried with the cruel gossip of your relations"—(it had been the recent habit of Doña Maria to allude to "the family" as being particularly related to Maruja alone)—"over my poor friend. Let him beware that his ancestor's mound is not uprooted with the pear-tree and his heathenish temple destroyed. If, as the engineer says, a branch of the new railroad can be established for La Mision Perdida, I agree with him that it can better pass at that point with less sacrifice to the domain. It is the one uncultivated part of the park, and lies at the proper angle."

"You surely would not consent to this, my mother?" said Maruja, with a sudden impression of a newly found force in her mother's character.

"Why not, child?" said the relict of Mr. Saltonstall and the mourner of Dr. West, coldly. "I admit it was discreet of thee in old times to have thy sentimental passages there with caballeros who, like the guests of the hidalgo that kept a skeleton at his feast, were reminded of the mutability of their hopes by Koorotora's bones and the legend. But with the explosion of this idea of a primal curse, like Eve's, on the property," added the Doña Maria, with a slight bitterness, "thou mayest have thy citas—elsewhere. Thou canst scarcely keep this Captain Carroll any longer at a distance by rattling those bones of Koorotora in his face. And of a truth, child, since the affair of the letters, and his discreet and honourable conduct since, I see not why thou shouldst. He has thy mother's reputation in his hands."

"He is a gentleman, my mother," said Maruja, quietly.

"And they are scarce, child, and should be rewarded and preserved. That is what I meant, silly one; this Captain is not rich—but then, thou hast enough for both."

"But it was Amita that first brought him here," said Maruja, looking down with an air of embarrassed thoughtfulness, which Doña Maria chose to instantly accept as exaggerated coyness.

"Do not think to deceive me or thyself, child, with this folly. Thou art old enough to know a man's mind, if not thine own. Besides, I do not know that I shall object to her liking for Raymond. He is very clever, and would be a relief to some of thy relatives. He would be invaluable to us in the emergencies that may grow out of these mechanical affairs that I do not understand—such as the mill and the railroad."

"And you propose to take a few husbands as partners in the business?" said Maruja, who had recovered her spirits. "I warn you that Captain Carroll is as stupid as a gentleman could be. I wonder that he has not blundered in other things as badly as he has in preferring me to Amita. He confided to me only last night that he had picked up a pocket-book belonging to the Doctor and given it to Aladdin without a witness or receipt, and evidently, of his own accord."

"Ay; but it contained nothing of thine," said Maruja. "The poor child had sense enough to think of that. But I am in no hurry to ask your consent and your blessing yet, little mother. I could even bear that Amita should precede me to the altar, if the exigencies of thy 'business' require it. It might also secure Captain Carroll for me. Nay, look not at me in that cheapening, commercial way—with compound interest in thine eyes. I am not so poor an investment, truly, of thy original capital."

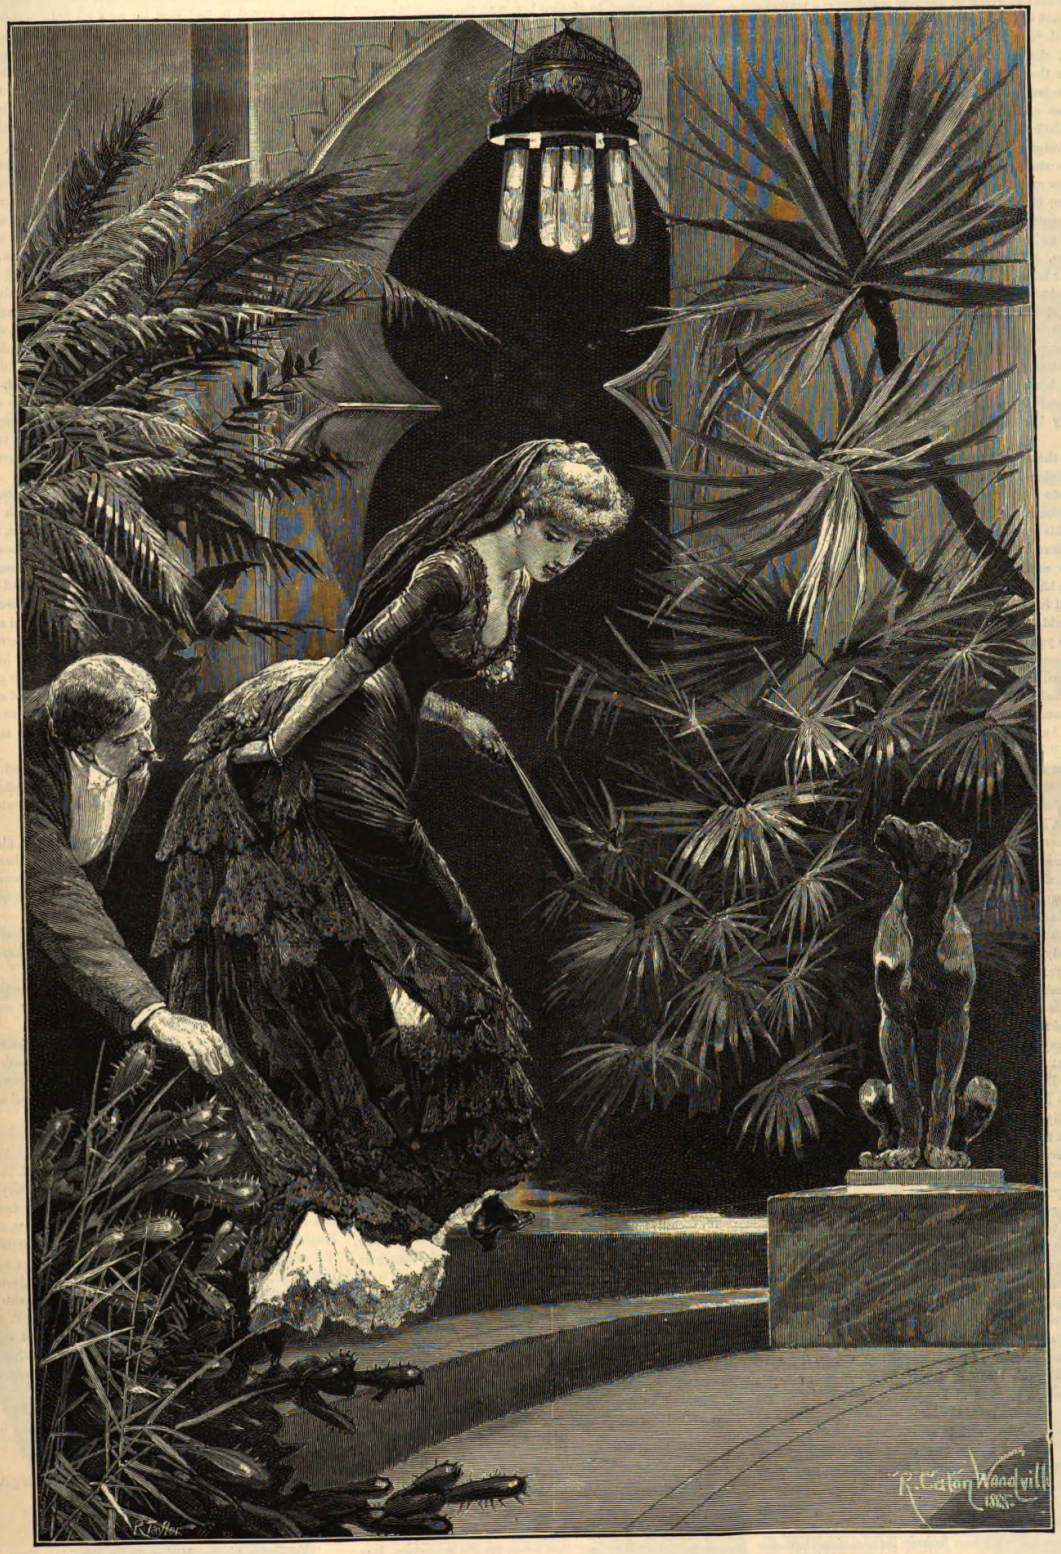
"Thou art thy father's child," said her mother, suddenly kissing her; "and that is saying enough, the Blessed Virgin knows. Go now," she continued, gently pushing her from the room, "and send Amita hither." She watched the disappearance of Maruja's slightly rebellious shoulders, and added to herself, "And this is the child that Amita really believes is pining with lovesickness for Carroll, so that she can neither sleep nor eat. This is the girl that Faquita would have me think hath no longer any heart in her dress or in her finery! Soul of Joseph Saltonstall!" ejaculated the widow, lifting her shoulders and her eyes together, "thou hast much to account for."

Two weeks later she again astonished her daughter. "Why dost thou not join the party that drives over to see the wonders of Aladdin's Palace to-day? It would seem more proper that thou shouldst accompany thy guests than Raymond and Amita."

"I have never entered his doors since the day he was disrespectful to my mother's daughter," said Maruja, in surprise.

"Disrespectful!" repeated Doña Maria, impatiently. "Thy father's daughter ought to know that such as he may be ignorant and vulgar, but cannot be disrespectful to her. And there are offences, child, it is much more crushing to forget than to remember. As long as he has not the presumption to apologise, I see no reason why thou mayst not go. He has not been here since that affair of the letters. I shall not permit him to be uncivil over that—dost thou understand? He is of use to me in business. Thou mayst take Carroll with thee; he will understand that."

"But Carroll will not go," said Maruja. "He will not say what passed between them, but I suspect they quarrelled."



"All the better, then, that thou goest alone. He need not be reminded of it. Fear not but that he will be only too proud of thy visit to think of aught else."

Maruja, who seemed relieved at this prospect of being unaccompanied by Captain Carroll, shrugged her shoulders and assented.

When the party that afternoon drove into the courtyard of Aladdin's Palace, the announcement that its hospitable proprietor was absent and would not return until dinner did not abate either their pleasure or their curiosity. As already intimated to the reader, Mr. Prince's functions as host were characteristically irregular, and the servant's suggestion that Mr. Prince's private secretary would attend to do the honours created little interest, and was laughingly waived by Maruja. "There really is not the slightest necessity to trouble the gentleman," she said, politely. "I know the house thoroughly, and I think I have shown it once or twice before for your master. Indeed," she added, turning to her party, "I have been already complimented on my skill as a cicerone." After a pause, she continued, with a slight exaggeration of action and in her deepest contralto, "Ahem, ladies and gentlemen, the hall and court in which we are now standing is a perfect copy of the Court of Lions at the Alhambra, and was finished in fourteen days in white pine, gold, and plaster at a cost of ten thousand dollars. A photograph of the original structure hangs on the wall: you will observe, ladies and gentlemen, that the reproduction is perfect. The Alhambra is in Granada, a province of Spain, which is said in some respects to resemble California, where you have probably observed the Spanish language is still spoken by the old settlers. We now cross the stable-yard on a bridge which is a facsimile in appearance and dimensions of the Bridge of Sighs at Venice connecting the Doge's Palace with the State Prison. Here, on the contrary, instead of being ushered into a dreary dungeon, as in the great original, a fresh surprise awaits us. Allow me, ladies and gentlemen, to precede you for the surprise. We open a door thus—and—presto!"——

She stopped, speechless, on the threshold; the fan fell from her gesticulating hand.

In the centre of a brilliantly-lit conservatory, with golden columns, a young man was standing. As her fan dropped on the tessellated pavement, he came forward, picked it up, and put it in her rigid and mechanical fingers. The party, who had applauded her apparently artistic climax, laughingly pushed by her into the conservatory, without noticing her agitation.

It was the same face and figure she remembered as last standing before her, holding back the crowding grain in the San Antonio field. But here he was apparelled and appointed like a gentleman, and even seemed to be superior to the garish glitter of his new surroundings.

"I believe I have the pleasure of speaking to Miss Saltonstall," he said, with the faintest suggestion of his former manner in his half-resentful sidelong glance. "I hear that you offered to dispense with my services, but I knew that Mr. Prince would scarcely be satisfied if I did not urge it once more upon you in person. I am his private secretary."

At the same moment, Amita and Raymond, attracted by the conversation, turned towards him. Their recognition of the man they had seen at Dr. West's was equally distinct. The silence became embarrassing. Two pretty girls of the party pressed to Amita's side, with half-audible whispers. "What is it?" "Who's your handsome and wicked-looking friend?" "Is this the surprise?"

At the sound of their voices, Maruja recovered herself coldly. "Ladies," she said, with a slight wave of her fan, "this is Mr. Prince's private secretary. I believe it is hardly fair to take up his valuable time. Allow me to thank you, Sir, FOR PICKING UP MY FAN!"

With a single subtle flash of the eye she swept by him, taking her companions to the other end of the conservatory. When she turned, he was gone.

"This was certainly an unexpected climax," said Raymond, mischievously. "Did you really arrange it beforehand? We leave a picturesque tramp at the edge of a grave; we pass over six weeks and a Bridge of Sighs, and hey, presto! we find a private secretary in a conservatory! This is quite the regular Aladdin business."

"You may laugh," said Maruja, who had recovered her spirits, "but if you were really clever you'd find out what it all means. Don't you see that Amita is dying of curiosity?"

"Let us fly at once and discover the secret, then," said Raymond, slipping Amita's arm through his. "We will consult the oracle in the stables. Come."

The others followed, leaving Maruja for an instant alone. She was about to rejoin them when she heard footsteps in the passage they had just crossed, and then perceived that the young stranger had merely withdrawn to allow the party to precede him before he returned to the other building through the conservatory, which he was just entering. In turning quickly to escape, the black lace of her over-skirt caught in the spines of a snaky-looking cactus. She stopped to disengage herself with feverish haste in vain. She was about to sacrifice the delicate material in her impatience, when the young man stepped quietly to her side.

"Allow me. Perhaps I have more patience, even if I have less time," he said, stooping down. Their ungloved hands touched. Maruja stopped in her efforts and stood up. He continued until he had freed the luckless flounce, conscious of the soft fire of her eyes on his head and neck.

"There," he said rising, and encountering her glance. As she did not speak, he continued: "You are thinking, Miss Saltonstall, that you have seen me before, are you not? Well—you have; I asked you the road to San José one morning when I was tramping by your hedge."

"And as you probably were looking for something better—which you seem to have found—you didn't care to listen to my directions," said Maruja, quickly.

"I found a man—almost the only one who ever offered me a gratuitous kindness—at whose grave I afterwards met you. I found another man who befriended me here—where I meet you again."

She was beginning to be hysterically nervous lest anyone should return and find them together. She was conscious of a tingling of vague shame. Yet she lingered. The strange fascination of his half-savage melancholy, and a reproachfulness that seemed to arraign her, with the rest of the world, at the bar of his vague resentment, held the delicate fibres of her sensitive being as cruelly and relentlessly as the thorns of the cactus had gripped her silken lace. Without knowing what she was saying, she stammered that she "was glad he connected her with his better fortune," and began to move away. He noticed it with his sidelong lids, and added, with a slight bitterness:

"I don't think I should have intruded here again, but I thought you had gone. But I—I—am afraid you have not seen the last of me. It was the intention of my employer, Mr. Prince, to introduce me to you and your mother. I suppose he considers it part of my duties here. I must warn you that, if you are here when he returns, he will insist upon it, and upon your meeting me with these ladies at dinner."

"Perhaps so—he is my mother's friend," said Maruja; "but you have the advantage of us—you can always take to the road, you know."

The smile with which she had intended to accompany this speech did not come as readily in execution as it had in conception, and she would have given worlds to have recalled her words. But he said, "That's so," quietly, and turned away, as if to give her an opportunity to escape. She moved hesitatingly towards the passage and stopped. The sound of the returning voices gave her a sudden courage.

"Mr."——

"Guest," said the young man.

"If we do conclude to stay to dinner, as Mr. Prince has said nothing of introducing you to my sister, you must let me have that pleasure."

He lifted his eyes to hers with a sudden flush. But she had fled.

She reached her party, displaying her torn flounce as the cause of her delay, and there was a slight quickness in her breathing and her speech which was attributed to the same grave reason. "But, only listen," said Amita, "we've got it all out of the butler and the grooms. It's such a romantic story!"

"What is?" said Maruja, suddenly.

"Why, the private tramp's."

"The peripatetic secretary," suggested Raymond.

"Yes," continued Amita, "Mr. Prince was so struck with his gratitude to the old Doctor, that he hunted him up in San José, and brought him here. Since then Prince has been so interested in him—it appears he was somebody in the States, or has rich relations—that he has been telegraphing and making all sorts of inquiries about him, and has even sent out his own lawyer to hunt up everything about him. Are you listening?"

"Yes."

"You seem abstracted."

"I am hungry."

"Why not dine here; it's an hour earlier than at home. Aladdin would fall at your feet for the honour. Do!"

Maruja looked at them with innocent vagueness, as if the possibility were just beginning to dawn upon her.

"And Clara Wilson is just dying to see the mysterious unknown again. Say yes, little Maruja."

Mr. Prince, on his return an hour later, was unexpectedly delighted with Maruja's gracious acceptance of his invitation to dinner. He was thoroughly sensible of the significance which his neighbours had attached to the avoidance by the Saltonstall heiress of his various parties and gorgeous festivities ever since a certain act of indiscretion—now alleged to have been produced by the exaltation of wine—had placed him under ban. Whatever his feelings were towards her mother, he could not fail to appreciate fully this act of the daughter, which rehabilitated him. It was with more than his usual extravagance—shown even in a certain exaggeration of respect towards Maruja—that he welcomed the party, and made preparations for the dinner. The telegraph and mounted messengers were put into rapid requisition. The bridal suite was placed at the disposal of the young ladies for a dressing-room. The attendant genii surpassed themselves. The evening dresses of Maruja, Amita, and the Misses Wilson, summoned by electricity from La Mision Perdida, and dispatched by the fleetest conveyances, were placed in the arms of their maids, smothered with bouquets, an hour before dinner. An operatic concert troupe, passing through the nearest town, were diverted from their course by the slaves of the ring to discourse hidden music in the music-room during dinner. "Bite my finger, Sweetlips," said Miss Clara Wilson, who had a neat taste for apt quotation, to Maruja, "that I may see if I am awake. It's the Arabian Nights all over again!"

The dinner was a marvel, even in a land of gastronomic marvels; the dessert a miracle of fruits, even in a climate that bore the products of two zones. Maruja, from her seat beside her satisfied host, looked across a bank of yellow roses at her sister and Raymond, and was timidly conscious of the eyes of young Guest, who was seated at the other end of the table, between the two Misses Wilson. With a strange haunting of his appearance on the day she first met him, she stole glances of half-frightened curiosity at him while he was eating, and was relieved to find that he used his knife and fork like the others, and that his appetite was far from voracious. It was his employer who was the first to recall the experiences of his past life, with a certain enthusiasm and the air of a host anxious to contribute to the entertainment of his guests. "You'd hardly believe, Miss Saltonstall, that that young gentleman over there walked across the Continent—and two thousand odd miles, wasn't it?—all alone, and with not much more in the way of traps than he's got on now. Tell 'em, Harry, how the Apaches nearly gobbled you up, and then let you go because they thought you as good an Injun as any one of them, and how you lived a week in the desert on two biscuits as big as that." A chorus of entreaty and delighted anticipation followed the suggestion. The old expression of being at bay returned for an instant to Guest's face, but, lifting his eyes, he caught a look of almost sympathetic anxiety from Maruja's, who had not spoken.

"It became necessary for me, some time ago," said Guest, half explanatorily, to Maruja, "to be rather explicit in the details of my journey here, and I told Mr. Prince some things which he seems to think interesting to others. That is all. To save my life on one occasion, I was obliged to show myself as good as an Indian, in his own way, and I lived among them and travelled with them for two weeks. I have been hungry, as I suppose others have on like occasions, but nothing more."

Nevertheless, in spite of his evident reticence, he was obliged to give way to their entreaties, and, with a certain grim and uncompromising truthfulness of statement, recounted some episodes of his journey. It was none the less thrilling that he did it reluctantly, and in much the same manner as he had answered his father's questions, and as he had probably responded to the later cross-examination of Mr. Prince. He did not tell it emotionally, but rather with the dogged air of one who had been subjected to a personal grievance for which he neither asked nor expected sympathy. When he did not raise his eyes to Maruja's, he kept them fixed on his plate.

"Well," said Prince, when a long-drawn sign of suspended emotion among the guests testified to his powers as a caterer to their amusement, "what do you say to some music with our coffee to follow the story?"

"It's more like a play," said Amita to Raymond. "What a pity Captain Carroll, who knows all about Indians, isn't here to have enjoyed it. But I suppose Maruja, who hasn't lost a word, will tell it to him."

"I don't think she will," said Raymond, drily, glancing at Maruja, who, lost in some intricate pattern of her Chinese plate, was apparently unconscious that her host was waiting her signal to withdraw. At last she raised her head, and said, gently but audibly, to the waiting Prince,

"It is positively a newer pattern; the old one had not that delicate straw line in the arabesque. You must have had it made for you."

"I did," said the gratified Prince, taking up the plate. "What eyes you have, Miss Saltonstall. They see everything."

"Except that I'm keeping you all waiting," she returned, with a smile, letting the eyes in question fall with a half-parting salutation on Guest as she rose. It was the first exchange of a common instinct between them, and left them as conscious as if they had pressed hands.

The music gave an opportunity for some desultory conversation, in which Mr. Prince and his young friend received an invitation from Maruja to visit La Mision, and the party, by a common consent, turned into the conservatory, where the genial host begged them each to select a flower from a few especially rare exotics. When Maruja received hers, she said, laughingly, to Prince, "Will you think me very importunate if I ask for another?" "Take what you like—you have only to name it," he replied, gallantly. "But that's just what I can't do," responded the young girl, "unless," she added, turning to Guest, "unless you can assist me. It was the plant I was examining to-day." "I think I can show it to you," said Guest, with a slight increase of colour, as he preceded her towards the memorable cactus near the door, "but I doubt if it has any flower."

Nevertheless, it had. A bright red blossom, like a spot of blood drawn by one of its thorns. He plucked it for her, and she placed it in her belt.

"You are forgiving," he said, admiringly.

"You ought to know that," she returned, looking down.

"I?—why?"

"You were rude to me twice."

"Twice!"

"Yes—once at the Mision of La Perdida; once in the road at San Antonio."

His eyes became downcast and gloomy. "At the Mision that morning, I, a wretched outcast, only saw in you a beautiful girl intent on overriding me with her merciless beauty.

The next moment the train had passed; rider and horse, crushed and battered out of all life, were rolling in the ditch.—CHAP. XIII.

At San Antonio, I handed the fan I picked up to the man whose eyes told me he loved you."

She started impatiently. "You might have been more gallant, and found more difficulty in the selection," she said, pertly. "But since when have you gentlemen become so observant and so punctilious? Would you expect him to be as considerate of others?"

"I have few claims that anyone seems bound to respect," he returned, brusquely. Then, in a softer voice, he added, looking at her, gently,

"You were in mourning when you came here this afternoon, Miss Saltonstall."

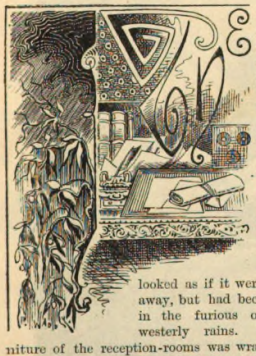
"Was I? It was for Dr. West—my mother's friend."

"It was very becoming to you."

"You are complimenting me. But I warn you that Captain Carroll said something better than that; he said mourning was not necessary for me. I had only to 'put my eye-lashes at half-mast.' He is a soldier, you know."

"He seems to be as witty as he is fortunate," said Guest, bitterly.

"Do you think he is fortunate?" said Maruja, raising her eyes to his. There was so much in this apparently simple question that Guest looked in her eyes for a suggestion. What he saw there for an instant made his heart stop beating. She apparently did not know it, for she began to tremble too.



"Is he not?" said Guest, in a low voice.

"Do you think he ought to be?" she found herself whispering.

A sudden silence fell upon them. The voices of their companions seemed very far in the distance; the warm breath of the flowers appeared to be drowning their senses; they tried to speak, but could not; they were so near to each other that the two long blades of a palm served to hide them. In the midst of this profound silence a voice that was like and yet unlike Maruja's said twice, "Go! go!" but each time seemed hushed in the stifling silence. The next moment the palms were pushed aside, the dark figure of a young man slipped like some lithe animal through the shrubbery, and Maruja found herself standing, pale and rigid, in the middle of the walk in the full glare of the light, and looking down the corridor toward her approaching companions. She was furious and frightened; she was triumphant and trembling; without thought, sense, or reason, she had been kissed by Henry Guest, and—had returned it.

The fleetest horses of Aladdin's stud that night could not carry her far enough or fast enough to take her away from that moment, that scene, and that sensation. Wise and experienced, confident in her beauty, secure in her selfishness, strong over others' weaknesses, weighing accurately the deeds and words of men and women, recognising all there was in position and tradition, seeing with her father's clear eyes the practical meaning of any divergence from that conventionality which as a woman of the world she valued, she returned again and again to the trembling joy of that intoxicating moment. She thought of her mother and sisters, of Raymond and Garnier, of Aladdin—she even forced herself to think of Carroll—only to shut her eyes with a faint smile, and dream again the brief but thrilling dream of Guest that began and ended in their joined and parted lips. Small wonder that, hidden and silent in her enwrappings, as she lay back in the carriage with her pale face against the cold starry sky, two other stars came out and glistened and trembled on her passion-fringed lashes.

CHAPTER X.

The rainy season had set in early. The last three weeks of summer drought had drained the great valley of its life-blood; the dead stalks of grain rustled like dry bones over Dr. West's grave. The dessicating wind and sun had wrought some disenchanting cracks and fissures in Aladdin's Palace, and otherwise disjoined it, so that it not only looked as if it were ready to be packed away, but had become finally untenable in the furious onset of the south-westerly rains. The gorgeous furniture of the reception-rooms was wrapped in macintoshes, the conservatory was changed into an aquarium, the Bridge of Sighs crossed an actual canal in the stable-yard. Only the billiard-room and Mr. Prince's bed-room and office remained intact, and in the latter, one stormy afternoon, Mr. Prince himself sat busy over his books and papers. His station-waggon, splashed and streaked with mud, stood in the court-yard, just as it had been driven from the station, and the smell of the smoke of newly-lit fires showed that the house had been opened only for this hurried visit of its owner.

The tramping of horse hoofs in the courtyard was soon followed by steps along the corridor, and the servant ushered Captain Carroll into the presence of his master. The Captain did not remove his military overcoat, but remained standing erect in the centre of the room with his forage cap in his hand.

"I could have given you a lift from the station," said Prince, "if you had come that way. I've only just got in myself."

"I preferred to ride," said Carroll, drily.

"Sit down by the fire," said Prince, motioning to a chair, "and dry yourself."

"I must ask you first the purport of this interview," said Carroll, curtly, "before I prolong it further. You have asked me to come here in reference to certain letters I returned to their rightful owner some months ago. If you seek to reclaim them again, or to refer to a subject which must remain forgotten, I decline to proceed further."

"It does refer to the letters, and it rests with you whether they shall be forgotten or not. It is not my fault if the subject has been dropped. You must remember that until yesterday you have been absent on a tour of inspection and could not be applied to before."

Carroll cast a cold glance at Prince, and then threw himself into a chair, with his overcoat still on and his long military boots crossed before the fire. Sitting there in profile, Prince could not but notice that he looked older and sterner than at their last interview, and his cheeks were thinned as if by something more than active service.

"When you were here last summer," began Prince, leaning forward over his desk, "you brought me a piece of news that astounded me, as it did many others. It was the assignment of Dr. West's property to Mrs. Saltonstall. That was something there was no gainsaying; it was a purely business affair, and involved nobody's rights but the assignor. But this was followed a day or two after by the announcement of the Doctor's will, making the same lady the absolute and sole inheritor of the same property. That seemed all right too; for there were, apparently, no legal heirs. Since then, however, it has been discovered that there is a legal heir—none other than the Doctor's only son. Now, as no allusion to the son's existence was made in that will—which was a great oversight of the Doctor's—it is a fiction of the law that such an omission is an act of forgetfulness, and therefore leaves the son the same rights as if there had been no will at all. In other words, if the Doctor had seen fit to throw his scapegrace son a hundred dollar bill, it would have been legal evidence that he remembered him. As he did not, it's a fair legal presumption that he forgot him, or that the will is incomplete."

"This seems to be a question for Mrs. Saltonstall's lawyers—not for her friends," said Carroll, coldly.

"Excuse me; that remains for you to decide—when you hear all. You understand at present, then, that Dr. West's property, both by assignment and will, was made over in the event of his death not to his legal heirs, but to a comparative stranger. It looked queer to a good many people, but the only explanation was, that the Doctor had fallen very much in love with the widow—that he would have probably married her—had he lived."

With an unpleasant recollection that this was almost exactly Maruja's explanation of her mother's relations to Dr. West, Carroll returned, impatiently, "If you mean that their private relations may be made the subject of legal discussion in the event of litigation in regard to the property, that again is a matter for Mrs. Saltonstall to decide—and not her friends. It is purely a matter of taste."

"It may be a matter of discretion, Captain Carroll."

"Of discretion!" repeated Carroll, superciliously.

"Well," said Prince, leaving his desk and coming to the fire-place with his hands in his pockets, "what would you call it, if it could be found that Dr. West, on leaving Mrs. Saltonstall's that night, did not meet with an accident, was not thrown from his horse, but was coolly and deliberately murdered!"

Captain Carroll's swift recollection of the discovery he himself had made in the road, and its inconsistency with the accepted theory of the accident, unmistakably showed itself in his face. It was a moment before he recovered himself.

"But even if it can be proved to have been a murder and not an accident, what has that to do with Mrs. Saltonstall or her claim to the property?"

"Only that she was the one person directly benefited by his death."

Captain Carroll looked at him steadily, and then rose to his feet. "Do I understand that you have called me here to listen to this infamous aspersion of a lady?"

"I have called you here, Captain Carroll, to listen to the arguments that may be used to set aside Dr. West's will, and return the property to the legal heir. You are to listen to them or not, as you choose; but I warn you that your opportunity to hear them in confidence and convey them to your friend will end here. I have no opinion in the case. I only tell you that it will be argued that Dr. West was unduly influenced to make a will in Mrs. Saltonstall's favour; that, after having done so, it will be shown that just before his death he became aware of the existence of his son and heir, and actually had an interview with him; that he visited Mrs. Saltonstall that evening with the records of his son's identity and a memorandum of his interview in his pocket-book; and that an hour after leaving the house he was foully murdered. That is the theory which Mrs. Saltonstall has to consider. I told you I have no opinion. I only know that there are witnesses to the interview of the Doctor and his son; there is evidence of murder, and the murderer is suspected; there is the evidence of the pocket-book, with the memorandum picked up on the spot, which you handed me yourself."

"Do you mean to say that you will permit this pocket-book, handed you in confidence, to be used for such an infamous purpose?" said Carroll.

"I think you offered it to me in exchange for Dr. West's letters to Mrs. Saltonstall," returned Prince, drily. "The less said about that, the less is likely to be said about compromising letters written by the widow to the Doctor, which she got you to recover—letters which they may claim had a bearing on the case, and even lured him to his fate."

For an instant Captain Carroll recoiled before the gulf which seemed to open at the feet of the unhappy family. For an instant a terrible doubt possessed him, and in that doubt he found a new reason for a certain changed and altered tone in Maruja's later correspondence with him, and the vague hints she had thrown out of the impossibility of their union. "I beg you will not press me to greater candour" she had written, "and try to forget me before you learn to hate me." For an instant he believed—and even took a miserable comfort in the belief—that it was this hideous secret, and not some coquettish caprice, to which she vaguely alluded. But it was only for a moment, the next instant the monstrous doubt passed from the mind of the simple gentleman, with only a slight flush of shame at his momentary disloyalty.

Prince, however, had noticed it, not without a faint sense of sympathy. "Look here!" he said, with a certain brusqueness, which in a man of his character was less dangerous than his smoothness. "I know your feelings to that family—at least to one of them—and if I've been playing it pretty rough on you, it's only because you played it rather rough on me the last time you were here. Let's understand each other. I'll go so far as to say I don't believe that Mrs. Saltonstall had anything to do with that murder, but, as a business man, I'm bound to say that these circumstances and her own indiscretion are quite enough to bring the biggest pressure down on her. I wouldn't want any better 'bear' on the market value of her rights than this. Take it at its best. Say that the Coroner's verdict is set aside, and a charge of murder against unknown parties is made"——

"One moment, Mr. Prince," said Carroll. "I shall be one of the first to insist that this is done, and I have confidence enough in Mrs. Saltonstall's honest friendship for the Doctor to know that she will lose no time in pursuing his murderers."

Prince looked at Carroll with a feeling of half envy and half pity. "I think not," he said, drily; "for all suspicion points to one man as the perpetrator, and that man was Mrs. Saltonstall's confidential servant—the mayordomo Pereo." He waited for a moment for the effect of this announcement on Carroll, and then went on, "You now understand that even if Mrs. Saltonstall is acquitted of any connivance with or even knowledge of the deed she will hardly enjoy the prosecution of her confidential servant for murder."

"But how can this be prevented? If, as you say, there are actual proofs, why have they not been acted upon before? What can keep them from being acted upon now?"

"The proofs have been collected by one man, have been in possession of one man, and will only pass out of his possession when it is for the benefit of the legal heir—who does not yet even know of their existence."

"And who is this one man?"

"Myself."

"You?—You?" said Carroll, advancing towards him. "Then this is your work!"

"Captain Carroll," said Prince, without moving, but drawing his lips tightly together and putting his head on one side, "I don't propose to have another scene like the one we had at our last meeting. If you try on anything of that kind, I shall put the whole matter into a lawyer's hands. I don't say that you won't regret it; I don't say that I sha'nt be disappointed too, for I have been managing this thing purely as a matter of business with a view to profiting by it. It so happens that we can both work to the same end, even if our motives are not the same. I don't call myself an officer and a gentleman, but I reckon I've run this affair about as delicately as the best of them, and with a d——d sight more horse sense. I want this thing hushed up and compromised to get some control of the property again, and to prevent it depreciating, as it would, in litigation; you want it hushed up for the sake of the girl and your future mother-in-law. I don't know anything about your laws of honour, but I've laid my cards on the table for you to see, without asking what you've got in your hand. You can play the game or leave the board, as you choose." He turned and walked to the window—not without leaving on Carroll's mind a certain sense of firmness, truthfulness, and sincerity which commanded his respect.

"I withdraw any remark that might have seemed to reflect on your business integrity, Mr. Prince," said Carroll, quietly. "I am willing to admit that you have managed this thing better than I could, and if I join you in an act to suppress these revelations, I have no right to judge of your intentions. What do you propose to have me do?"

"To state the whole case to Mrs. Saltonstall, and to ask her to acknowledge the young man's legal claim without litigation."

"But how do you know that she would not do this without—excuse me—without intimidation?"

"I only reckon that a woman clever enough to get hold of a million, would be clever enough to keep it—against others."

"I hope to show you are mistaken. But where is this heir?"

"Here."

"Here?"

"Yes. For the last six months he has been my private secretary. I know what you are thinking of, Captain Carroll. You would consider it indelicate—eh? Well, that's just where we differ. By this means I have kept everything in my own hands—prevented him from getting into the hands of outsiders—and I intend to dispose of just as much of the facts to him as may be necessary for him to prove his title. What bargain I may make with him—is my affair."

"Does he suspect the murder?"

"No. I did not think it necessary for his good or mine. He can be an ugly devil if he likes, and although there wasn't much love lost between him and the old man, it wouldn't pay to have any revenge mixed up with business. He knows nothing of it. It was only by accident that, looking after his movements while he was here, I ran across the tracks of the murderer."

"But what has kept him from making known his claim to the Saltonstalls? Are you sure he has not?" said Carroll, with a sudden thought that it might account for Maruja's strangeness.

"Positive. He's too proud to make a claim unless he could thoroughly prove it, and only a month ago he made me promise to keep it dark. He's too lazy to trouble himself about it much anyway—as far as I can see. D——d if I don't think his being a tramp has made him lose his taste for everything! Don't worry yourself about him. He isn't likely to make confidences with the Saltonstalls, for he don't like 'em, and never went there but once. Instinctively or not, the widow didn't cotton to him; and I fancy Miss Maruja has some old grudge against him for that fan business on the road. She isn't a girl to forgive or forget anything, as I happen to know," he added, with an uneasy laugh.

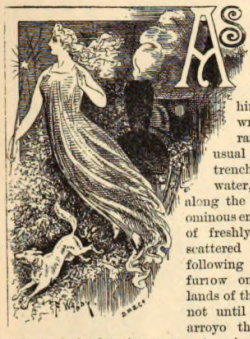
Carroll was too preoccupied with the danger that seemed to threaten his friends from this surly pretender to resent Prince's tactless allusion. He was thinking of Maruja's ominous agitation at his presence at Dr. West's grave. "Do they suspect him at all?"—he asked, hurriedly.



"How should they? He goes by the name of Guest—which was his father's real name until changed by an act of legislation when he first came here. Nobody remembers it. We only found it out from his papers. It was quite legal, as all his property was acquired under the name of West."

Carroll rose and buttoned his overcoat. "I presume you are able to offer conclusive proofs of everything you have asserted?"

"Perfectly."

"I am going to the Mision Perdida now," said Captain Carroll, quietly. "To-morrow I will bring you the answer—Peace or War." He walked to the door, lifted his hand to his cap with a brief military salutation, and disappeared.

CHAPTER XI.

As Captain Carroll urged his horse along the miry road to La Mision Perdida, he was struck with certain changes in the landscape before him other than those wrought by the winter rains. There were the usual deep gullies and trenches, half-filled with water, in the fields and along the road, but there were ominous embankments and ridges of freshly turned soil, and a scattered fringe of timbers following a cruel, undeviating furrow on the broad grazing lands of the Mision. But it was not until he had crossed the arroyo that he felt the full extent of the late improvements. A quick rumbling in the distance, a light flash of steam above the willow copse, that drifted across the field on his right, and he knew that the railroad was already in operation. Captain Carroll reined in his frightened charger, and passed his hand across his brow with a dazed sense of loss. He had been gone only four months—yet he already felt strange and forgotten.

It was with a feeling of relief that he at last turned from the high road into the lane. Here everything was unchanged, except that the ditches were more thickly strewn with the sodden leaves of fringing oaks and sycamores. Giving his horse to a servant in the courtyard, he did not enter the patio, but, crossing the lawn, stepped upon the long verandah. The rain was dripping from its eaves and striking a minute spray from the vines that clung to its columns; his footfall awoke a hollow echo as he passed, as if the outer shell of the house were deserted; the formal yews and hemlocks that in summer had relieved the dazzling glare of six months' sunshine had now taken gloomy possession of the garden, and the evening shadows, thickened by rain, seemed to lie in wait at every corner. The servant, who had with old-fashioned courtesy placed the keys and the "disposition" of that wing of the house at his service, said that Doña Maria would wait upon him in the salon before dinner. Knowing the difficulty of breaking the usual rigid etiquette, and trusting to the happy intervention of Maruja—though here, again, custom debarred him from asking for her—he allowed the servant to remove his wet overcoat, and followed him to the stately and solemn chamber prepared for him. The silence and gloom of the great house, so grateful and impressive in the ardent summer, began to weigh upon him under this shadow of an overcast sky. He walked to the window and gazed out on the cloister-like verandah. A melancholy willow at an angle of the stables seemed to be wringing its hands in the rising wind. He turned for relief to the dim fire that flickered like a votive taper in the vault-like hearth, and drew a chair towards it. In spite of the impatience and preoccupation of a lover, he found himself again and again recurring to the story he had just heard, until the vengeful spirit of the murdered Doctor seemed to darken and possess the house. He was striving to shake off the feeling, when his attention was attracted to stealthy footsteps in the passage. Could it be Maruja? He rose to his feet with his eye upon the door. The footsteps ceased—it remained closed. But another door, which had escaped his attention in the darkened corner, slowly swung on its hinges, and, with a stealthy step, Pereo, the mayordomo, entered the room.

Courageous and self-possessed as Captain Carroll was by nature and education, this malevolent vision, and incarnation of the thought uppermost in his mind, turned him cold. He had half drawn a derringer from his breast, when his eye fell on the grizzled locks and wrinkled face of the old man, and his hand dropped to his side. But Pereo, with the quick observation of insanity, had noticed the weapon, and rubbed his hands together with a malicious laugh.

"Good! good! good!" he whispered, rapidly, in a strange bodiless voice, "'twill serve! 'twill serve! And you are a soldier too—and know how to use it! Good, it is a Providence!" He lifted his hollow eyes to heaven, and then added, "Come! come!"

Carroll stepped towards him. He was alone and in the presence of an undoubted madman—one strong enough, in spite of his years, to inflict a deadly injury, and one whom he now began to realise might have done so once before. Nevertheless, he laid his hand on the old man's arm, and, looking him calmly in the eye, said, quietly, "Come? Where, Pereo? I have only just arrived."

"I know it," whispered the old man, nodding his head violently. "I was watching them, when you rode up. That is why I lost the scent; but together we can track them still—we can track them. Eh, Captain, eh! Come! Come!" and he moved slowly backward, waving his hand towards the door.

"Track whom, Pereo?" said Carroll, soothingly. "Whom do you seek?"

"Whom?" said the old man, startled for a moment and passing his hand over his wrinkled forehead. "Whom? Eh! Why the Doña Maruja and the little black cat—her maid—Faquita!"

"Yes, but why seek them? Why track them?"

"Why?" said the old man, with a sudden burst of impotent passion. "You ask me why! Because they are going to the rendezvous again. They are going to seek him. Do you understand—to seek him—the Coyote!"

Carroll smiled a faint smile of relief—"So—the Coyote!"

"Ay," said the old man in a confidential whisper; "the Coyote! But not the big one—you understand—the little one. The big one is dead—dead—dead! But the little one lives yet. You shall do for him what I, Pereo—listen"—he glanced around the room furtively—"what I—the good old Pereo, did for the big one! Good, it is a Providence. Come!"——

Of the terrible thoughts that crossed Carroll's mind at this unexpected climax one alone was uppermost. The trembling irresponsible wretch before him meditated some vague crime—and Maruja was in danger. He did not allow himself to dwell upon any other suspicion suggested by that speech; he quickly conceived a plan of action. To have rung the bell and given Pereo into the hands of the servants would have only exposed to them the lunatic's secret—if he had any—and he might either escape in his fury or relapse into useless imbecility. To humour him and follow him, and trust afterwards to his own quickness and courage to avert any calamity, seemed to be the only plan. Captain Carroll turned his clear glance on the restless eyes of Pereo, and said, without emotion, "Let us go, then, and quickly. You shall track them for me; but remember, good Pereo, you must leave the rest to me."

In spite of himself, some accidental significance in this ostentatious adjuration to lull Pereo's suspicions struck him with pain. But the old man's eyes glittered with gratified passion as he said, "Ay, good! I will keep my word. Thou shalt work thy will on the little one as I have said. Truly it is a Providence! Come!" Seeing Captain Carroll glance round for his overcoat, he seized a poncho from the wall, wrapped it round him, and grasped his hand. Carroll, who would have evaded this semblance of disguise, had no time to parley, and they turned together through the door by which Pereo had entered into a long dark passage, which seemed to be made through the outer shell of the building that flanked the park. Following his guide in the profound obscurity, perfectly conscious that any change in his madness might be followed by a struggle in the dark, where no help could reach them, they presently came to a door that opened upon the fresh smell of rain and leaves. They were standing at the bottom of a secluded alley, between two high hedges that hid it from the end of the garden. Its grass-grown walk and untrimmed hedges showed that it was seldom used. Carroll, still keeping close to Pereo's side, felt him suddenly stop and tremble. "Look!" he said, pointing to a shadowy figure some distance before them, "look, 'tis Maruja, and alone!"

With a dexterous movement, Carroll managed to slip his arm securely through the old man's, and even to throw himself before him, as if in his eagerness to discern the figure.

"'Tis Maruja—and alone!" said Pereo, trembling. Alone! Eh! And the Coyote is not here!" He passed his hand over his staring eyes. "So." Suddenly he turned upon Carroll. "Ah, do you not see, it is a trick! The Coyote is escaping with Faquita! Come! Nay; thou wilt not? Then will I!" With an unexpected strength born of his madness he freed his arm from Carroll and darted down the alley. The figure of Maruja, evidently alarmed at his approach, glided into the hedge, as Pereo passed swiftly by, intent only on his one wild fancy. Without a further thought of his companion or even the luckless Faquita. Carroll also plunged through the hedge, to intercept Maruja, But by that time she was already crossing the upper end of the lawn, hurrying towards the entrance to the patio. Carroll did not hesitate to follow. Keeping in view the lithe, dark, active little figure, now hidden by an intervening cluster of bushes, now fading in the gathering evening shadows, he nevertheless did not succeed in gaining upon her until she had nearly reached the patio. Here he lost ground, as, turning to the right instead of entering the courtyard, she kept her way toward the stables. He was near enough, however, to speak. "One moment, Miss Saltonstall," he said, hurriedly; "there is no danger. I am alone. But I must speak with you."

The young girl seemed only to redouble her exertions. At last she stopped before a narrow door hidden in the wall, and fumbled in her pocket for a key. That moment Carroll was upon her.

"Forgive me, Miss Saltonstall—Maruja; but you must hear me! You are safe, but I fear for your maid, Faquita!"

A little laugh followed his speech; the door yielded and opened to her vanishing figure. For an instant the lace shawl muffling her face was lifted, as the door closed and locked behind her. Carroll drew back in consternation. It was the laughing eyes and saucy face of Faquita!

CHAPTER XII.

When Captain Carroll turned from the high road into the lane, an hour before, Maruja and Faquita had already left the house by the same secret passage and garden-door that opened afterwards upon himself and Pereo. The young women had evidently changed dresses; Maruja was wearing the costume of her maid; Faquita was closely veiled and habited like her mistress; but it was characteristic that, while Faquita appeared awkward and over-dressed in her borrowed plumes, Maruja's short saya and trim bodice, with the striped shawl that hid her fair head, looked infinitely more coquettish and bewitching than on its legitimate owner.

They passed hurriedly down the long alley, and at its further end turned at right angles to a small gate half hidden in the shrubbery. It opened upon a venerable vineyard, that dated back to the occupation of the padres, but was now given over to the chance cultivation of peons and domestics. Its long, broken rows of low vines, knotted and overgrown with age, reached to the thicketed hillside of buckeye that marked the beginning of the cañada. Here Maruja parted from her maid, and, muffling the shawl more closely round her head, hastily passed between the vine rows to a ruined adobe building near the hillside. It was originally part of the refectory of the old Mision, but had been more recently used as a viñadero's cottage. As she neared it, her steps grew slower, until, reaching its door, she hesitated, with her hand timidly on the latch. The next moment she opened it gently; it was closed quickly behind her, and with a little stifled cry she found herself in the arms of Henry Guest.

It was only for an instant; the pleading of her white hands disengaged from his neck, where at first they had found themselves, and uplifted before her face, touched him more than the petitioning eyes or the sweet voiceless mouth, whose breath even was forgotten. Letting her sink into the chair from which he had just risen, he drew back a step with his hands clasped before him, and his dark half-savage eyes bent earnestly upon her. Well might he have gazed. It was no longer the conscious beauty, proud and regnant, seated before him; but a timid, frightened girl, struggling with her first deep passion.

All that was wise and gentle that she had intended to say, all that her clear intellect and experience had taught her, died upon her lips with that kiss. And all that she could do of womanly dignity and high-bred decorum was to tuck her small feet under her chair in the desperate attempt to lengthen her short skirt, and beg him not to look at her.

"I have had to change dresses with Faquita, because we were watched," she said, leaning forward in her chair and drawing the striped shawl around her shoulders. "I have had to steal out of my mother's house and through the fields, as if I was a gipsy. If I only were a gipsy, Harry, and not"——

"And not the proudest heiress in the land," he interrupted, with something of his old bitterness. "True, I had forgot."

"But I never reminded you of it," she said, lifting her eyes to his. "I did not remind you of it on that day—in—in—in the conservatory, nor at the time you first spoke of—of—love to me—nor from the time I first consented to meet you here. It is you, Harry, who have spoken of the difference of our condition, you who have talked of my wealth, my family, my position—until I would gladly have changed places with Faquita as I have garments, if I had thought it would make you happier."

"Forgive me, darling!" he said, dropping on one knee before her and bending over the cold little hand he had taken, until his dark head almost rested in her lap. "Forgive me! You are too proud, Maruja, to admit, even to yourself, that you have given your heart where your hand and fortune could not follow. But others may not think so. I am proud, too, and will not have it said that I have won you before I was worthy of you."

"You have no right to be more proud than I, Sir," she said, rising to her feet, with a touch of her old supreme assertion. "No—don't, Harry—please Harry—there!" Nevertheless, she succumbed; and when she went on, it was with her head resting on his shoulder. "It 's this deceit and secrecy that is so shameful, Harry. I think I could bear everything with you, if it were all known—if you came to woo me like—like—the others. Even if they abused you—if they spoke of your doubtful origin of your poverty—of your hardships! When they aspersed you, I could fight them; when they spoke of your having no father that you could claim, I could even lie for you, I think, Harry, and say that you had; if they spoke of your poverty, I would speak of my wealth; if they talked of your hardships, I should only be proud of your endurance—if I could only keep the tears from my eyes!" They were there now. He kissed them away.

"But if they threatened you? If they drove me from the house?"

"I should fly with you," she said, hiding her head in his breast.

"What if I were to ask you to fly with me now?" he said, gloomily.

"Now!" she repeated, lifting her frightened eyes to his.

His face darkened with its old look of savage resentment. "Hear me, Maruja," he said, taking her hands tightly in his own. "When I forgot myself—when I was mad that day in the conservatory, the only expiation I could think of was to swear in my inmost soul that I would never take advantage of your forgiveness, that I would never tempt you to forget yourself, your friends, your family, for me, an unknown outcast. When I found you pitied me, and listened to my love—

THE LOCK-GATE: PLEASURE.

DRAWN BY H. CAFFIERI.

THE LOCK-GATE: TOIL.

DRAWN BY H. CAFFIERI.

I was too weak to forego the one ray of sunshine in my wretched life—and thinking that I had a prospect before me in an idea I promised to reveal to you later, I swore never to beguile you or myself in that hope by any act that might bring you to repent it—or myself to dishonour. But I taxed myself too much, Maruja. I have asked too much of you. You are right, darling; this secrecy—this deceit—is unworthy of us! Every hour of it—blest as it has been to me—every moment—sweet as it is—blackens the purity of our only defence, makes you false and me a coward! It must end here—to-day! Maruja, darling, my precious one! God knows what may be the success of my plans. We have but one chance now. I must leave here to-day, never to return, or I must take you with me. Do not start, Maruja—but hear me out. Dare you risk all? Dare you fly with me now, to-night, to the old Padre at the ruined Mission, and let him bind us in those bonds that none dare break? We can take Faquita with us—it is but a few miles—and we can return and throw ourselves at your mother's feet. She can only drive us forth together. Or we can fly from this cursed wealth, and all the misery it has entailed—for ever!"

She raised her head, and with her two hands on his shoulders gazed at him with her father's searching eyes, as if to read his very soul.

"Are you mad, Harry!—think what you propose! Is this not tempting me? Think again, dearest," she said, half convulsively seizing his arm when her grasp had slipped from his shoulder.

There was a momentary silence as she stood with her eyes fixed almost wildly on his set face. But a sudden shock against the bolted door and an inarticulate outcry startled them. With an instinctive movement, Guest threw his arm round her.

"It 's Pereo," she said, in a hurried whisper, but once more mistress of her strength and resolution. "He is seeking you! Fly at once. He is mad, Harry; a raving lunatic. He watched us the last time. He has tracked us here. He suspects you. You must not meet him. You can escape through the other door that opens upon the cañada. If you love me—fly!"

"And leave you exposed to his fury—are you mad! No. Fly yourself by the other door, lock it behind you and alarm the servants. I will open this door to him, secure him here, and then be gone. Do not fear for me. There is no danger—and if I mistake not," he added, with a strange significance, "he will hardly attack me!"

"But he may have already alarmed the household. Hark!"

There was the noise of a struggle outside the door, and then the voice of Captain Carroll, calm and collected, rose clearly for an instant. "You are quite safe, Miss Saltonstall. I think I have him secure, but perhaps you had better not open the door until assistance comes."

They gazed at each other without a word. A grim challenge played on Guest's lips. Maruja lifted her little hands deliberately, and clasped them round his defiant neck.

"Listen, darling," she said, softly and quietly, as if only the security of silence and darkness encompassed them. "You asked me just now if I would fly with you—if I would marry you without the consent of my family—against the protest of my friends—and at once! I hesitated, Harry, for I was frightened and foolish. But I say to you now that I will marry you when and where you like—for I love you, Harry, and you alone."

"Then let us go at once," he said, passionately seizing her, "we can reach the road by the cañada before assistance comes—before we are discovered. Come!"

"And you will remember in the years to come, Harry," she said, still composedly, and with her arms still around his neck, "that I never loved any but you—that I never knew what love was before, and that since I have loved you—I have never thought of any other. Will you not?"

"I will—and now"——

"And now," she said, with a superb gesture towards the barrier which separated them from Carroll, "OPEN THE DOOR!"

CHAPTER XIII.

WITH a swift glance of admiration at Maruja, Guest flung open the door. The hastily-summoned servants were already bearing away the madman, exhausted by his efforts. Captain Carroll alone remained there, erect and motionless, before the threshold.

At a sign from Maruja, he entered the room. In the flash of light made by the opening door, he had been perfectly conscious of her companion, but not a motion of his eye or the movement of a muscle of his face betrayed it. The trained discipline of his youth stood him in good service, and for the moment left him master of the situation.

"I think no apology is needed for this intrusion," he said, with cool composure. "Pereo seemed intent on murdering somebody or something, and I followed him here. I suppose I might have got him away more quietly, but I was afraid you might have thoughtlessly opened the door." He stopped, and added, "I see now how unfounded was the supposition."

It was a fatal addition. In the next instant, the Maruja who had been standing beside Guest, conscious-stricken and remorseful in the presence of the man she had deceived, and calmly awaiting her punishment, changed at this luckless exhibition of her own peculiar womanly weapons. The old Maruja, supreme, ready, undaunted and passionless, returned to the fray.

"You were wrong, Captain," she said, sweetly; "fortunately, Mr. Guest—whom I see you have forgotten in your absence—was with me, and I think would have felt it his duty to have protected me. But I thank you all the same, and I think even Mr. Guest will not allow his envy of your good fortune in coming so gallantly to my rescue to prevent his appreciating its full value. I am only sorry that on your return to La Mision Perdida you should have fallen into the arms of a madman before extending your hands to your friends."

Their eyes met. She saw that he hated her—and felt relieved.

"It may not have been so entirely unfortunate," he said, with a coldness strongly in contrast with his gradually blazing eyes, "for I was charged with a message to you, in which this madman is supposed by some to play an important part."

"Is it a matter of business?" said Maruja, lightly, yet with a sudden instinctive premonition of coming evil in the relentless tones of his voice.

"It is business, Miss Saltonstall—purely and simply business," said Carroll, drily, "under whatever other name it may have been since presented to you."

"Perhaps you have no objection to tell it before Mr. Guest," said Maruja, with an inspiration of audacity; "it sounds so mysterious that it must be interesting. Otherwise, Captain Carroll, who abhors business, would not have undertaken it with more than his usual enthusiasm."

"As the business does interest Mr. Guest, or Mr. West, or whatever name he may have decided upon since I had the pleasure of meeting him," said Carroll—for the first time striking fire from the eyes of his rival—"I see no reason why I should not, even at the risk of telling you what you already know. Briefly, then, Mr. Prince charged me to advise you and your mother to avoid litigation with this gentleman, and admit his claim, as the son of Dr. West, to his share of the property."

The utter consternation and bewilderment shown in the face of Maruja convinced Carroll of his fatal error. She had received the addresses of this man without knowing his real position! The wild theory that had seemed to justify his resentment—that she had sold herself to Guest to possess the property—now recoiled upon him in its utter baseness. She had loved Guest for himself alone; by this base revelation he had helped to throw her into his arms.

But he did not even yet know Maruja. Turning to Guest, with flashing eyes, she said, "Is it true—are you the son of Dr. West, and"—she hesitated—"kept out of your inheritance by us?"

"I am the son of Dr. West," he said, earnestly, "though I alone had the right to tell you that at the proper time and occasion. Believe me that I have given no one the right—least of all any tool of Prince—to trade upon it."

"Then," said Carroll, fiercely, forgetting everything in his anger, "perhaps you will disclaim before this young lady the charge made by your employer that Pereo was instigated to Dr. West's murder by her mother?"

Again he had overshot the mark. The horror and indignation depicted in Guest's face was too plainly visible to Maruja as well as himself to permit a doubt that the idea was as new as the accusation. Forgetting her bewilderment at these revelations, her wounded pride, a torturing doubt suggested by Guest's want of confidence in her—indeed everything but the outraged feelings of her lover, she flew to his side. "Not a word," she said, proudly, lifting her little hand before his darkening face. "Do not insult me by replying to such an accusation in my presence. Captain Carroll," she continued, turning towards him, "I cannot forget that you were introduced into my mother's house as an officer and a gentleman. When you return to it as such, and not as a man of business, you will be welcome. Until then, farewell!"

She remained standing, erect and passionless, as Carroll, with a cold salutation, stepped back and disappeared in the darkness; and then she turned, and, with tottering step and a little cry, fell upon Guest's breast. "O Harry—Harry!—why have you deceived me!"

"I thought it for the best, darling," he said, lifting her face to his. "You know now the prospect I spoke of—the hope that buoyed me up! I wanted to win you myself alone, without appealing to your sense of justice or even your sympathies! I did win you. God knows, if I had not, you would never have learned through me that a son of Dr. West had ever lived. But that was not enough. When I found that I could establish my right to my father's property, I wanted you to marry me before you knew it; so that it never could be said that you were influenced by anything but love for me. That was why I came here to-day. That was why I pressed you to fly with me!"

He ceased. She was fumbling with the buttons of his waistcoat. "Harry," she said, softly, "did you think of the property when—when—you kissed me in the conservatory?"

"I thought of nothing but you," he answered, tenderly.

Suddenly she started from his embrace. "But Pereo!—Harry—tell me quick—no one—nobody can think that this poor demented old man could—that Dr. West was—that——it 's all a trick—isn't it? Harry—speak!"

He was silent for a moment, and then said, gravely, "There were strange men at the fonda that night, and—my father was supposed to carry money with him. My own life was attempted at the Mision the same evening for the sake of some paltry gold pieces that I had imprudently shown. I was saved solely by the interference of one man. That man was Pereo, your mayordomo!"

She seized his hand and raised it joyfully to her lips. "Thank you for those words! And you will come to him with me at once; and he will recognise you; and we will laugh at those lies; won't we, Harry?"

He did not reply. Perhaps he was listening to a confused sound of voices rapidly approaching the cottage. Together they stepped out into the gathering night. A number of figures were coming towards them, among them Faquita, who ran a little ahead to meet her mistress.

"Oh, Doña Maruja, he has escaped!"

"Who? Not Pereo!"

"Truly. And on his horse. It was saddled and bridled in the stable all day. One knew it not. He was walking like a cat, when suddenly he parted the peons around him, like grain before a mad bull—and behold! he was on the pinto's back and away. And, alas! there is no horse that can keep up with the pinto. God grant he may not get in the way of the r-r-railroad; that, in his very madness, he will even despise."

"My own horse is in the thicket," whispered Guest, hurriedly, in Maruja's ear. "I have measured him with the pinto before now. Give me your blessing, and I will bring him back if he be alive."

She pressed his hand and said, "Go." Before the astonished servants could identify the strange escort of their mistress, he was gone.

It was already quite dark. To any but Guest, who had made the topography of La Mision Perdida a practical study, and who had known the habitual circuit of the mayordomo in his efforts to avoid him, the search would have been hopeless. But rightly conjecturing that he would in his demented condition follow the force of habit, he spurred his horse along the high road until he reached the lane leading to the grassy amphitheatre already described, which was once his favourite resort. Since then it had participated in the terrible transformation already wrought in the valley by the railroad. A deep cutting through one of the grassy hills had been made for the line that now crossed the lower arc of the amphitheatre.

His conjecture was justified on entering it by the appearance of a shadowy horseman in full career round the circle, and he had no difficulty in recognising Pereo. As there was no other exit than the one by which he came, the other being inaccessible by reason of the railroad track, he calmly watched him twice make the circuit of the arena, ready to ride towards him when he showed symptoms of slackening his speed.

Suddenly he became aware of some strange exercise on the part of the mysterious rider, and as he swept by on the nearer side of the circle, he saw that he was throwing a lasso! A horrible thought that he was witnessing an insane rehearsal of the murder of his father flashed across his mind.

A far-off whistle from the distant woods recalled him to his calmer senses at the same moment that it seemed also to check the evolutions of the furious rider. Guest felt confident that the wretched man could not escape him now. It was the approaching train, whose appearance would undoubtedly frighten Pereo toward the entrance of the little valley guarded by him. The hillside was already alive with the clattering echoes of the oncoming monster, when, to his horror, he saw the madman advancing rapidly towards the cutting. He put spurs to his horse, and started in pursuit; but the train was already emerging from the narrow passage, followed by the furious rider, who had wheeled abreast of the engine, and was, for a moment or two, madly keeping up with it. Guest shouted to him, but his voice was lost in the roar of the rushing caravan.

Something seemed to fly from Pereo's hand. The next moment the train had passed; rider and horse, crushed and battered out of all life, were rolling in the ditch, while the murderer's empty saddle dangled at the end of a lasso, caught on the smoke-stack of one of the murdered man's avenging improvements!

* * * *

The marriage of Maruja and the son of the late Dr. West was received in the valley of San Antonio as one of the most admirably conceived and skilfully matured plans of that lamented genius. There were many who were ready to state that the Doctor had confided it to them years before; and it was generally accepted that the widow Saltonstall had been simply made a trustee for the benefit of the prospective young couple. Only one person, perhaps, did not entirely accept these views; it was Mr. James Prince—otherwise known as Aladdin. In later years, he is said to have stated authoritatively "that the only combination in business that was uncertain—was man and woman."
